Mr. Taylor: My hon. Friend makes an important point, but the categorisation of "film" in the sense of video film was accepted as the basic definition for this purpose. If photography as such were to be considered an art form, that might bring it under aspects of copyright other than the particular element of video or visual presentations, which are generically called "films". I shall certainly consider what my hon. Friend has said in case there is a distinction that may have eluded me.

Copyright in films will now last for 70 years from the death of the last to die of the group of people consisting of the principal director, the authors of the screenplay and dialogue and the composer of any music made specifically for the film. The underlying reason for the change in approach is that several other member states already protect films on a life-plus basis rather than for a fixed period.

I should also like to explain that the directive requires that the increased copyright terms that it sets will apply not only to future works but to existing ones. That means that the copyright of works currently in protection in the United Kingdom will be extended. Revival of copyright will also occur in the case of works which, although in the public domain in the United Kingdom, are still protected elsewhere in the European Union. However, the terms set by the directive apply essentially only to works from the EU. Those from outside the EU will receive the term granted in the country of origin which, in most cases, will be less than the European Union term.

A number of the regulations relate to transitional provisions in relation to extended and revived copyrights. The Government are well aware of the difficulties that revival could cause, but without this approach there would be no effective harmonisation for a considerable time and UK sound recordings and performances would suffer from remaining out of protection in several other member states.

Moreover, we have tried to do as much possible to ensure that there are adequate safeguards to protect users who would otherwise be adversely affected by revival of copyright. Clearly, it would be wrong if anything done before the regulations came into force and copyrights revived were retrospectively to constitute an infringement of revived rights. That will not be the case, but, necessarily, the safeguards go much further. For example, where arrangements for exploitation of a work in which copyright will revive have been made before 1 January 1995, nothing done in pursuance of those arrangements after the regulations come into force will infringe the revived rights. That means, for example, that if a publisher has entered into commitments to produce an edition of an affected work before the date that I have announced, he will be able to fulfil his commitments without incurring any liability to copyright owners.

We have also had to establish who is to own extended or revived rights. That is not dealt with by the directive but has to be resolved, since otherwise it would be unclear who is entitled to authorise particular works or to benefit from them, with the result that future use of works could be inhibited. On that aspect, we have tried to take an approach which is both fair and produces the greatest legal certainty. In essence, we have concluded that those objectives are best met by providing that the current owner of copyright will own the rights extended by the regulations and that the last owner of the original copyright will own revived rights.

The House will realise from this introduction that the directive raises difficult questions of balance between competing interests, which have to be addressed in the regulations. We have consulted widely on the legislation—first, through a consultation paper on the issues of ownership of rights and safeguards for users and, secondly, through a consultative draft of the regulations. In all, more than 200 different representative bodies, firms and individuals were consulted. I have also had many representations from colleagues who have taken a particular interest in the matter, and I am grateful to them for the cases that they have made—personally and on behalf of the organisations that they have introduced to me.

We are grateful for the detailed and helpful responses. Frankly, this is not an easy matter. Ultimately, it requires that a balance be struck. We have carefully considered all the points raised. I am confident that we have arrived at conclusions which are both fair and workable.

There is one further matter on which I should comment—the date on which the regulations are due to come into force: 1 January 1996. I am aware that there is concern among interested parties about whether that means that copyrights due to expire on 31 December are extended, as opposed to being revived. I assure the House that the effect of the regulations is that those copyrights will continue in force and be extended. The concept of time being continuous is very relevant. I assure the House that I have taken the most detailed instructions from my officials, whom I have cross-questioned on the matter, and they have satisfied me that the law—and the text—says exactly what it should say. I present the regulations for the attention of the House.

Mr. Geoffrey Hoon (Ashfield): I thank the Minister for his presence—and for his brevity, something that has sadly characterised too much of the Government's public contribution to this debate. As the Minister said, the regulations concern a complex and difficult area of law. Too often, the law relating to copyright is seen as a specialist subject of concern and significance to a particular and—possibly—rather narrow group of legal practitioners. Perhaps that feeling is reflected by the modest attendance in the House. Yet its importance underlies the entire provision of information and entertainment in this country. Without effective copyright laws, here and across the world, it is impossible to imagine how books could be commercially published, how music could be distributed and how films could be shown in cinemas.

Moreover, as the revolution in information technology gathers pace, copyright will become still more significant. As we move from mass media to the availability of films and music on-line and transmitted digitally into the home, effective copyright law around the world will be crucial. Copyright law will therefore be at the centre of a series of commercial relationships, vital to the country's trading and financial interests, and vital to those who create, develop and distribute new ideas and information.

Although the Labour party will not be voting against the implementation of the draft regulations, Labour Members believe that there are significant problems with their content and, perhaps more significantly, with the timetable that has been followed. We have a series of concerns about the extent to which the draft regulations reflect the European directive on which they are supposed to be based and the fact that they are part of a comprehensive redefinition of the law of copyright in this country and at European level, to which I hope that the Minister will be able to respond.

I shall first deal with the timetable for the legislation. The draft regulations implement the European Union's duration directive, harmonising the term of copyright, which, if approved today, will come into force in this country on 1 January 1996, as the Minister said. The regulations are, as the Minister conceded, already six months late. Since the regulations are not amendable at this stage, we are left with the uncomfortable position of having to accept their general thrust—which we do—while not being able to make the necessary detailed amendments. In the interests of the greater good served by the regulations, we are at this stage prepared to accept them.

Having said that, it is important to place on record our reservations. In particular, why has it taken the Minister so long to lay the draft regulations before the House? He referred repeatedly to complexity, but a careful study of the timetable would be useful to Members. The regulations are based on a directive that was published on 29 October 1993. It took more than a year—13 months—for the Department of Trade and Industry to produce a consultation paper. That was produced on 5 December 1994. It was not the most sophisticated of documents, although I recognise that it was necessary to address certain questions.

The consultation paper, which as I said took 13 months to produce, simply asked a series of questions. It did not provide the answers—although it provided some guidance—yet it asked questions of those who were consulted. The consultation period went on for a further 12 months. The regulations were published on 6 December 1995. In my experience, draft regulations normally contain the precise date of publication. It is curious that in this case—Members will observe it if they look at the regulations—the regulations are somewhat coy about when they were published. It says that they were published in 1995. They were in fact published on 6 December 1995. I suspect that the reason why the precise date is absent is that the Government are embarrassed about taking so long to produce the regulations.

What that means to the House is that although the Department had some 13 months to issue its consultation paper—a series of questions without any particular answers—and then took a further 12 months to produce the regulations, it has given the House eight working days to consider what the Minister has described as a complex series of proposals. Indeed, before the proposals come into law on 1 January 1996, the House has precisely 10 days in which to consider their complexity, debate them and reach a conclusion.

I would be perfectly willing to give way to the Minister if he wished to explain whether the reason for that was simply Government incompetence or a deliberate and calculated snub to the House. That is a serious question, given that we have to consider these matters, complex as the Minister acknowledges, in eight working days, and have not been given the opportunity that his own Department was given to consider them over years. I shall gladly give way.

Mr. Ian Taylor: I reassure the hon. Gentleman and the House that no snub was intended, nor was there incompetence. There was, as I saw for myself, a whole series of very complex attempts at drafting the regulations, since their concept is not easy to express in succinct form in legislation. That is therefore what has taken so long—as well as my insistence that there was the widest possible consultation.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to the Minister for his observations. I am sure that the House appreciates the difficulty that he has had with the complexity of this matter. However, individual Members also have to wrestle with that complexity in reaching their views, which cannot be done satisfactorily in a short time.

I invite the Minister's comment on another subject. He mentioned the consultation repeatedly. That consultation has gone on for 12 months. The Minister told us that some 200 responses were received by the Department. Of course, none of those responses is available to Members. They are available only to the Minister, and therefore no one else knows what balance of representation was contained in those responses.

Would it not have helped the Minister's case enormously if, when he was explaining the rather short time that Members have to consider the regulations, the results of the consultation had been made available in the Library? Then, we could have seen how the argument had developed in the same way that he and his colleagues could. That would have meant that we would have had some idea how the different arguments developed in the preparation of the regulations.

The Minister candidly conceded that certain aspects of the directive were not covered by the regulations. Practitioners and others in this area are concerned that, notwithstanding that the terms of the directive have been available for more than two years, we still do not have a comprehensive enactment of those terms. Can the Minister say clearly when the entire directive will be implemented, including article 4, and when the other aspects of the directive not mentioned in the regulations will be laid before the House?

I hope that the Minister will answer that question because, as he has repeatedly reminded the House, the point of the legislation is the need for European harmonisation. As one of the Ministers most enthusiastic about Europe, he knows that the purpose of harmonisation is to ensure that we do not have different levels of protection in the legal systems of different member states. That was the reason for enacting the duration directive, yet the Government, after more than two years, are able to enact only part of that directive. I hope that the Minister will clarify the timetable for other aspects of the directive.

The Minister properly made reference to some criticisms that have been made of the implementation date. A number of organisations concerned about copyright, notably the British Copyright Council, have expressed their anxieties about the date on which the regulations will come into force. The Minister failed to explain why 1 January 1996 had been chosen.

[Mr. Hoon]

The criticism made was that 31 December 1995 would have been preferable. That date would have allowed a new, longer period of copyright to apply to the United Kingdom works whose copyright protection will expire under the present law on 31 December 1995. Although such works will clearly be governed by the regulations, there is concern that they will be subject to the regime governing revived copyright. Had the directive been implemented by the due date of 1 July 1995, they would have enjoyed the additional protection conferred by extended copyright.

I am sure that all the organisations concerned will be pleased by the Minister's assertion that the change of date will not change the legal position. However, I should be grateful if he could explain precisely why 1 January was chosen rather than 31 December. In giving that explanation, the Minister would be able to reassure those affected by the regulations that his and his advisers' understanding of the position is correct.

There has been some concern that certain United Kingdom works—previously in the public domain, but now returning to copyright protection under the regulations—will qualify under United States legislation for the restoration of copyright protection, in the USA, to certain foreign works that had lost it for largely technical reasons. One of the principal, qualifying factors affecting that restoration is that the work in question must be in copyright in its home state on 1 January 1996. I hope that the Minister can reassure the British Copyright Council and all those whom it represents on that point.

On the essential question of duration, the importance of harmonising the laws across the European Union is clear. The Minister has made the case very well. However, it is equally important that that issue is considered in the context not simply of European law, but across the world. Now that we have achieved a degree of standardisation in the European Union, can the Minister explain what efforts the European Union will make to ensure that its new, longer period of duration is consistent with the law of copyright elsewhere in the world? Clearly, it is not sufficient simply to ensure that there is standardisation in the European Union when countries such as the United States may be heading in a different direction on duration.

Article 6 establishes that the duration of copyright in a sound recording remains unchanged at 50 years. I am worried that some difficulties may arise—from the difference between 50 and 70 years—that will affect sound recordings used in films. Copyright in films is an especially difficult subject, and the Minister touched upon it. Although many people talk rather glibly about film being a director's medium, directors are given only what are described as moral rights in a film under UK law, because of the way in which UK law has historically viewed rights in films.

The approach in this country is to grant copyright to the person undertaking arrangements for the making of the film. In practice, that has meant the producer or his production company. He makes a series of contractual relationships with writers, composers, directors and performers, with the result that the producer owns the film in a legal sense. Therefore, the common law solution to a series of distinct copyright problems in the complex business of making a film has been based on contractual arrangements agreed between the different parties. However, the person who bears the financial risk—the producer—is placed in receipt of the ultimate financial reward, and therefore the copyright protection.

That approach, as the Minister knows, is in stark contrast to the continental approach, because other legal systems subscribe to a different philosophical view. Those systems consider the rights of authors as central to the definition of who bears the risk and receives the benefit in the creation of a film. Copyright in a film, therefore, is held jointly by the artistic elements in the film, and copyright law recognises the artistic contribution of a number of collaborators.

Most importantly, the directors benefit from that approach in continental law in negotiations with producers over contracts, for example in the assignment of rights and the length of time for which they are hired to make the film. The directors are in a much stronger position, and that inevitably means that those rights are reflected in the price paid for their services.

The European directive on duration provides that the principal director of a cinematographic or audio-visual work shall be considered as its author or one of its authors. Member states shall be free to designate other co-authors. As I understand it, it would be necessary to amend section 9 of the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988 to implement that proposal in the United Kingdom. Unless I missed it, the regulations do not appear to do that, so notwithstanding the idea that the directive seeks to harmonise European law, it will simply create the considerable legal discrepancy that I have described. That is a significant problem with the regulations.

Under the directive, member states are free to designate further co-authors of films. Can the Minister tell us whether the United Kingdom intends to do that as well? It seems likely that other countries will designate as co-authors others such as writers, so surely that will multiply the differences in copyright law between different member states. The draft regulations touch upon that problem in the provision on the death of an author, which refers to the period of time after the death of named individuals who participate in the making of a film. If we are to establish a consistent principle across the European Union, it is important that we should act consistently on the rights of authors.

It is important to consider the implications of revived copyright. The change in the duration of copyright means that copyright will be revived for a number of different works currently in the public domain, and thus are no longer subject to copyright. I have seen various lists of the copyright holders who will benefit from that change—for example, those who hold the copyright on the work of James Joyce, John Buchan, Thomas Hardy and Rudyard Kipling. The list also includes Sir Edward Elgar and D. H. Lawrence, who once lived in what is now my constituency. All of the rights holders to those people's work will enjoy a benefit as a result of the implementation of the draft regulations. On a more serious note, the House should be aware that Adolf Hitler died on 30 April 1945, so any rights on "Mein Kampf" will be revived by the regulations.

Copyright protection will be restored to authors who died between 1925 and 1945. As the Minister said, the issue is who should benefit from the restoration of those rights. The Writers Guild of Great Britain has consistently argued, perhaps not surprisingly in the circumstances, that revived copyright should vest in the author's estate rather than with the last copyright owner where there has been an assignment.

In a sense, revived copyright is a windfall—perhaps unlooked for when negotiations on assignment were conducted. It might be possible that revived copyright was anticipated when an assignment contract was made, but it is difficult to accept that argument. It is therefore at least arguable that the beneficiary of the windfall should be an author's descendants, because it could not have been imagined at the time of assignment that an extra 20 years of rights would subsequently become available. The Department of Trade and Industry has obviously considered that issue, and I would be grateful if the Minister could tell us in more detail than he spelt out in his opening speech why it decided that the benefit should go to those to whom the rights had been assigned rather than the beneficiaries under any will.

The revival of copyright has important implications for British heritage. It has been stressed to me that, in particular, the copyright on many works by British composers who died between 1925 and 1945 will be revived. The list includes not only Elgar, but Delius and Holst. In most cases, their estates are charitable trusts whose royalty income is spent on stimulating musical activity and the continuing development of British cultural life. With the anticipated rise in disputes and references to the Copyright Tribunal, as set out in the regulations, such income is likely to be depleted. That might also mean that proportionate income is not available to support and encourage today's composers and performers. The use of revived copyright works or arrangements could, however, pay for any loss suffered by those charitable trusts as a result of such legal disputes and legal costs. The extra income made available by revived copyright could therefore benefit the United Kingdom's cultural community, but that would not be possible by simply transferring rights to assignees.

At this stage, it might not be appropriate to study in great detail the detailed provisions governing rights in respect of revived copyright. The Minister must bear in mind, however, that the particular timetable he has chosen, which does not allow the House the time that it might normally expect to consider such regulations, means that we have not had an opportunity to table amendments—assuming the regulations to be substantive legislation—or to encourage the Minister to think again about certain aspects of the draft regulations.

The statutory licence regime has been subject to as much criticism as any of the other proposals contained in the regulations. That regime will reduce copyright in the circumstances anticipated to the right to remuneration as set by the tribunal, if not agreed upon. That is the cause of some concern because that regime appears to place the United Kingdom in a different position from Germany, for example, which offers a guaranteed right for the full 70-year period. I would be grateful if the Minister could provide us with more detail about the statutory licence regime, because the regulations revive a system that previous copyright legislation had abolished.

As I understand it, the regulations originally included a proposal that would have preserved the ability of composers and performers to object to recordings of their work and to prevent their performance. The Government had given a formal undertaking that that right to object would be retained, but it does not appear in the regulations. The compulsory copyright licence system means that as long as a royalty is paid, the composer or performer of the original work will no longer be able to object to its further use. That is a matter of concern and it is unfortunate that the Government appear to have changed their mind in that respect. I am grateful that the Minister said that, in time, article 4 will be considered, and I hope that he will be able to tell us when that will happen.

We can expect to consider a number of items of legislation concerning the implementation of the European Union directive on copyright. It was always assumed that the directive would be implemented along with the rental and related rights directive. If the Minister and his Department have experienced difficulties with the relatively modest copyright directive, I anticipate that they will have still more difficulties with the rental and related rights directive. Can the Minister explain why those directives have been separated, and when we can expect the introduction of the rights and rental directive? Can he tell us whether, on that occasion, the House will have more time to consider its implications rather than the eight working days that we have been given to look at the copyright directive?

I am grateful to the Minister for his remarks, and I hope that the House accepts that, while a series of detailed criticisms can be made of the draft regulations, in general the proposal to extend the period of copyright to 70 years from the 50 years that have been standard in this country for many years, is appropriate. On that basis, Labour will not vote against the draft regulations.

5.59 pm

Mrs. Edwina Currie (South Derbyshire): I declare a financial interest in the subject. Indeed, I am glad to say, it is a very substantial financial interest, as I have an income from writing, broadcasting and audio tapes. I should also put on record my thanks to the Minister for the fairness and courtesy with which he has dealt with this fiendishly complicated issue and the regulations which stem from it. I am particularly grateful to my hon. Friend for the way in which he met a delegation from the Writers Guild and others, which I organised on 18 July. All concerned were grateful to him, because he listened carefully to what they had to say.

Everyone I have spoken to on this matter is pleased to see the regulations, and nobody wants to delay them. I am glad to see that they are in print, and I have been asked to express appreciation to the Minister for his efforts. The matter has taken a little longer than we would have liked. Nevertheless, no one wants to delay it any longer.

Copyright is too often seen as an unreasonable cost or as a restraint on trade—in much the same way as product licensing and patents in, for example, the pharmaceutical industry and elsewhere. Legislation is frequently written from the producers' point of view, and that tends to be particularly true in the EU. In this case, the producer would be the publishers, and the publishing houses also have their views on the matter.

If there were no copyright, or if it were to be seriously damaged, it would be the creators who would be disadvantaged—the writers, photographers and scriptwriters. It is our duty to protect these people and their interests, and not necessarily always those with the hefty contracts, such as one or two Members of this House and of the other place. We must protect the small earners who earn their living by doing such work. It is important that this House endeavours to protect those people.

A large number of points were made by the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon), but I wish to mention three main points. Some matters have been raised by the British Copyright Council, and I have passed those to the Minister. These are supported by the Writers Guild, and also by A. P. Watt, the oldest literary agents in the world, who happen to be my agents as well.

The three issues are: the date of implementation; what is meant by "arrangement"; and the missing six months from 1 July to 31 December 1995. On the first issue, the question of the date is very important. I heard what the Minister said, and I appreciate his assurances. Nevertheless, there is no good reason why 31 December should not have been chosen. .

If the date were 31 December, rather than 1 January 1996, there would be two benefits. First, any author who died in 1945—the hon. Member for Ashfield mentioned several such authors—would have the benefit of extended rather than revived copyright. Another reason—which is probably more important to living writers—is that the United States is restoring copyright in certain works which have fallen into the public domain in America under what is called "Restoration of Certain Berne and WTO works". This applies as from 1 January 1996 to works which are in copyright in the country of origin at that date, and some doubts have been raised as to whether there would be continuous copyright for works in which copyright has been revived on that very date.

I can well understand that the Department of Trade and Industry thinks that there will be no problems, but the fact is that certain lawyers who are active in this area and certain literary agents disagree strongly. The point has been made by my agent—why take the risk? Why chose a date which causes problems and concerns? If it is possible to get the date changed, that would be worth doing. I hope that when future directives and regulations on this issue are considered, we will get the date right. I dread to think what the costs could be for the Department of Trade and Industry if it gets the date wrong. Authors who lose a lot of money in the United States might decide to hold the Minister responsible.

The second issue concerns arrangements versus agreement. Under regulation 23, it will be permissible to continue to make use of works which are no longer in the public domain provided the were made before 1 January 1995. The previous draft of this statutory instrument referred specifically to the need for the existence of "an agreement" in those circumstances.

> "arrangements for the exploitation of the work in question"

The point is strongly made on this matter again by A. P. Watt. Linda Shaughnessy, the rights director of the agency, says:

> "It would be wonderful if somehow 'arrangements' can be clarified, especially for Clause 23(3) which relates to derivative works (someone making a film, for example, or quoting from a revived work in a biography of an author)."

That happens very frequently.

> "At the moment they are only defined as 'arrangements for the exploitation of the work', which is open to wide interpretation. A plan to do something with a work but where no money (or an insubstantial amount) has been expended should not count as an arrangement. Nor should a speculative venture where for example someone has spent time producing a screenplay without any commission."

This sometimes happens without any permission, either.

> "However, if a signed contract was in place by 1 July 1995—to write a screenplay, for example, or to write a biography—then to produce the film or quote from the work of the revived author in the biography should not be an infringement. If a substantial amount of money had been expended—perhaps expressed as a substantial amount of the total monies for that project—that might also count as an arrangement. Anyone claiming arrangements to have been made should be prepared fully to disclose documentation proving this."

The opportunities for litigation in such cases are legion, and it is important that this matter should be cleared up. The previous wording seemed to be acceptable to all concerned, while the current wording seems to raise doubts.

The third issue is the question of the lost six months, which is regarded as an omission in the statutory instrument. Copies of a revived work which were printed before 1 July 1995 are not considered an infringement, but copies printed after the commencement date may be published as part of the statutory licence. What happens to works printed on or after 1 July 1995 but before the commencement date?

A sensible interpretation would be to say that copies sold before the commencement date would not be an infringement, but copies sold after would be considered as licensed by right and subject to the reasonable royalty, provided notice has been given to the copyright owner of the revived material. This, however, is probably something that the Association of Authors' Agents and the Publishers Association could decide amicably themselves. It may well be that the Minister wants to express his view on this matter, and he should certainly be aware that the lost six months could cause difficulties.

That is all that I want to say, except to reiterate my gratitude to the Minister for the careful and delicate way in which he has stepped through this extraordinary minefield.

I wish him well for all of the material which has yet to come on the issue.

6.7 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I do not claim the literary skills of the hon. Member for South Derbyshire, (Mrs. Currie), nor the legal skills of my hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon). Therefore, for both those reasons, I can be briefer than usual. I wish to raise a few points that have been put to me by the British Copyright Council, as advised by lawyers, and the British Photographers Liaison Committee.

I have no interest to declare, except that I am an enthusiastic amateur photographer who, with more pictures in the House of Commons photographic club exhibition than the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Sir J. Wiggin), can claim greater expertise in this area. The implications of what the Minister said about the day that the regulations are to come into force were not clear. The problem is that the date affects works whose copyright protection expires under the present law on 31 December 1995. What exactly is the Minister telling us? The copyright of such works will presumably be extended, rather than revived. Am I correct in saying that?

Mr. Ian Taylor indicated assent.

Mr. Mitchell: The Minister nods.

Mr. Taylor: As several colleagues have raised the point, I shall read out exactly what my legal brief says. I do not apologise for reading a legal brief because, ultimately, it is the lawyers who will have a field day with the regulations. The brief says:

> "The increased copyright terms set by the Regulations will apply on 1 January 1996, that is on commencement to 'existing copyright works', that is to works in which copyright subsisted immediately before that date. Time is a continuum, and therefore there is no break between the point immediately before commencement and commencement itself. Consequently, I am able to reassure the House that the Regulations will maintain in existence, on and after 1 January 1996, those copyrights which subsisted on 31 December 1995 but would otherwise have expired at the end of that day. These copyrights will be thereby extended, and revival is not relevant to them."

Mr. Mitchell: I am grateful for that intervention although the Minister baffled me as much as Einstein's theory of relativity, on which he seemed to touch at times. The point is important because the rights of revived copyright owners are much weaker than those of extended copyright owners. The provision affects only a comparatively small number of people. Let us consider the author of a work or a photographer whose work was written or whose photographs were taken in 1945 and who died in 1945. My point is important for such cases.

If the United Kingdom had, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield pointed out, complied with its obligation to implement the provisions by 1 July 1995, which we should have done, the problem would not have arisen. The people whom I mentioned would have been protected and the copyright would have been extended rather than revived. That point is important to a small number of people.

A further point is that the owner of a revived copyright will normally be the person who owned the copyright before it expired. In the case of photographers, the owner of the copyright could be a company. As defined under the Copyright Act 1911, the owner was the person who owned the photographs at the time the photograph was taken—in other words, the person who effectively employed the photographer. If the owner was a company that has ceased to exist, the problem is who owns the revived copyright.

That problem does not arise with film because the regulations give the revived copyright in those circumstances to the principal director or his personal representative. Why could the copyright for photographs not be given to the photographer and his or her personal representatives? All that would be required would be an amendment to paragraph 10 of schedule 1 to the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988 to make the question of who was the author of a photograph determinable for copyright purposes. There is a difference between the treatment of photographers and the treatment of the directors of films. Perhaps the Minister will explain whether there is protection for photographers who were employed when they took the photograph by a company that has ceased to exist. Provisions of the directive remain to be implemented. The directive requires the principal director of a film to be named as the author or co-author. Why has that provision not been implemented for photographers? What will happen to that provision?

Although providing for the copyright period for films to be calculated in accordance with the directive, the regulations are silent on the relationship between that and the current law, which provides for the copyright of a film to belong to the producer. The producer is not mentioned in the list of persons in regulation 6. Again, that point is relevant to photographers.

The directive requires the introduction of a 25-year term of protection for previously unpublished works that were first communicated to the public after the expiry of copyright. Clearly, that will be a source of controversy, as it was in the consultation period. Why has nothing been done about that?

The British Copyright Council has made the point, which I must put to the Minister, that the rental and lending directive and the cable and satellite directive have not yet been implemented. As those directives are relevant to the regulations, it would be useful to know what the Government's timetable is for those regulations, which are now 18 months overdue.

I am grateful for the opportunity to put those points, which are made in a spirit of questioning so that the Minister can give further explanation about the regulations, rather than in a spirit of hostility. My hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield said that he supported the regulations. I always defer to what my Front-Bench colleagues say in all matters and especially when there is a speaker who is as articulate as my hon. Friend. I support the regulations, but I believe that my questions need to be answered.

Sir Jerry Wiggin (Weston-super-Mare): I immediately acknowledge that, as the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) said, I am chairman of the all-party photographic group. I am also a member of the council of the Royal Photographic Society of Great Britain and I submit a number of my photographs to an agency in the hope that one day, somebody will buy one. I am remunerated for none of those interests, so they are not declared, but I feel that these days, I should mention them before proceeding.

Both my foxes have been shot. My hon. Friend the Minister made a clear declaration that the difference between revived and extended copyright would not be affected by the date of implementation. However, we heard a fairly sorry story of the progress of consultation on the directive from the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon). I am conscious of the difficulties of consulting and I believe that one of the problems when one consults a large number of people is that if one does not take their advice, they naturally feel affronted and feel that they would like a second bite at the cherry. That is especially true of photographers; I am speaking primarily with an interest in photography. They feel that their views were ignored while the film industry was dealt with graciously, as were, to a large extent, the authors.

After I made an intervention in my hon. Friend the Minister's speech, he got on to the extremely delicate point of whether photography is art. If we got into that debate tonight, the HMSO debate would go on to the early hours of tomorrow morning. I will not follow my hon. Friend down that line, but I ask him to take on board the fact that many people earn their living from taking and selling photographs, sometimes for many years, and depend on copyright laws and protection not only for their livelihood, but for their pension and for their families' wealth in the future. It is, therefore, extremely important that the photographic side of the matter is got right, especially in a day and age when more and more images are being demanded by CD-ROM, by television and by all the other agencies of moving images. This matter will become more important, not less.

My second fox was shot to some extent by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby, who has read the same brief as I have; I shall not repeat word for word what he said. However, when dealing with corporate authors, will my hon. Friend the Minister answer the question why the director of a film should be able to pass on the rights in copyright, whereas a photographer who has worked for a company that has ceased to exist does not have a similar right? I have put the question simply although I know that none of those matters is simple.

I should say to my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mrs. Currie) that this is a serious matter. If she believes that if the Government have got it wrong, a united band of authors will be able to seek restitution in the courts, I must disabuse her of the idea. If the regulations go through—and they will, I suspect, because, in general terms, we do not want to throw out the baby with the bathwater—they will become law. The law of the land will be interpreted by the courts. It will be no good saying that we have got the date wrong; her author friends will have had it.

Mrs. Currie: People like me have the opportunity of a perfect revenge, because if the Minister gets it badly wrong, I can put him into one of my future novels.

Sir Jerry Wiggin: Having read my hon. Friend's novel, I think that it would depend upon which part of the novel he was put into. He might become famous. My hon. Friend once attributed the start of her career as an author to my interest in her affairs. I am glad to hear that she is doing so well out of it because I am not making any money out of photography.

This is an important matter to many people. I hope that lessons will be learned from the way in which the Government have treated the directive. The questions asked by the hon. Member for Ashfield about the sections that will be attached to it are equally important. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will take careful note of that, because so many livelihoods depend on the matter.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): I must begin by declaring that, as an occasional author, I might have some interest in this matter. Candidly, I am not entirely sure what the effect of the order will be as I have come late to the subject and am not an expert.

I echo what was said by the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) about the way in which the matter has been handled. It is extraordinary to have nearly two years of consultation with as many as 200 people and organisations and then to leave the House of Commons so little time to consider it on a take-it-or-leave-it basis. That is not a rational way in which to legislate.

This is a complex area of law which could clearly have a widespread impact. The debate illustrates some of the general points about how not to amend the law of the land that were made last week in a debate, which I initiated, on the legislative process. Unfortunately, we cannot go through the regulations one by one, deleting those that are unacceptable and accepting those that have not raised adverse comment. That is pretty close to disgraceful.

The fact that copyright is an arcane subject that interests directly only a relatively small number of hon. Members is no excuse for legislating in this fashion. If the Minister had been able to say that, following the consultations, a broad consensus had been reached and that the difficulties had been ironed out, we would perhaps have been able to nod the measure through with a greater sense that we were not being derelict in our duty. Alas, there is clearly discontent and dissatisfaction. Although the hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mrs. Currie) is doubtless right that people want the law to be amended in broadly the direction of the directive, the uncertainties have given rise to criticism.

I have been asked to draw attention to the concerns of the Composers Estates Group and the Alliance of Composer Organisations. They fear that hardship will be caused, especially to the original authors and their heirs, by the proposed extension of the 20-year period of copyright. As I understand it, under the proposed regulations, ownership of the extra 20-year period would belong to whoever owned it immediately before the implementation date, 1 July 1995 or, in the case of revived works, the owner immediately before the copyright expired. In many cases, that would be the publisher, rather than the creator, of the work.

In the case of extended copyright, the creator's heirs will remain bound by what are in some cases out-of-date publishing agreements, often made several decades ago. The draft regulations do not allow them to be renegotiated or updated. In the case of revived copyrights, there is no obligation whatsoever on the publisher to pay royalties or to abide by any pre-existing contract.

The original European directive, which was published on 29 October 1993, was specific about the exploitation of works which were in the public domain under the old regulations but which became copyright under the new ones. It was intended that of a work when it was in the public domain should not have to make royalty payments when the copyright in such work was revived. It is clear that that was not intended to apply to those who exploited works in bad faith.

"persons who undertook in good faith the exploitation"

The regulations ignore the reference to "good faith" and extend the immunity from paying royalties to anyone who is

"in pursuance of arrangements made before 1st January 1995"

according to draft regulation 23.

I have been informed by a lawyer who represents the Composers Estates Group that, "in pursuance of arrangements" is not a legal term of art and has no real meaning. It is sufficiently vague to have allowed anyone who exploited a copyright work after the publication of directive and before 1 January 1995—a period of 14 months—to go without paying a single penny in royalties. Such a lack of clarity is a loophole ready and waiting to be used by the unscrupulous to avoid paying royalties. Activities such as stockpiling may have been legally possible with no point of redress for the copyright owner and the potential loss of huge royalties. In this case, ignorance is a defence.

Dispensation from royalties should be granted solely to activities relating to revived works which were carried out before publication of the directive. Anyone exploiting, or arranging to exploit, a revived copyright work after the publication of the directive ought to be legally bound to have known that copyright was to be revived and that, therefore, royalties should be paid.

Draft regulation 24 states that the exploitation of revived copyright is to be subject to a compulsory licence. In practice, that seems to mean that someone who wishes to exploit a revived copyright needs only to give notice to the copyright owner of his intentions and he is then automatically licensed. He is required to agree with the copyright owner the payment of a reasonable royalty, but that does not have to be agreed in advance of the copyright being exploited. Draft regulation 24(4) states:

> "If he does give such notice, his acts shall be treated as licensed and a reasonable royalty or other remuneration shall be payable in respect of them despite the fact that its amount is not agreed or determined until later."

If the exploiter and the copyright owner cannot come to an agreement, the case has to go to the Copyright Tribunal. That can be cumbersome, time consuming and expensive. While that process is going on, the exploiter can enjoy the legal right provided by the regulations and the copyright owner is in no legal position to stop him. In essence, that means that the copyright owner no longer has an exclusive right to his property and is unable to refuse an application to exploit it, even if he considers the use inappropriate for whatever reason or if no agreement has been reached on the amount of royalties payable.

The Composers Estates Group has asserted that the United Kingdom will be the only member state with compulsory licensing. In other words, this is not an obligation that has been imposed on us by European law or for other such reasons. It is worth bearing in mind the faith that compulsory licensing was abolished in this country by the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988.

I am also informed that someone may exploit a copyright in this country by informing the copyright owner under the compulsory licence rules. People are legally entitled to do so even if the copyright owner has not agreed to its exploitation, but that would be illegal in another member state, so someone trying to export a product that exploits copyright in that way could, theoretically, have the export blocked by another member state, which would directly contravene the treaty of Rome.

Those are serious objections to the regulations. If it were left to me to decide these matters, I would oppose them. I have no opportunity to move amendments to deal with those complaints, and the House has expressed a consensus that the greater good lies in not opposing the regulations. I am not even in a position to make that evaluation satisfactorily. Moreover, I recognise that strength of numbers is not likely to be with me on this occasion, which is not an entirely unfamiliar experience. I therefore reluctantly acquiesce on this matter, which is an example of how not to legislate.

6.30 pm

Mr. Ian Taylor: As I suspected, this has been a technical debate about what I admitted in my opening remarks are complicated regulations.

I reassure the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) that, although the consultation period threw up one or two positions that were difficult to reconcile, by and large the responses from the many groups that have lobbied me over the past year have shown a broad consensus in favour of the regulations. Points of detail will always have to be worked out and some issues will have to be tested by the courts.

We were not happy with some points because this measure was effectively achieved by qualified majority voting in the European Union. It was agreed that a timetable would be harmonised, but no detailed instructions were issued in the draft directive on how some measures needed to be carried out. Differences will therefore occur between member states, as have occurred in several different areas in this category.

Mr. Hoon: Is the Minister suggesting that, where measures are enacted by qualified majority voting, that justifies a member state enacting different legislation from that enacted in other member states?

Mr. Taylor: With great respect to the hon. Gentleman, who is normally a great expert on such matters, that is not what I meant at all. I meant that, when a measure is agreed by qualified majority voting, one must take an element of rough with the smooth because we considered the overall purpose to be beneficial to this country, particularly in the area of sound broadcasting. Furthermore, the directive is not so intrusive that it goes into every area on which every member country must regulate. In those circumstances, different member countries have gone down a slightly different route in applying the regulations.

I admit that we are late in applying the regulations—I apologise to the House for that—but we are not at the tail of the pack. Other countries are still wrestling with the problems and are having difficulties, as we had attempting to put the directive into proper UK regulations. It is my job not to second-guess other countries but to try to lay a comprehensive group of regulations before the House, which is what I have attempted to do.

I would test the patience of the House if I went through in detail all the questions that have been asked of me, but I shall attempt to deal with some of them. The hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) and my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mrs. Currie) asked about United States law. We cannot definitively interpret US law, but we understand that the restoration of copyrights provided for by US legislation to implement the trade-related aspects of the intellectual property rights agreement under the general agreement on tariffs and trade depends on eligible works being protected in their source country on 1 January 1996. We believe that our legislation will be in force on that date and UK copyright owners should be able to obtain any restorations of copyright in the US to which they are entitled. I have asked our team to be certain about that, and I am assured that it is.

Other aspects of the directive, such as article 4, need to be implemented and we shall return to that as soon as possible in the new year.

The hon. Member for Ashfield asked about ownership of revived rights. That is inevitably a complex area and a decision had to be made. Authors will benefit from the increased term in the case of future works by virtue of being the first copyright owners. We had to identify exactly who, in all simplicity, should receive revived rights and we decided that it should be the last owner of those rights.

[Mr. Taylor]

I was asked about musicians' estates. By any reading of the regulations, if an original composer or author does not benefit, it is because at some stage they or their estate transacted those rights to someone else. They are not being denied their rights; we have gone for simplicity and determined that that is the way to proceed. Those who will benefit from the revived rights should be the last owners.

Mr. Hoon: Is the Minister entirely happy that the revived rights payment system is consistent with legislation enacted elsewhere in the European Union and, moreover, with the general principle applied in Germany, for example, where exclusive rights are guaranteed for a 70-year period? After all, that period was chosen because Germany gave greater rights than other countries in the European Union. The system for revived rights set out in the regulations does not give copyright holders exclusive rights for 70 years but simply provides a system of remuneration, subject ultimately to the Copyright Tribunal, for an extended period of 20 years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. That is a long intervention. It is more like a second speech. I call Mr. Ian Taylor.

Mr. Taylor: I was beginning to worry about that myself, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I cannot second-guess the German position. As the hon. Gentleman said, there is no such thing as revived rights in that context in Germany because of the 70-year period. The Copyright Tribunal must tackle certain questions. The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland remarked on the tribunal. Although it may not be perfect, it is a tried and tested way of proceeding. It is not for the Government to second-guess what a reasonable payment might be in those circumstances. It would be extremely dangerous for us to go on to that ground, which is why the tribunal pronounces on such matters.

We have never proposed a right to object to the use of a work. Our consultative document included a licence of right, as do the regulations that have been laid before Parliament. If my memory serves me right, that assumption applies to any arrangement entered into before 1 January 1995.

The issue of film authorship has been raised more than once. We are deferring the implementation of that provision until 1 January 1997. We intend to introduce the change when the so-called "rental" directive is implemented, which we aim to do in the near future. We also intend that the producer of a film will remain one of its authors in the United Kingdom. We do not intend to go further, and the directive does not oblige us to do so. The Commission did not say that total harmonisation of film authorship should be achieved between member states, and the directive does not proscribe that.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire asked about arrangements for timing. Regulation 23(2)(a) provides for acts done in pursuance of arrangements made before 1 January 1995 to be carried out without infringing revived copyright. We believe that it is only right that people who have made arrangements before that date should be allowed to carry out acts consequent on them without liability to ownership of revived rights.

A wide variety of circumstances may occur and the wording of the regulations must, of necessity, be fairly general. We do not consider it possible to define precisely the kinds of acts that will be permitted. When a dispute occurs, it will be for the courts to determine whether what has been done is genuinely in pursuance of the arrangements made before the specified date. The terminology concerned has been used in copyright legislation before—in transitional provisions in the 1988 Act, for example.

If necessary, my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire might read section 57(1), section 180(3) and schedule 1(6) of the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988. I say that because I know that lawyers will involve themselves in that matter anyway, and they might as well do so now.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) and my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Sir J. Wiggin) mentioned the vexed question of photographers. In no way was I attempting, nor shall I now attempt in any sense, to become involved in the difficulties of trying to define photography. It is both a profession and an art form and the two co-exist happily, but that is not the question.

The question is whether a photographer is an author in relation to the regulations. I am assured that, in that context, author does mean author as defined in section 9(1) of the 1988 Act, and that that includes photographers. I hope that the photographers in question are happy with that.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Photography is, of course, an art form as practised by myself and the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare, but it is also—which is more important—a living. The question therefore arises, what happens when the owner of the copyright is a company that has gone bust? Why does not the copyright revert to the photographer or his legatees or whatever, in the same way as it does for the director of a film?

Mr. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman asks a question that I am unable to answer because I am unable to second-guess the legal position. Presumably there are circumstances in which such a right might revert to the previous owner, such as when the contract made to pass on the right to the company that went bust has fallen into desuetude. In those circumstances, it will be a question for the courts to test. I must stick to that position otherwise I should be making up law on the Floor of the House, which is a dangerous thing to do.

In my opinion, the main questions that have been asked show how difficult the regulations are. Far from wasting time, we have used our time constructively to obtain a wide range of reactions from various groups.

I admit that, in the end, Ministers and Departments must make a decision. We have made a decision, and we have laid the regulations before the House. I am delighted that the matter was chosen for debate on the Floor of the House.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire for her encouragement and for the compliments that she paid on behalf of the Writers' Guild of Great Britain, of which she is an esteemed and honourable member—[Interruption.] Well, she is not a member, but she is a writer. I am slightly concerned that, as a result of the debate, I am to feature in some position or other in her next novel. Before I get myself into further difficulty, I shall commend the regulations to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Duration of Copyright and Rights in Performances Regulations 1995, which were laid before this House on 20th November, be approved.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): With permission, I shall put together the motions relating to delegated legislation.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

RATING AND VALUATION

That the draft Non-Domestic Rating (Chargeable Amounts) (Amendment No. 3) Regulations 1995, which were laid before this House on 30th November, be approved.

TAXES

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Double Taxation Relief (Taxes on Estates of Deceased Persons and Inheritances and on Gifts) (Netherlands) Order 1995 be made in the form of the draft laid before this House on 16th October, in the last Session of Parliament.—[Mr. Freeman.]

Question agreed to.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 102(9) (European Standing Committees),

INTEGRATED POLLUTION PREVENTION AND CONTROL

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 9491/93 and 7511/95, and of the unnumbered Explanatory Memorandum submitted by the Department of the Environment on 2nd June 1995, relating to integrated pollution prevention and control; welcomes the Common Position achieved on this proposal on 22nd June; regrets the inclusion of certain activities in the Directive's scope, such as intensive livestock farming, food production and some industrial sectors, which do not readily lend themselves to this integrated approach; but congratulates the Government on the Common Position as a whole, which will secure the application in Europe of an innovative British approach to pollution control.—[Mr. Freeman.]

Question agreed to.

HMSO

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Freeman.]

6.43 pm

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Roger Freeman): Anyone with a working knowledge of the House or of any Department of Government, will know that Her Majesty's Stationery Office has a long and illustrious history. It is one of the oldest Government Departments remaining in existence.

In 1786, a Treasury official called John Mayor suggested that the Government might make substantial savings if they bought all their paper and stationery through a central source. As a result, Her Majesty's Stationery Office was established as a small office fulfilling precisely that role. In all its activities since then, it has continued to honour that founding purpose by providing its customers with a cost-effective and high-quality service.

From such humble origins, HMSO gradually expanded into many other sectors, including printing and print buying, all aspects of publishing and supplying stationery, office equipment and furniture. In many of its activities, it came to represent a single, authoritative and trustworthy supplier to government and, in return, HMSO has been assigned many functions vital to effective government in this country.

For more than 100 years, HMSO has acted as printer to Parliament and, as hon. Members are of course aware, has also provided a service of the highest quality and efficiency, which is vital for the effective conduct of business in the House and the other place.

Much of HMSO's official printed output has, since 1882—

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way so early in his remarks, but while he is doing a historical survey of HMSO, and bearing in mind HMSO and Hansard's very strong connections with Norwich, will my right hon. Friend make crystal clear his commitment to future jobs in Norwich? Will he also express his determination that there will remain a very strong presence for HMSO in Norwich in future, as there has been in the past?

Mr. Freeman: I am well aware of my hon. Friend's attention to his constituency duties, and I am able to give the following assurances about employment prospects: first, that Ministers will continue to consult the trade union representatives of the work force; secondly, that I can confirm that there are no plans for compulsory redundancies at HMSO in Norwich or anywhere else in the period running up to the proposed sale of the business; and, thirdly, that the provisions of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 will apply. Incidentally, the provisions of TUPE are not time-limited. As far as a buyer is concerned—

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Clackmannan): I am grateful to the Minister for giving way at this early stage, but surely he is aware that, after 90 days, the requirements of TUPE are over and that there is no commitment on the part of an incoming employer to honour the undertakings laid down by his predecessor for any longer than that period.

[Mr. Martin O'Neill]

The Minister should check with his officials, because that is the position, and there is chapter and verse in industrial relations law at present to show that that is the case.

Mr. Freeman: The provisions of TUPE apply, obviously, at the point of transfer of an undertaking from one owner to the other, and the owner is bound by those provisions. If an owner seeks to change and negotiate changes in the terms and conditions that apply to the work force of the business, the usual procedures for negotiations apply.

Perhaps the House will permit me to complete my answer to the first intervention, I inadvertently gave way a second time during my answer to the first intervention.

Finally, as I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson) that, in searching for an acceptable purchaser of the business, we shall seek to select a company that wishes to, and has clear and acceptable plans to, expand the business of HMSO.

No Minister can give any assurances about the total level of employment or the nature of the operations of any public or private sector organisation in future, but I hope that my hon. Friend is satisfied with those four very clear assurances of our policy.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston): Further to the question to which the Minister has just responded, is it not the case that, the day after the change of ownership, the new employer can give contractual notice in respect of any term and condition of employment? Given that that is so, is the Minister therefore saying that he is guaranteeing, in the sale arrangements, a commitment that any future purchaser would have to give something stronger than the basic contractual requirements? Is he saying that a term of the sale will be something that guarantees that changes will not take place in contracts of employment?

Mr. Freeman: I would not use the word "guarantee". I said that, in seeking a purchaser for the business, we shall look for a company that wishes to expand the business, and therefore the job prospects. I did not say that we would either seek or expect guarantees from any company. If HMSO were to remain in the public sector, I could not guarantee what jobs would be retained. I have already forecast that if HMSO remains in the public sector, its business and its employment base will contract.

Mr. John Garrett (Norwich, South): Why?

Mr. Freeman: For the very simple reason that the business of government is reducing. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is aware that, in the past 10 years, the work force of HMSO has contracted very substantially; it has halved in the past decade. That contraction is primarily a function of the reduced volume of turnover available to HMSO within the public sector.

Since 1882, much of HMSO's official printed output has had the unique legal privilege of being conclusive evidence of the matter stated and it is frequently relied on in the courts. By the end of the decade, HMSO had assumed formal responsibility for overseeing legislative printing and the then controller of HMSO and his successors were appointed as Queen's or King's printer in pursuit of that function. From that time, the controller has also administered Crown copyright on behalf of the sovereign and, by agreement with the House and the other place, he also administers parliamentary copyright. In discharging those functions, HMSO has demonstrated and enhanced its reputation for diligence and reliability, which is now well known across the public sector and beyond.

The parliamentary and statutory publishing business accounts for about 10 per cent. of HMSO's total turnover. HMSO has always relied substantially on its original activities of supplying its customers with the essential requirements of administration—for example, printing services, office equipment and stationery. HMSO naturally brings to that work the same reputation for high quality and service. Since its founding days, it has been guided by the need to minimise the overall cost to the Government, and therefore to the taxpayer, while maintaining the standards that its customers have come to expect. That objective has guided the Government's policy of reforming HMSO in the past 15 years and it must clearly be paramount in any decisions taken about its future.

For the greater part of its history, HMSO's services were funded by means of an annual vote from Parliament. HMSO's supplies were, in accountancy terms, an allied service. Therefore, its customers did not have to draw on any of their voted funds to pay for the goods and services that they received. They effectively received them free. Although they benefited from HMSO's purchasing expertise and the savings that are inevitably made when buying in bulk, there was no incentive for them to look for a better deal elsewhere. Similarly, there was no pressure on HMSO to ensure that it offered the best deal.

As alternative suppliers became increasingly available for most HMSO services, it was clear that more could be done to ensure that the cost to the taxpayer was minimised. For those reasons, in 1980 HMSO became one of the first of the Government's trading funds. That meant that, for the first time, it had to cover all its costs through customer charges rather than through an annual vote of cash. In return, it gained considerable management freedom over operational and finance matters.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): Does my right hon. Friend concede that, from that point, the price of Hansard has increased to such an extent that people can no longer afford to buy it? That was a direct consequence of the Government's decision.

Mr. Freeman: That was correct at the time. However, I am delighted to inform the House that, as a result of negotiating a new service agreement and of HMSO's responsiveness, the price of Hansard is now falling. I hope that the price not only of Hansard but of other documents supplied to the House and to the other place will continue to fall. That is a function of greater efficiency at the stationery office—I congratulate the management and the staff—and of a tougher and more businesslike attitude on the part of the House and the other place regarding the supply of documents.

Sir Patrick Cormack: My right hon. Friend knows that I am very displeased with the general plans to privatise HMSO. Do not his comments illustrate the good sense of keeping the publication of parliamentary papers properly within the control of Parliament? Is it not impossible to guarantee that if the work goes to a wholly free-standing commercial operation?

Mr. Freeman: I agree with the first part of my hon. Friend's statement. Parliament must control the supply of those immensely important services; I do not dissent from that view. I believe that the House will have greater powers than it has at present through the negotiation and execution of a contract between it and the supplier of the services. The powers would be formalised. I do not believe that any successful purchaser of all the printing, publishing and other allied business of Her Majesty's Stationery Office, as it is now called, would seek to renege from, diminish or belittle the importance of the services that it provides to the House. The contract will be extremely important and I believe that Parliament will be able to control it better than at present.

I am aware of my hon. Friend's concerns in that regard. Although I believe that it would be commercially unattractive to separate the parliamentary from the Crown business, as my hon. Friend has pressed me on that point I shall certainly reflect further on the matter. It may be that, on reflection, I shall decide that some arrangements could be made, but I offer no immediate prospect of a satisfactory solution.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): The Minister said that Parliament could control the business better. What methods does he have in mind to ensure that?

Mr. Freeman: I explained to the House that, for the first time in the history of the relationship between Parliament and Her Majesty's Stationery Office, there is now a formal service agreement. That was signed last week and it will come into effect on 1 January. There is a similar agreement with the other place. It is envisaged that the authorities of the House will enter into a formal contract on behalf of the House with the supplier of those services, in the same manner as many other services to the House—which perhaps are not as significant, but which are subject to normal commercial contracts. I believe that the existence of a public document that specifies the nature and the quality of services, together with the price of those services, represents a better mechanism through which the House can control the supply of the services.

Mr. O'Neill: In the event that HMSO is unable or unwilling to comply with the undertakings into which it enters, what powers will the House have to excise any damages or compensation from the printer?

Mr. Freeman: It depends on the provisions of the contract. The House may wish to have the right to veto any change in ownership or to inscribe damages into the contract or it may wish to remove the business of printing Hansard from other printing and publishing business. That is the nature of a commercial contract.

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne): Is it correct that the contract could specify that any future change in the operations of the buyer should be subject to the requirements of Parliament? Although parliamentary business may constitute a relatively small proportion of the new operator's turnover, from a commercial point of view it would be under a great deal of pressure to maintain a good relationship with the House and the other place because any failure to fulfil its requirements could jeopardise the rest of its business.

Mr. Freeman: It must be right that the dozens of private sector companies that supply services to the House and the other place seek to retain their good name and maintain their business with the Palace of Westminster and both Houses of Parliament. I am sure that the same will apply a fortiori to the supply of printed documents.

Mr. Garrett: If HMSO breaks its contract, all we can do is sue it. Surely the Government should put those requirements into the tender document in the first place.

Mr. Freeman: I disagree with the hon. Gentleman. It is a matter for the House and not for the Government. [Interruption.] One may laugh, but, although I shall be responsible for the contracts placed by the Crown with the printer and publisher supplying documents, the precise contractual arrangements are a matter for the House. Speaking on behalf of the Crown, I would envisage that any contract for the supply of such important documents as White Papers, Green Papers and other statements of Government policy would include extremely tough contractual provisions.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Let me make it clear on behalf of the House of Commons Commission, first, that the service agreement that the Minister has described is entirely independent of the discussion about privatisation and comes into force on 1 January as a result of work already done. Secondly, on behalf of the House, the Commission would expect to reserve the right to make whatever arrangements seemed appropriate if there were any default on the contract by a private organisation that took over the duties of HMSO.

Mr. Freeman: I quite accept what the right hon. Gentleman said and I agree with him.

Shortly after 1980, customers—Government Departments—were freed for the first time from the requirement to deal with HMSO and were permitted to use any supplier that offered them the best deal. The results were dramatic. The commercial imperatives placed on HMSO meant that costs fell sharply after it attained trading fund status. That could only be good news for customers. Not only were they now free to shop around but they benefited from the savings passed on by HMSO as a result of its new-found commercial freedom.

That commercialisation also exposed HMSO to true competition for the first time and the private sector was quick to seize the opportunity. Central Government were and remain an attractive market for many of the services provided by HMSO, which soon had to compete with suppliers that were well used to the rigours of the marketplace and, more important, were not bound by the same public sector regulations as HMSO. In retrospect, the management and staff of HMSO rose to the challenge remarkably well and, despite that intense competition, HMSO remains the clear market leader in the supply of printing and stationery to central Government.

Ultimately, however, that competition will work against HMSO if it remains in the public sector. For instance, its governmental status means that it is still bound by restrictions on the prudent use of taxpayers' money, which ultimately accounts for nearly all its income. That rules out decisions that would carry only normal commercial risk in the private sector. It is unable to raise investment capital in ways open to private sector business or to diversify into new markets. Most important, it cannot trade with private sector customers when its own central Government market is in decline.

[Mr. Freeman]

In such an environment, HMSO would clearly struggle to maintain its position. Although it has generally continued to meet the financial targets that it has been set, its turnover has declined by some 10 per cent. since 1990. A continued cost-cutting programme has led to the reduction of staff numbers by some 600 over the same period. To allow matters to continue in the same vein would be a gross disservice to the management and staff at HMSO, whose efforts have built on the organisation's formidable reputation and who in recent years have found their futures in jeopardy through being unable to compete fairly with other suppliers.

At the same time, to return to the old way of a protected market into which customers were tied would deny those customers and the taxpayers the benefits that they have gained since 1980. It would also imply a wholly unjustifiable lack of confidence in the ability of the management and staff of HMSO to run a prosperous, competitive business.

As I announced in the House last week, we therefore plan to privatise HMSO by means of competitive tender offer. That will allow the business to compete on equal terms with the private sector for the first time. It will be able to trade into wider markets and to diversify and expand as business opportunities present themselves. It will be able to raise funds for investment through all the channels open to private business, rather than having to apply to the Treasury. All those improvements will allow its customers to benefit from further efficiency savings and, as nearly all of them are at present funded from taxation, that will also benefit the taxpayer. At the same time, working in a more secure and prosperous environment will naturally present its staff with a more secure future.

I am convinced that, without privatisation, the business will continue to decline and its staff will face continuing job losses.

Mr. Mark Robinson (Somerton and Frome): Is it not fair to say that HMSO is a centre of excellence that will attract a prospective purchaser and that, far from wanting to destroy the business, any prospective purchaser will want to keep the management team together and build on that business?

Mr. Freeman: I agree with my hon. Friend. I take a constructive attitude to the future of any business which has built its success, albeit in a declining public market, on not only its integrity but its hard work and its skill in obtaining business from Government and Parliament and discharging its function satisfactorily.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way again, but, as he is referring to the hard work and the skill of the staff of HMSO, many of whom live in Norwich and the surrounding area, will he respond to the particular point I made earlier about the importance of maintaining a strong base for HMSO in Norwich? That is traditionally so and I believe that it should continue. Can my right hon. Friend make a commitment to that?

Mr. Freeman: As I said to my hon. Friend earlier, I cannot make any forecast about how a business is organised into the future. However, having visited Norwich twice—I intend to do so again to discuss the future with management and representatives of the staff—it is clearly the sensible headquarters of the business and I know of no reason why there should be any change in that regard. I cannot forecast how the nature of the business of HMSO will change the individual loadings of specific factories or depots in future. Norwich is clearly the centre, and I see no good reason why that should change.

Sir Patrick Cormack: I am particularly grateful for the assurance that my right hon. Friend gave me earlier, but surely any internationally based company could buy HMSO and produce from wherever it wished to produce and that is the blunt fact. I would not begin to impugn my right hon. Friend's good intentions or integrity, for which I have the highest possible regard, but he cannot guarantee it.

Mr. Freeman: Like many hon. Members, I spent the majority of my life in business in the private sector, subject to the rigours of the private sector. One locates businesses where that makes the most economic and business sense. I pay tribute to the management of HMSO for doing that and reorganising the business. Of course I cannot give my hon. Friend any assurance about where and how the business will be organised in future. I cannot do that with HMSO in the public sector, let alone the private sector. For the business to expand, it must be given the opportunity to compete for private sector business which I believe is available, and that must load its existing factories, if they are efficiently organised and located, which is clearly the case. That will enhance job opportunities.

Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe (Bradford, South): I recognise that the Minister is accepting interventions; but, to pick up the point made by the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack), the right hon. Gentleman cannot give guarantees, yet he has tried to do so in letters to Madam Speaker and to the work force of HMSO. The Minister has also accredited and applauded the workers and management of HMSO. Does he expect a management buy-out?

Mr. Freeman: No. There is no sign of any interest on the part of the management and staff, I suspect partly because of the size of the operation. It is a significant industrial operation and one would not normally expect a management buy-out. To return to the first part of the hon. Gentleman's intervention, I cannot give guarantees about the size of the work force of HMSO in the public sector and nor can the right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster), who leads for the Opposition and to whom I give way.

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): May I press the right hon. Gentleman on his statement that the public sector market is in decline? He says that the central Government market is in decline, and that may well be the case for the time being; but the public sector market is far wider than the central Government market, and the right hon. Gentleman has not yet been able to privatise the entire public sector.

Does the right hon. Gentleman take account of the fact that we now talk in terms of the public sector's being the whole European market? As I understand it, HMSO has done little in the way of marketing throughout Europe. Will the right hon. Gentleman bear that in mind when he makes statements in the future?

Mr. Freeman: The right hon. Gentleman is right. The public market, as broadly defined, is enormous. However, private sector companies could bid, for example, to print the journals and other documents of the European Parliament and the European Commission; bidding is not restricted to HMSO. I should like HMSO in the private sector to compete vigorously for that business. As a matter of policy, I do not want a public sector body, funded and ultimately guaranteed by the taxpayer, to compete for business outwith the United Kingdom public sector when other companies can compete with that business. I am confident that, given its reputation and expertise, HMSO will be able to expand its business into the European public sector when it is privatised.

Mr. Peter Mandelson (Hartlepool): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way again. He has been very patient.

May I pursue the point that the right hon. Gentleman made to the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack)? He said that he could give no assurances about the location of production in the future. I wonder how that squares with his response to questions from hon. Members on 13 December, when he said:

> "We, as the customers—that is to say, the Crown and Parliament—can require the business to have a certain nature and structure . . . Parliament will be able to control the nature of the business that supplies the products."—[Official Report, 13 December 1995; Vol. 268, c. 993.]

Is the right hon. Gentleman not flatly contradicting what he said only last week?

Mr. Freeman: I was referring to HMSO's entire business. Parliamentary business represents 10 per cent. of the total. When I was questioned about the parliamentary press, I said that the contract written by Parliament could stipulate that the work must be done at the parliamentary press works—which is, in fact, a misnomer: the press prints more than just documents for the two Houses of Parliament, but that is not inconsistent with—

Mr. Mandelson: That refers to the location.

Mr. Freeman: Yes, but I was making the point specifically in regard to the parliamentary business and the parliamentary press. If the hon. Gentleman is asking, by implication, whether the Crown—that is, various Departments—would wish to stipulate when writing contracts that certain documents must be printed in certain cities, let me tell him that I do not consider that appropriate. We would look for a contract with the stationery office that offered good value for money in comparison with the alternatives; how that was organised would be a matter for the stationery office. There is one exception, however. If the hon. Gentleman does me justice and reads all the evidence that I gave to the Select Committee on Finance and Services, he will realise that I was dealing with that specific problem. Indeed, I provided even more assurances in response to the intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack).

Accordingly, I propose to invite offers in the new year for the whole business, apart from a small residual body to deal with necessary public responsibilities such as Crown copyright. I plan to make a written statement on Government policy for Crown copyright by early February. The sale process will allow full screening and evaluation of all bids and consultation with customers, principally Parliament. It should also allow for legally binding contracts to be drawn up between customers and the privatised business.

However, as I confirmed in my statement last week, I am not setting deadlines. There is a prerequisite that Parliament be satisfied—although I am also anxious for the uncertainty to last no longer than is absolutely necessary. It would make little commercial sense for us to withhold any of HMSO's operational businesses from the sale. Many of them are mutually dependent, and all benefit from the independence and integrity of HMSO, which I am keen to preserve after the sale. In particular, however, I note the suggestion of some hon. Members that the parliamentary press should not be sold, and could perhaps be taken over by the House. I have already responded to the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire.

Hon. Members have also previously suggested that HMSO should be freed from all its current public sector operating constraints yet be retained in the public sector. The right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland advanced that argument, and I am sure that he will do so again this evening. The commercial freedoms that HMSO would need to compete with the private sector in new markets are incompatible with its continuing in the public sector. The first commercial freedom is the right to borrow without the burdens of public sector constraints. No Government could countenance the prospect of a public sector body's having normal commercial freedoms to borrow.

The second commercial freedom is the right to win customers in any market, public or private. If HMSO as a public sector body were allowed such freedom, its competitors in the private sector would be bound to suspect unfair competition, especially if HMSO were able to borrow money cheaply because its activities were thought to be underwritten by the taxpayer. It is far better all around, for both HMSO and its competitors, for business to be transferred to the private sector, where it can compete on equal terms and can have freer access to the finance that will enable it to expand.

The only sensible course is clearly privatisation of the bulk of HMSO as it is currently constituted. During such a process, customers will naturally want the maximum assurance that after the sale they will continue to receive the high-quality and cost-effective service to which they have been accustomed. At the same time, potential purchasers will wish to make their own estimate of HMSO's future viability, and to be sure that it will enjoy a reasonably secure level of business after transfer to the private sector. We propose to accommodate both those needs through legally binding contracts between major customers and the privatised business, wherever it is sensible to do so, and for that to come into force at the point of sale.

Parliament is, of course, HMSO's key customer. The contracts will specify all the customer's requirements, standards of service and, if necessary, the means by which the service shall be delivered, as well as price. Customers' requirements will therefore be clearly specified and fully enforceable, ultimately by recourse to law. Agreeing the contracts with HMSO's customers is an onerous task, but I have every confidence that it can be achieved with the co-operation of those customers, whose interests the contracts will protect.

Sir Patrick Cormack: In answer to an earlier intervention, my right hon. Friend gave an assurance that he would reconsider the parliamentary aspect. Will he report to the House on that specific point before pursuing his commercial inquiries?

Mr. Freeman: I have already given an assurance. I must now end my speech, as time is short and others wish to speak, but I shall foreshadow a commitment that I intend to give in a moment. I shall publish the short list of potential buyers; Parliament will have its views on their acceptability.

The needs of Parliament are particularly important, and it is vital for them to be fully protected in the new contracts required by both Houses. I note that new supply and service agreements will shortly come into force between the House of Commons and the other place and HMSO; they will provide a sound basis for the contracts. The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) is right: they are wholly independent of and separate from the privatisation proposals, and have an entirely different genesis. I am confident that we can reach a position that fully protects Parliament's needs in the privatisation.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Does that mean that, when the bids come in, they will first be assessed to establish whether they pass certain quality thresholds, rather like television station franchises? Once those that do not pass those thresholds are eliminated, will those that qualify be considered?

Mr. Freeman: Not only would the Government wish to draw up a short list acceptable to Departments; Parliament will insist that, if it is to conclude a contract with the privately owned stationery office, the new owner of the business must be entirely acceptable.

Mr. Dalyell: The Minister has talked of binding legal contracts. Does he realise that the whole set-up in Scotland will have to be rather different? Can he make any statement about the discussions that have been held with the Scottish Office about the future of the 200 people working at South Gyle, 95 per cent. of whom voted against privatisation in a poll? So much for the consultation with the work force of which the Minister speaks.

Mr. Freeman: With respect, perhaps the work force were not entirely aware of the arguments and advantages of what is proposed, not only for the unit in Scotland but for others, in Wales and Northern Ireland. I can give the hon. Gentleman an assurance that the future of those units, and any others, will be made clear before any contract is negotiated and signed. They have been treated as an integral part of the printing and publishing operations of HMSO. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will have noted my earlier assurances about what is to be offered, that is, the whole.

In her letter of 28 November to the Leader of the House, Madam Speaker set out the safeguards that the House of Commons Commission considers necessary to enable the House to continue its agreement with HMSO after privatisation. It was published in the Official Report of 11 December. My reply on behalf of the Government was placed in the Library of the House on 14 December, and explains how those safeguards can be met, primarily through a legally enforceable contract. As well as meeting Parliament's requirements in that way, potential purchasers will have to honour recently negotiated improvements, such as reductions in the price of publications, and, I hope, negotiate further reductions.

I fully recognise that a change in ownership is a source of concern for staff. However, I am convinced that it is the best means of safeguarding their future by permitting an expansion of the business. I have already given an assurance that I shall consult the trade union representatives of the staff during the sale process. The staff and the trade unions will, of course, be kept as fully informed as possible by the management and privatisation team during the sale process. I can also give the House an assurance that the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 will apply to the sale of HMSO, and staff will transfer with their existing terms and conditions. That protection is important and applies, of course, in any transaction whether in the public or private sector. I expect the newly privatised business to be able to offer staff a more attractive future as the business prospers and grows.

In selecting a successful bidder from the short list, one of the factors that we will consider is the bidder's plans for the future growth of the business. Pension rights are protected by social security legislation. The new owner will be required to provide broadly comparable pension arrangements. I draw the attention of the House to the fact that the pension scheme is non-contributory. The Government Actuary will be asked to provide an independent analysis of comparability and to approve the new arrangements as offering broadly comparable benefits. In addition, the pension fund will be under the control of the board of trustees, in accordance with trust law.

We will exclude from the sale a small residual body charged with carrying out HMSO's statutory functions. That body will also be responsible for the administration of Crown copyright and could continue to administer parliamentary copyright if Parliament so wished. Retaining responsibility for copyright in the public sector will allow us to sustain and improve the accessible and affordable publication of government information.

I confirm that the Government will seek a buyer who will maintain the integrity of the present HMSO. In no circumstances will we offer the printing and publishing businesses separately. The buyer must, of course, be acceptable to Parliament. To that end, I intend to publish the short list of bidders in due course and to invite Parliament to be involved in the selection of the successful candidate to ensure that a satisfactory outcome is achieved for work for Parliament. I undertake to consult the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), the Leader of the Opposition, and business managers on how that should be accomplished. My dealings have so far been with Madam Speaker, acting on behalf of the House of Commons Commission, but further reflection may indicate another approach. That is the arrangement that has existed so far.

In addition to this debate, I have already made a statement to the House and given evidence to the Finance and Services Committee. I remain ready to outline the Government's plans further, in Select Committee or elsewhere.

I commend these plans to the House, in the best interests of HMSO, its customers, its staff, the taxpayer and Parliament.

7.23 pm

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): I thank the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster for arranging to have placed in the Library his reply to Madam Speaker's letter to the Leader of the House dated 28 November. I also thank the Chairman of the House of Commons Finance and Services Committee, who, at my request, published the minutes of evidence of his Committee's meeting of 21 November 1995, at which the Chancellor gave evidence about the privatisation of HMSO.

Both documents have only just been made available. I do not blame the Chancellor or the Chairman; they have done their best. The real culprits are the business managers who brought forward the debate from Wednesday to today. They have played into our hands. Because the debate is taking place when the House has not had the opportunity to absorb important new information, that strengthens the argument for another debate in the new year, when even more details will be available. Will the Chancellor and the Chairman of the Finance and Services Committee join me in urging the Leader of the House—I am glad to see him in his place; he has a deep interest in this issue as a member of the Commission—to respond positively to these requests?

The other day, I described the Chancellor of the Duchy as a decent man fallen among thieves. Perhaps I was unkind to thieves. I really do feel sorry for him, as he only just escaped responsibility for carrying through the privatisation of the railways—the poll tax on wheels, in the words of the late Robert Adlee when he was Chairman of the Transport Select Committee. It was out of the frying pan and into the fire. There he is in the Cabinet Office, privatising everything that moves or is stationery. [Interruption.] That was Matthew Parris; we should give credit where it is due. It is a grand clearance sale, or, more to the point, a closing down sale. Everything must go—unbelievable bargains. A thousand little-used Sir Humphreys are going cheap. Those are the actions of a defeated Government. They know that the voters cannot wait to take vengeance. They are scorching the earth in their humiliating defeat.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Did you write that, Derek?

Mr. Foster: Perhaps Matthew Parris wrote that, too.

Why are the Government doing that? Perhaps they need the money to start another party in the wife's name. Looking at today's public sector borrowing requirement figures, has the Chancellor of the Exchequer so screwed up the nation's finances that he has to sell off every candle end before the bailiff arrives?

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, in his statement, denies that the money is important. If it is not, perhaps this is an elaborate job creation scheme: not jobs for those who work in the agencies to be sold off, as they are likely to lose theirs, but rather jobs for the boys on the boards of privatised companies, for former Ministers, defeated Members of Parliament and defeated Tory candidates. The Chancellor looks a little hurt, as though Nolan had never been necessary.

Mr. Waterson: The hon. Gentleman drew an analogy with rail privatisation. Is he able to give any commitment to the House that the Labour party, if it were in power, would renationalise HMSO, when unfortunately it is not able to give such a commitment about rail privatisation?

Mr. Foster: The hon. Gentleman is a little premature. The Government have not yet privatised HMSO. They could just be frustrated by an early election. Who can tell?

What other reason can the Government have? Perhaps they have nothing else to do. They have no legislative programme, except a few Bills "to smoke out the Opposition", in the words of the chairman of the Tory party.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Is not the hon. Gentleman playing a rather familiar record, because every time we have debated privatisation we have heard doom and gloom from the Labour party, when the result has been success?

Mr. Foster: If the hon. Gentleman thinks that he has had gloom and doom so far, he should just stick around.

The Government have no Bills to speak of, except to smoke out the Opposition, and Parliament is on a one-day week, so we read. Ministers sit in their offices, dreaming up crackpot schemes to prove that the Government are still fizzing with ideas. The truth is that the Government are drifting aimlessly to the general election, with so little sense of direction that they grasp at anything that will appease their lunatic fringe. Perhaps the lunatics are not yet in charge of the asylum but they have certainly written the business plan. Privatisation is an idea whose time has passed. It has been fatally wounded by the greed of the fat cats.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Foster: If the hon. Gentleman hangs on, I shall give way to him in a minute.

No doubt, hon. Members will have seen the headline on the front page of yesterday's issue of the Observer. It reads:

> "Fat cats get £16m boost to pensions".

The whole idea has been blown out of the water in recent months. The fat cats get the cream while the staff get their cards. The Chancellor of the Duchy is fanning the dying embers, and the grand scheme has been reduced to this—selling off HMSO.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) was right to ask what the Government would sell off next. Will it be the Mace or the Dispatch Box? Such sales are worse than selling off the family silver—now they are selling off the empty boxes in which the silver was kept.

Mr. Hughes: I was happy to wait for the right hon. Gentleman to give way, and I wait in anticipation to find out whether he intends to say anything about HMSO. He said—I am sure I quote him correctly—that privatisation was an idea whose time had gone. At what point did he form that judgment? Presumably he supported privatisations up to a point and now opposes them. Which ones did he support, because from what he has said it is plain that he supported some?

Mr. Foster: That was an entertaining intervention, to which I shall not respond.

This privatisation reminds me of the Deputy Prime Minister's plan to sell off the Post Office.

Mr. Waterson: Hear, hear.

Mr. Foster: Someone still supports that sell-off. The Post Office is profitable, efficient and competitive, but we were told that the status quo was not an option and that privatisation was necessary to allow the Post Office to compete in wider markets and to borrow for investment in the private sector. The Deputy Prime Minister had to back down because there was not a majority in the House for his scheme. That also applies to HMSO, because there is no majority in either House for privatisation. If the Chancellor of the Duchy gets his way, that may never be tested because primary legislation is not required.

I understand that retaining a residual HMSO to administer Crown copyright and to fulfil the functions of the Queen's printer avoids the need for primary legislation. There is some suggestion of secondary legislation connected with the trading fund, but that might involve only a one-and-a-half-hour debate in Committee. No doubt the Chancellor of the Duchy hopes to sneak this measure through Parliament without a vote, and I can understand why. It was clear from the exchanges on the statement that many Conservative Members are not enthusiastic about his plan. If primary legislation were necessary, I am sure that the Government would not proceed.

As the chairman of the Tory party admitted before the Queen's Speech, most of its measures were designed to smoke out the Opposition. Selling off HMSO fails that test because it smokes out those few Conservative Members of the sensible tendency. For that reason, heaven and hell will be moved to prevent a vote. However, in the November issue of "Public Sector Purchasing" the Chancellor of the Duchy said that the new arrangements for HMSO would not proceed without Parliament's approval. That must mean a vote in both Houses, because I know of no other test for Parliament's approval. Will the Chancellor of the Duchy give both Houses a chance to vote on this measure, which impinges on every hon. Member? Perhaps he would care to respond.

Mr. Freeman: I thought that I had dealt fully and fairly with that issue but perhaps I can confirm that my advice is that no primary or secondary legislation is needed to permit the proposed transaction to come to fruition. I repeat for the sake of clarity the assurance about the retention of HMSO's business of supplying documents to Parliament as an integral part of HMSO. Parliament must be satisfied about the supply contract for that future business. As I have said, that is a prerequisite for completing the transaction.

Mr. Foster: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for that response, but he did not make clear whether there will be a vote in both Houses.

Sir Patrick Cormack: I assure the right hon. Gentleman that it is taken in that spirit and I am sure that there has to be a vote.

Mr. Foster: I am relieved to hear that, but we shall see.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Foster: Perhaps I may be allowed to finish this point, and then I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman.

The Chancellor of the Duchy believed that if he could convince the House of Commons Commission or the Select Committee on Finance and Services he would be home and dry. That is clear from his privatisation time schedule. I am not arguing that hon. Members mistrust the Commission or the domestic Committees to conduct detailed negotiations on our behalf and to safeguard the interests of hon. Members. The guarantees that were sought by Madam Speaker in her letter of 28 November to the Leader of the House are comprehensive, although I am sure that Madam Speaker would consider adding other requirements to satisfy the House.

Mr. Robinson: Is it not open, through the usual channels, to the Opposition to force a vote on any issue on a Supply day?

Mr. Foster: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right, and that may happen if the Chancellor of the Duchy decides to deny the House a vote. The right hon. Gentleman believed—but I have covered that bit. [Interruption.] That is what comes of spending 10 years in the Whips Office.

I sense from the mood of the House that hon. Members are unwilling to contract out this decision to the Commission or to the domestic Committees. I think that hon. Members will insist on deciding the issue themselves. The Chancellor of the Duchy intends that parliamentary approval should apply only to the terms of a legally binding contract, which will succeed the new supply and service agreement if privatisation goes ahead. That is clear from the right hon. Gentleman's reply to Madam Speaker.

Both Houses will wish to decide on the principle of this privatisation, and I shall explain why. First, HMSO's contract with Parliament is its most prestigious. The Government will not consider privatisation without that contract and, of course, the contract enhances the value of HMSO to a potential purchaser. However, the contract is equally important to HMSO: its services to Parliament are an integral part of the whole operation, which is why management and staff wish HMSO to remain an entity. The Chancellor of the Duchy claims to have been persuaded by that argument, but his wish to keep HMSO as an entity is driven more by the exigencies of his timetable than by any wish to satisfy management and staff. A broken-up HMSO would take longer to privatise, and the right hon. Gentleman's deadline of July 1996 may be unattainable if the House authorities cannot complete the essential preparatory work before that date. Any slippage might send the sell-off into the buffers of a general election.

No doubt, all Conservative Members will have been intrigued by yesterday's front page of The Sunday Times, which says:

> "Major orders alert for early election
> John Major has placed ministers and Conservative Central Office on 'amber alert' for a general election next autumn, six months before his term has to end in May 1997."

They are probably packing their bags now to get back to their constituencies and prepare for Opposition.

Sir Patrick Cormack: For Christmas.

Mr. Foster: Or for Christmas, but if this move were scuppered by an early general election, all the additional work imposed on the House authorities by privatisation would have been for nothing because, without privatisation, a legally binding contract would be unnecessary.

The House authorities have only just concluded a new supply and service agreement. If HMSO remains in the public sector, that agreement would continue for, say, four years. Concluding that agreement has been most time consuming for the House authorities. Drawing up a legally binding contract will prove even more arduous. Doubts have been expressed as to whether that work can be concluded to meet the requirements of the Chancellor's self-imposed timetable.

Hon. Members are entitled to ask whether any estimate has been made of the additional costs imposed on both Houses by the Government's plan. Will the House require additional members of staff? Has that additional expenditure been budgeted for? If not, can those extra demands be met? If so, what work will have to be deferred to meet those demands? Small wonder that, on 9 December, the front page of the Financial Times revealed a furious row between the House authorities and the Government about this scheme.

Perhaps we should ask an even more fundamental question: what right have the Government to impose extra costs on both Houses without either House being able to decide the issue from which those additional costs arise? Arguably, on that point alone, the Chancellor is under a moral, if not a legal or constitutional, obligation, to let Parliament decide whether it wants those unnecessary costs imposed by an unnecessary privatisation.

The next argument goes to the heart of the unease expressed by Parliament about the dilution of ministerial accountability because of the next steps agency initiative, let alone full-blown privatisation. At present, if hon. Members are dissatisfied with HMSO's standard of service, the Chancellor of the Duchy, as Minister with responsibility for public service, is accountable to the House. He will take some remedial action and report to the House. Here we must ask him how many hon. Members have complained about the service from HMSO. Has any formal complaint been lodged by the House authorities? If none, I suggest that the Chancellor of the Duchy should act on the principle, "If it isn't broken, don't mend it!"

What happens to ministerial accountability upon privatisation? Is the Chancellor still responsible or does that responsibility pass to the people who have signed the legally binding contract? Who will answer to the House? Precisely what sanctions are available, by whom and under what circumstances? In the exchanges on his statement, the Chancellor mentioned suspension of the contract, but surely that is unsatisfactory. The House cannot function without its essential papers. Who will serve the House while the contract is suspended? No other organisation could possibly fulfil the contract's terms on an interim or ad hoc basis.

Those are crucial issues. Can the House tolerate any dilution of ministerial accountability or a suspension of a legally binding contract as a sanction for non-fulfilment? It is clear that those issues arise only because of the privatisation of HMSO. That is why the House must be allowed to vote on the principle of privatisation.

There are other reasons why the House must exercise that right. Two hundred years ago, HMSO was set up to stamp out corruption in public sector purchasing. Because it is a market leader, HMSO is able to use the public sector's purchasing power to hold down prices. Because it acts as an independent broker, HMSO is able to spread purchasing across a wide range of firms, rather than concentrating work in a few favoured companies. If HMSO is privatised, the public sector will not benefit from those advantages.

During the whole of that 200 years, HMSO has served Government and Parliament, while maintaining the highest standards of confidentiality and meeting the most exacting deadlines required by Parliament. Will the Chancellor tell the House if HMSO has ever been investigated by the National Audit Office or the Public Accounts Committee for maladministration or for falling down on a matter of financial probity?

In January last year, the all-party House of Commons Public Accounts Committee produced one of its most critical reports about the decline in standards of administration and financial probity. The Committee said:

> "In recent years we have seen and reported on a number of failures in administrative and financial systems and contracts within departments and other public bodies which have led to money being wasted or otherwise improperly spent. These failings represent a departure from the standards of public conduct which have been established during the past 140 years."

Most of those cases arose because business men tried to short circuit administrative and financial procedures. The Government have been so dogged by allegations of sleaze that citizens no longer trust the system and we come to this pretty pass today when the lottery regulator does not even know that his behaviour is improper.

By this reckless plan, the Chancellor of the Duchy runs serious risks with HMSO's impeccable reputation. After privatisation, will HMSO still be subject to examination by the National Audit Office or the Public Accounts Committee? The Government have sullied the name of the public services by intemperate pursuit of private sector values, but they have no right to risk Parliament's name in the same way.

As a security printer, HMSO produces a wide range of security and "in confidence" papers such as the Budget. HMSO has an unprecedented record. No leaks have been attributed to it. Can the private sector guarantee to match that record? From time to time, the nature of such papers can jeopardise national security, so high is the risk. That is important to the House, as you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will recognise. Of course, Conservative Members will point to all sorts of market-sensitive information printed in the private sector as evidence that security printing can be handled just as well after privatisation. Indeed, in the exchanges following the statement, the Chancellor mentioned that some of the Budget papers are already subcontracted to the private sector. What he failed to mention—this is crucial—was that it was subcontracted only under the strict control of civil servants at HMSO.

Mr. Waterson: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way again. Is he not aware that some highly reputable companies in the private sector, including some in my own constituency, are engaged in security printing day in and day out and conform to high standards of product quality and security? Surely he is not restating the old Labour notion "public sector good, private sector bad"?

Mr. Foster: I was not saying that; I was under the impression that the Conservative party was saying the contrary—"private sector good, public sector bad".

[Mr. Foster]

Departments may of course choose not to use the privatised HMSO for their security documents. Perhaps the Chancellor will tell the House whether it is true that the royal military college at Sandhurst has already stopped using HMSO for some of its security documents, because it could not be confident about the security of a privatised HMSO. Perhaps he could also confirm that the Ministry of Defence is already radically reviewing its relationship with a privatised HMSO. [Interruption.] Someone obviously hopes so. When one bears in mind the fact that Ministry of Defence contracts account for nearly 50 per cent. of HMSO's revenues, could not the privatisation be rather dangerous? Could not the privatisation be attacking HMSO's core business, and would not that totally scupper the Chancellor's argument that privatisation is necessary for HMSO to sell in wider markets?

I have dealt with the direct risks to services to Parliament; let us now examine the indirect risks. The first is the sale itself. The Chancellor wishes HMSO to be sold as a whole, apart from the residual HMSO. That might be his intention, but there has been a significant change of emphasis from what he said in evidence to the Finance and Services Select Committee to what he said in his statement. He said the same thing tonight. The worrying phrase is:

> "in any event we would not separate the publishing and printing businesses".

I am sure that the Chancellor is aware that HMSO is much larger than just the printing and publishing business. Perhaps he is unaware that the statement, which he thinks is reassuring, is actually quite worrying to the staff of HMSO.

Mr. Freeman: The right hon. Gentleman is absolutely right to say that my statement represented a change since giving evidence to the Finance and Services Select Committee. The change was based on the advice of consultants, who recommended not only offering the business as a whole but in any case—whatever the response—not separating the printing and publishing business. Some might say that that represents an advance. I hope that it is a welcome change and that it gives greater assurance not only to the House but to the management and staff of HMSO.

Mr. Foster: I do not think that the staff will find that reassuring. They are completely committed to HMSO surviving as an entity. The Minister re-emphasising that he would not in any event separate the publishing and printing business will certainly not be the kind of reassurance that he imagines that it will be. Under the exigencies of having to push through a sale before the general election, surely it is possible that the Chancellor will change his mind even more—perhaps his consultants will advise him again.

Even if the Chancellor succeeds in selling HMSO as an entity, what guarantee is there that it will remain an entity for long? Rumour has it that a finance house will be the most likely purchaser. The purchase would be made with a view to flotation in two or three years' time. What guarantee is there that the new owner would not hive off bits of the business? Indeed, wringing out of HMSO's £340 million turnover the kind of profit that I have heard mentioned could be achieved only by hiving off the least profitable and concentrating on the most profitable bits of the business. Redundancies would inevitably follow. On that very subject, the Chancellor said that there would be no automatic redundancies. What does that mean?

What guarantee can the Chancellor of the Duchy give that the company would not fall into foreign ownership, which would be unacceptable to Parliament? He will recall that Madam Speaker's letter made special mention of that. What guarantee can he give that the new owner would not be driven by the market to look for cheaper and poorer quality services to Parliament? The interests of the City coincide only rarely with the public interest. Despite his good intentions, the market might exert pressures opposing Parliament's wish to make its papers more widely and cheaply available.

For all those reasons, both Houses should have the opportunity to vote on the issue, not only on the narrow terms of the legally binding contract. Those reasons are sufficient for the new Public Service Select Committee to investigate thoroughly the risks to parliamentary services, but the Committee will be able to range more widely.

For example, the thrust of the Chancellor of the Duchy's argument is that HMSO's public sector market is declining and that privatisation will enable HMSO to sell in wider markets and borrow for investment in the private sector. When challenged as to why the Government will not arrange for HMSO to operate with full commercial freedom in the public sector, he responds that that is not Government policy. [Interruption.] Does the hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes) want to intervene?

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: I have made my point.

Mr. Foster: I think that the hon. Gentleman said that it was daft.

Frankly, that is not good enough. The Chancellor of the Duchy is forcing through an unnecessary and unwanted privatisation—it is certainly unwanted by the staff, 95 per cent. of whom voted against it, as my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) said, and we would probably find that it was unwanted by both Houses of Parliament, if they were allowed to vote. He is forcing it through on the pretext that there is no alternative, but he has not even examined the options. Will he confirm that this option was not one of those in the terms of reference given to the consultants who advised him?

HMSO staff are proud of their record in the public sector. It has met all the targets set by central Government and undergone fundamental change in the past 15 years, becoming a trading fund in 1980 and a next steps agency in 1988. It has been trading commercially since 1980 and with increasing commercial freedom as it has responded to competition from the private sector. All the changes have been negotiated with the co-operation of the staff. They are proud of their record and take pride in the high-quality service that they provide to Government and Parliament. They want HMSO to remain in the public sector.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Is my hon. Friend not filled with despair by the fact that we have a Government who are so little conscious of the importance of our sovereign Parliament that they are prepared to hand the printing of something as vital as the papers that flow from Parliament to a private firm, not because that is necessary but for the sake of a spurious argument about profit?

Mr. Foster: I thank my hon. Friend for her intervention. Of course we understand—

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): It was not very helpful.

Mr. Foster: We are one party, unlike the Conservative party. My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The whole scheme is being driven by the dogma that HMSO must be put into the private sector if it is to succeed in future. [Interruption.] I am addressing the whole argument. The Chancellor of the Duchy fails to address that argument, which is why I want him to refer the matter to the new Public Service Select Committee.

The Select Committee should also examine the costs of privatisation. For example, what has been paid to consultants and advisers so far? What is the Government's estimate of additional fees before the sale is complete? How much will privatisation cost HMSO in staff time? How much investment has been carried out already in preparation for privatisation? How far is the low profit in last year's accounts due to exceptional redundancy payments in preparation for privatisation? How much is the preparation for privatisation costing both Houses and will that be taken into account in the contract? How much will be lost to the taxpayer by sacrificing a stream of profits year on year for a one-off contribution from the sale? How far has HMSO's performance been affected by two or three years of uncertainty and the resulting staff demoralisation? How much will be lost to the taxpayer by selling off valuable assets at knock-down prices to secure a quick sale? Is this a good time to sell in view of last year's poor results?

I shall deal now with the issue of European law, and shall touch on a couple of matters related to the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981. I understand that the House of Commons operates under the provisions of the public service contracts regulations of 1993, which require tender procedures for contracts of service. That may mean that the House could not commit itself in advance to a contract with a privatised HMSO.

I understand, however, that if a contract were entered into before privatisation and transferred as part of the sale, the regulations would not apply. If so, that might contravene European law. In answer to my question during his statement, the Chancellor of the Duchy responded that he was advised that that was not a problem. Will he publish the points on which he sought advice and the advice that he has been given? I shall certainly publish advice that I have received from lawyers advising the trade unions, which suggests that there may be some conflict with European law.

For the Chancellor of the Duchy knowingly to flout European law might make him some kind of a hero with his Euro-sceptics, but it would be quite wrong for him to involve the House authorities in a breach of European law, and wrong for him to involve the legislature in such a breach without a vote in both Houses.

The Chancellor of the Duchy has confirmed that TUPE will apply and we welcome that—although, understandably, staff are suspicious of how long the terms and conditions of employment will be maintained under the new owner. Pensions, of course, are not covered by TUPE. Although the requirement is said to be "broadly comparable" to the civil service scheme, there are great concerns about what that will mean in practice.

The scheme should not go ahead without a vote in both Houses of Parliament. It should be referred to the new Public Service Select Committee for a thorough examination of the risks to services to Parliament, of the costs of privatisation and of the feasibility of giving HMSO full commercial freedom in the public sector.

The Chancellor must be aware that his scheme is deeply unpopular with HMSO staff. He is also clearly not the blue-eyed boy with the House authorities. His scheme is unpopular with all Opposition parties, and many of his Back Benchers are reluctant supporters. Perhaps he should observe Lord Healey's first law of holes—when one is in a hole, stop digging. That at least would bring relief to the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson), who would not have to be a Norfolk turkey voting for an early Christmas. Indeed, the hon. Gentleman's Government want to present him oven-ready to the voters and he has been stuffed by the Chancellor of the Duchy. No wonder he is doing the turkey trot. Who would be a Tory candidate in Norwich if this madcap scheme went through?

8.5 pm

Mr. Paul Channon (Southend, West): The House has had a treat that it has not had nearly frequently enough in recent years: a speech by the right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster). I cannot say that I agree with everything that he said. Indeed, it could be argued that a speech of 37 minutes was a trifle long for a debate of this length. Chief Whips have said that to me on other occasions, but perhaps different standards apply to those who no longer have that great responsibility.

I shall be extremely brief, unlike some, since my job is to report on the Minister's appearance in front of the Select Committee on Finance and Services, to which the right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland was good enough to make reference. I note that the right hon. Gentleman now wants to send the report to be examined in great detail by the Public Service Select Committee. The more the merrier I suppose. If my Committee were thereby relieved of another duty, I do not suppose that the Committee's members would mind too much.

But, in fairness to the House, I should say that the appearance of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster gave us quite a bit of comfort because he answered all the questions that we put to him and showed no reluctance whatever to appear. Indeed, he has not shown any reluctance to appear in the House, either for the recent statement or this week's debate.

If I understand the remarks of the right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland, he says that we must have a vote on the issue. I would not necessarily mind that. I do not see how a vote could be stopped if hon. Members wanted it. As the right hon. Gentleman said, if necessary, the Opposition can use a Supply day. If those in the House want to vote they will vote. If they do not want to vote, they will not vote. It does not seem to be a particularly difficult thing for which to campaign.

There are differing views across the Floor of the House about the merits of privatisation and how it has worked on various occasions in various industries in the past, but that is not of great importance to me or, indeed, to the members of my Committee. Whatever our individual views on privatisation, what matters is what effect this particular privatisation would have on the House of Commons.

If we were satisfied that the House of Commons' reputation would be damaged, that the service to the House of Commons would be severely damaged or on other such grave matters, regardless of party affiliation, we would be right to be against the proposal. My Committee therefore examined the proposal and took evidence from the Chancellor in order to try to address the very natural doubts and worries felt by hon. Members on both sides of the House about the privatisation of the stationery office.

I accept what the right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland says about the excellent service that the stationery office gives and has given for many years. I pay my tribute to it. But I do not want hon. Members to go away imagining that it has always been roses dealing with the stationery office in this House. When I was a Minister responsible for the stationery office, again and again statements were made and questions were asked because papers did not appear on time. Indeed, the same thing happened to my immediate predecessors in the Labour Government. So being in the public sector was not always a safeguard that things would be all right with the stationery office.

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the absence of documents is a common complaint in Standing Committees? It is important to ensure that the record of the previous sittings is available to hon. Members serving on those Committees. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that hon. Members often raise points of order because the Hansard for the previous Tuesday or Thursday is not available?

Mr. Channon: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is right. It is some years since I raised a point of order in a Standing Committee, and I hope that opportunity will not arise again for quite a while.

I was the Minister under whose regime and benevolent rule the stationery office became a trading agency, to which the right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland referred with pleasure.

We have seen in Hansard the letter from Madam Speaker containing 12 paragraphs of conditions that she thinks are necessary before the House could agree to a privatisation scheme. It is no secret that the matter was debated in the Commission, nor is it any secret that the matter was debated in the Finance and Services Select Committee—the relevant papers are published. I recall no resistance to the suggestion that the Minister should make a statement. I recall no resistance to the suggestion that there should be a debate. The very fact of a debate implies that, as a possible result of it, there might be a vote. Such a vote could easily be arranged in the future.

All I want to ask is whether my right hon. Friend can repeat the assurance he gave to the House on a previous occasion. Can he repeat that he will not proceed with the privatisation of the stationery office unless he can conscientiously convince the House that the 12 points of reservation that the Speaker made in her letter will be met in full? My right hon. Friend has already given us that undertaking, but I think that he must give it again to the House tonight. The House can then come to a fair judgment about the future. If those assurances cannot be given, I am sure that the House will not wish to proceed with the privatisation. If my right hon. Friend gives that assurance, I for one will be happy, at least at this stage, to look at the proposal with an open mind and to consider the evidence. I would be happy to give way to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Freeman: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. I repeat the assurance that I have already given on that point. Because of the importance of HMSO to parliamentary business, it is obvious and self-evident that Parliament must be satisfied. I cannot dictate Parliament's wish or conclusions on the matter, and therefore it cannot proceed unless Parliament is satisfied.

Mr. Channon: For me, at least, that goes far enough for me to say that, at this stage, I am content to proceed further and see how the negotiations go. The Minister said that Parliament's wishes must be paramount, and that must be the aim of all of us, whether we are in favour or against privatisation in principle.

8.12 pm

Mr. John Garrett (Norwich, South): Her Majesty's Stationery Office employs 2,800 workers, of whom 900 are in my constituency at the Norwich headquarters of HMSO. Therefore mine is a primarily constituency interest, although I also have a public service interest, as we all do.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster) said, HMSO was set up in 1786 to stamp out corruption in public service purchasing. It is profitable, highly successful and has declared a surplus since 1980. It is in the middle of a three-year plan. As a result of being in the public sector it has the advantage of being able to use the purchasing power of the public sector to hold down prices. It also enjoys large economies of scale, and can spread its purchasing across a range of suppliers. Those advantages have served the Government well.

One essential is that HMSO is not broken up, on or after privatisation. The Minister frequently says that he will not split its printing from its publishing activities. The right hon. Gentleman has not hitherto realised that one third of HMSO's business is in office equipment and office supplies. If those businesses were sold off—that would be a strong temptation to a private contractor—much of the overhead of the total organisation would have to be spread over printing, print buying and publishing. The loss of one third of the business would make HMSO non-viable. We fear that a major institution would buy HMSO as a whole and then, relatively quickly, resell the profitable parts and collapse the rest of it.

What guarantees of employment will be extracted from a purchaser? Every other privatisation has been accompanied by massive job losses. That is the burning question in Norwich, which has lost 2,500 jobs directly, and probably as many again indirectly in the past few years. It cannot withstand massive new redundancies. I believe that guarantees of employment in the tender from potential private purchasers are essential.

The Government tell us that the TUPE regulations will apply to the workers at HMSO, but those regulations specifically state that workers' terms and conditions may be changed for technological, organisational or economic reasons. HMSO operates on the leading edge of a number of technologies, and is therefore regularly reorganised. The protection afforded by the TUPE regulations may therefore be minimal. Equally, those regulations do not apply to transfers via change of share ownership. We understand that the current preferred route for a sale is to a financial institution, which may therefore not comply with current terms and conditions. Even the Government acknowledge that TUPE regulations provide protection only at the point of sale. If HMSO were to be broken up later, the businesses which were sold on would also not benefit from TUPE. I am strongly under the impression that the TUPE conditions last for three months and would not apply any longer to HMSO.

When I asked the Minister at the time of his statement what steps he would take to guarantee security on privatisation, he was unable to answer. HMSO is a security printer—I am well aware that there are other such printers—which produces in-confidence Government and parliamentary papers, passports, benefit books and other products where security matters, and which are subject to potential fraud. There has never been a leak from HMSO. What private sector company would offer such a guarantee when making a tender to take over HMSO?

HMSO already carries out work for the French Department of Employment and the German Post Office. Why could it not spread into the European public sector markets and British non-Government markets while being retained as a public sector body? HMSO already operates in private markets, and most of its work has already been exposed to market testing. Virtually every test has been won in-house because of the efficiency of HMSO. In fact, 75 per cent. of its goods and services are already purchased from the private sector.

HMSO has made the profit required of it while publishing important but limited-interest publications, which the private sector would be unlikely to publish because of the lack of profit in particular publications. Open government requires a state publisher prepared to publish limited-interest publications without the constraint of profit.

The Minister referred to the constraint on the HMSO of the public sector borrowing requirement, but HMSO has made no call on borrowing in the past 15 years.

In addition to employment and commercial considerations, there are, of course, important parliamentary considerations, which have been the subject of most of the speeches so far. How can a private contractor have the parliamentary experience of HMSO? What will happen if a private contractor fails to provide Parliament with the publications that it needs to do its work? If a contract replaces the present arrangements, all that Parliament can do is invoke a penalty clause. What good is that? Parliament would meanwhile grind to a halt. When will a detailed statement be made on safeguarding Parliament's interests in the cause of privatisation? Will they be made clear in the tender document? Who will be responsible if a private stationery office fails to provide the service that we need? Do the Government propose to hold a golden share in the privatised HMSO, so that at least they have some arm on it?

I have some other questions on parliamentary matters. Will the privatised stationery office be the ultimate owner of current and future stocks of Government and parliamentary publications, and of the associated electronic archive? If so, what would the situation be if the company went bankrupt or were taken into foreign ownership?

A privatised stationery office will naturally wish, in the interests of its shareholders, to extract maximum commercial value from official documents and data. How does that fit in with Government policies on public access to official information, for example, the trend to put more and more Government documents on the Internet?

The House is making an effort to bring down the sale price of Hansard and other parliamentary documents—a policy which will benefit Government Departments as purchasers of those documents. Do the Government support that policy? Are they making a similar effort to hold down the sale price of their documents? A Government-funded subsidy is currently paid to enable public libraries to purchase all official publications at a substantial discount. Can we take it that subsidy is not affected by the proposed privatisation of HMSO?

The Minister made a great deal of the fact that House officials recently completed negotiations of a new supply and service agreement, or SSA, with HMSO which is intended to come into effect on 1 January 1996. Are Ministers using that SSA, or related information on the House's financial arrangements with HMSO, for the purpose of discussions with potential purchasers? In other words, will the SSA be built into discussions with potential purchasers? Will the south London press—with its access to Parliament and its unique experience—continue to operate under guarantee? Because of parliamentary business, HMSO's costs are relatively high and its return from sales relatively low. This bodes ill for its survival.

I do not find the Chancellor of the Duchy's answers to the Speaker's letter sufficiently satisfying on the main points. The Speaker raised the matter of the parliamentary press in south London, and stated that there was concern that somebody who took it over at a risk to the service to Parliament.

> "would be tempted to experiment with cheaper methods for providing the service"

The Speaker referred to the complexity of the House's documents and the procedural rules which underpin them. She said:

> "HMSO staff and management acquire experience and knowledge of those complexities as they progress from job to job in the organisation; and they are brought up in the tradition that in all circumstances the requirements of Parliament are paramount."

It is unlikely that a private contractor would see the interests of Parliament as paramount, because it is an intangible requirement and is very difficult to put into a contractual document.

There is also the question of ministerial oversight. Who will be identified within the privatised stationery office to be responsible for contact with the House? Will there be any attempt to water down the SSA with HMSO without agreement by the House authorities? I assume that there could be a period in which the SSA would lapse. The Speaker's letter continued by saying that

> "we consider that any prospective purchaser of the Stationery Office should be required to accept the agreed principles which are set out in the SSA, particularly so far as they concern the rights of the House to regulate the production and reproduction of its documents, in both paper and electronic form."

[Mr. John Garrett]

That applies also to location, and particularly to the location of the south London press that produces Hansard.

The fact is that this is a mere matter of dogma and ideology. The Minister speaks of new opportunities, but new opportunities could been found for HMSO without a requirement to privatise. The staff at HMSO certainly do not think that privatisation will bring new opportunities, because 95 per cent. of them rejected privatisation. The proposal is simply a product of ideology, and the least the House deserves is an opportunity to vote it down.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in this debate because, like the hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Garrett), I have some constituency interest in the matter. HMSO is based in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, but many of my constituents—I do not know exactly how many—work at HMSO.

I share one thing with the hon. Gentleman, and possibly more. My constituents' worries are no doubt the same as those of his. After all, I am sure that one could not distinguish between the letters which he has been receiving from his constituents who work at HMSO and the letters that I have been receiving. It would be silly of me to suggest that there is some kind of difference in concern across the constituency boundary.

I want to be frank with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy—there is, if not universal concern among the employees of HMSO, certainly considerable concern. That is why it is important for the matter to be debated and, to that extent, I must support some of the hon. Gentleman's remarks.

The Government should think long and hard about the way in which they go about this change. It is my first duty to get across to the Government that any change must be in the interests of my constituents. Any other constituency Member of Parliament would say the same. However, I differ from the Opposition Members who spoke in that I would say that there is a hard commercial case to be looked at. If there is time, I shall refer to this matter again. The market has been declining, and HMSO has had to take a long look at the question of possible staff reductions. Therefore, it is wrong of the Opposition to suggest that everything can be left exactly as it is, and that everything will proceed if that is the case.

The right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster) complimented me by comparing me to a turkey. I may have got his comparison wrong, but it had something to do with Christmas. The hon. Gentleman would have disappointed my constituents. This is not a party political point. He spoke for some 37 minutes, but he did not say a great deal about what the Opposition would actually do to address the commercial difficulties and problems which HMSO is facing. After all, my constituents are concerned with the distinction between public and private service, but they are also concerned about jobs and prospects. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy is right to say that something needs to be done to improve the opportunities within HMSO, or any succeeding organisation, and those arguments must be taken seriously.

It is appropriate that we talk about constituency issues—or Norwich issues—in this debate, even though it is a wider-ranging debate about Parliament and Hansard. Luke Hansard lived in Norwich and served his apprenticeship there before moving to London in 1774. All of us who have read up on the matter know the history. It is important that, in debating HMSO and Parliament, we bring Norwich into it, and I make no apology for doing so. There are other issues which I would like to address briefly in a moment.

The issues are being considered by the House of Commons Commission and by the Finance and Services Committee. The hon. Member for Norwich, South also referred to parliamentary issues in his speech. I referred to some of the issues in an Adjournment debate in April of this year, when I talked about the cost and distribution of Hansard, the reporting of parliamentary debates and other important matters. I shall not go into great detail, but I hope to refer to those matters as well as talking about Norwich.

I would be very unhappy if I felt that there was any chance at all of the main headquarters of HMSO moving out of Norwich. That may sound unreasonable, but—as a constituency Member of Parliament—I would have to be unreasonable if I thought that there was any chance of that happening at all. How could I or the hon. Member for Norwich, South say anything else? The Norwich tradition is tremendous, and the strong connection with Norwich must continue. I make no apology for pressing my right hon. Friend on that particular point, as it is important. It is important that the people of Norwich retain their jobs, and also the strong, traditional and historic links which HMSO has with Norwich. I make no apology for pressing that point over and over again. It is important to me, and it will remain important to me if we debate the matter further at a later stage.

As I said earlier, many of my constituents have written to me to express their concerns about what they see as the Government's plans. I would like to pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy for the way in which he has kept me—and, I have no doubt, my colleagues in the House—fully informed about how the Government are going about this. My right hon. Friend has so far kept in touch with the management, staff and trade union side at HMSO, and has done so superbly. I think that he has visited Norwich twice—I know that he has done so at least once—and that he intends to do so again. One cannot fault him on this, and I hope that he will continue to keep fully in touch with everyone involved at HMSO.

When my right hon. Friend visits Norwich, I hope that he will find time also to visit CCTA which, curiously, stands for the Government Centre for Information Systems. I defy any hon. Member to work out that one. CCTA is situated in my constituency, and of course it is also facing changes. I hope that my right hon. Friend will approach the changes at CCTA in the same courteous way in which he has approached the changes at HMSO.

Many fears have been expressed in the correspondence that I have received from my constituents. Some of those fears are not well founded, but some need serious answers.

My constituents are rightly concerned about the effect on the Norwich economy. It is no secret that we have had serious job losses in Norwich in recent years. I hope, therefore, that my Government colleagues will take seriously the fact that the Norwich economy is an issue at the moment. Communications to Norwich are an issue and jobs in Norwich are an issue. Those points are relevant and my constituents are right to address me on them.

My constituents have referred to other issues about which other hon. Members have already spoken so I do not need to say too much about them. They refer to the possibility of asset stripping and to the possibility of splitting HMSO into units. They also talk about security, to which other hon. Members have referred. I am not saying that those concerns are necessarily well founded, but I know that people are worried about them and Ministers must answer those points.

Mr. Garrett: If there were a vote, would the hon. Gentleman vote for or against the privatisation of HMSO?

Mr. Thompson: I would want to find out first whether my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had answered my concerns. As I said a moment ago, he has gone about things sensibly. We shall have to wait and see whether he continues in a sensible way. In spite of the remarks by the right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland, we do not know whether we shall have an opportunity to vote. My right hon. Friend has suggested that the proposal could go through in a Standing Committee. I feel—here I agree with the hon. Member for Norwich, South—that the proposal needs thorough debate and airing in Norwich as well as in the House. It is important, therefore, that I and colleagues here express all our concerns as well as—here I disagree with the hon. Gentleman—the advantages that may accrue from privatisation or from some similar change.

Several hon. Members have referred to security. I have some sympathy with the idea that there is a risk, if the civil service is left out of it all, that there will be extra leaks. The only trouble is that we seem to have an awful lot of leaks even with our present governmental system.

Mr. Beith: It is the politicians.

Mr. Thompson: I shall not respond to that.

In June 1994, I received from HMSO its newsletter, which comes out at regular intervals. Its controller and chief executive at that time was Paul Freeman; I am not sure whether that name has any significance for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. Mr. Freeman headlined his article with the words "Streamlining to survive" and then made the following key points:

> "Up to 30 per cent. of current jobs may have to go for HMSO to remain competitive. Corporate services to be reduced to around 150 staff. Voluntary Early Retirement to continue."

I could reel off his key points. Anyone who suggests that HMSO's problems start as of this debate is misleading my constituents and the House. There are continuing problems which the management of HMSO have to address and which my right hon. Friend is trying to address. We must try to push some of the more obvious party political controversy to one side and to look at the serious issues.

My right hon. Friend is probably right, therefore, to suggest that the freedom to trade within the private sector will lead to opportunities for business growth and could well lead to better employment prospects in Norwich. That possibility is, of course, subject to my earlier point about the headquarters remaining in Norwich. New technology means that the staffing requirement may reduce and the volume of production by the printing presses and so on may need to increase. That is why I support the hon. Member for Norwich, South when he talks about expanding HMSO's activities to printing for the European Parliament and for organisations overseas. That must be good news whatever we do politically and it is an important point.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack), who is not now in his place, referred to public service. I too have some difficulty here because I am a traditionalist at heart and a conservative, as many of my constituents are. Although I fully see the commercial arguments in favour of privatisation—perhaps jobs are the issue that will really count in the end—I have some sympathy with those such as my hon. Friend who say that public service is important in itself. That does not mean that I go along with the old Labour view that everything in sight should be nationalised, but I believe that there is a concept of public service. Those of us who have served in the professions, as I have, will not allow our party colleagues to sweep aside the concept of public service. I will certainly not have that. Those in HMSO who are genuinely arguing, not in political terms, for the concept of public service should not be dismissed out of hand. To be fair, I do not think that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster dreams of doing that. I must, however, put on record that the concept of public service is an issue that we have to address.

I have made most of the points that I wanted to make on behalf of my constituents. To sum up, I believe that my right hon. Friend is handling the matter well. He is keeping people in Norwich fully informed and, as I know, he has a lot of support from those who are responsible for HMSO and for taking it forward into the future. However, my right hon. Friend has a lot of work to do to convince the employees as a whole of the rightness of this move.

The point of my speech is to persuade my right hon. Friend to do all that he can to ensure that there is, if not here in Parliament certainly within HMSO, a thorough debate about the future. Subject to all that—here I respond to the hon. Member for Norwich, South—I would have no difficulty, if the matter came to a vote, in voting for the proposals as long as I was convinced that they were in the interests of my constituents. If I were convinced of that, I could override any other reservations that I might have or any old-fashioned ideas that I might have—which unfortunately I have not got rid of altogether.

There is a parliamentary issue as well. Hansard, which is printed and published by HMSO is important. It should be distributed more widely and that is why I initiated an Adjournment debate on that subject some months ago. I was keen that the price of Hansard should be reduced. On 6 December, the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) confirmed in a parliamentary answer that there would be reductions. There had been an earlier reduction in the price of the weekly Hansard from £22 to £12 as long ago as May. Within the past week, there has been an announcement of a reduction in the prices of the daily Hansard, Bills and Select Committee reports. That is a move in the right direction.

If we move to privatisation, about which I am happy subject to the conditions I outlined, we must ensure that Parliament is protected in a number of ways. One way is to ensure that Hansard becomes more available—whether through electronic communications and the Internet, through cheaper printed Hansard or through free or cheap issues to public libraries, I do not mind, but I believe that it is important to Parliament to ensure wider distribution. I have no idea whether that has anything to do with privatisation, but I believe that whatever change comes, it is important.

I know that many hon. Members on both sides agree that the reporting of Parliament is going by default. The press reporting of Parliament is a disaster; it has now been reduced to sketch writing and the trivial. There were references earlier to Matthew Parris who, dare I say it, is probably the best sketch writer.

Mr. Waterson: Where is he?

Mr. Thompson: I have no idea where Matthew Parris is. The sketch writers are here only for the first hour or so of the day and they then go off to dinner or to do whatever else they do. They certainly lead a comfortable life. Matthew Parris is probably the best sketch writer, yet even he often bases his sketches these days on matters that have nothing to do with what has taken place in the Chamber. I could expand on that but I shall not do so, you will be relieved to hear, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There is an important issue and I shall return to the subject of Hansard and its circulation at a later date.

I will not submit to the temptation of saying anything more on a subject about which I feel extremely strongly. I say merely that I hope that my right hon. Friend understands my remarks on behalf of my constituents. I hope, once again, that he will accept my appreciation for the way in which he is going about the debate on this important issue.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Clackmannan): I am sponsored by the printers union, the Graphical, Paper and Media Union, and it is perhaps appropriate that I should deal almost exclusively with that aspect of the matter.

One problem with the reporting of Parliament concerns the technical difficulties that now weigh heavily on newspapers, because of the deadlines that they have to meet, so that the presses can start rolling at a particular time. That sort of problem does not arise with HMSO. The arrangements that have been arrived at between the work force, Hansard and those in this House who pay the bills, as it were, mean that the service is carried out in a unique way.

My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) mentioned a problem that those of us who sit on Standing Committees encounter from time to time: the non-availability of papers. I am assured by my friends who work on the printing presses that they would be more than happy to be able to provide that service earlier for the convenience of the House. It is the constraints that have been imposed on them over a period of time that prevent them from doing so.

It is unfortunate that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has left, because I was going to pay him something of a compliment. He is well known on both sides of the House as a courteous and solicitous man. In the past, I have had to cross swords with him on many occasions when he represented other Departments and I have always found him to be genuinely concerned. As a consequence, he is sometimes a wee bit thin-skinned and takes it all out when the barbarian hordes in the Opposition try to rough him up a bit. Although his answers this evening have been polite and courteous, they have not been satisfactory. He has almost been honest enough to admit that, in so far as he has said that he cannot give guarantees on the number of jobs after the sale of the business or what the working conditions will be.

We have given the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster four or five days' notice, but he seems to misunderstand the nature of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981. My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Garrett) referred to the criteria by which a change in circumstances may take place. When ownership changes, some three months' notice has to be given before the TUPE regulations can be altered. I think that the figure is 90 days, so it is nearly 14 weeks. That is the point at which negotiations start.

We know that such negotiations would not necessarily involve the preservation of the status quo. Indeed, there would be no point in having negotiations or giving notice if there was not going to be a change. We also know that when ownership changes, new owners are often ambitious enough to notice areas of profitability or loss that they would like to promote or cut out. As a consequence, jobs may go and factories may be moved about the country.

As a Scotsman, I remember that it was only 10 years ago that Mr. Ernest Saunders came to Edinburgh and told everyone that the Distillers company headquarters, which was then located in the city, would remain there and that Guinness, having taken over Distillers, would locate its business in Edinburgh. That may have been an early sign of the Alzheimer's disease that apparently afflicted Mr. Saunders later and from which he miraculously recovered.

I do not suggest that the people who take over HMSO if the privatisation goes through will behave as Mr. Saunders did, but unless something that will last for a long time is written into the terms of the sale, the chances of the headquarters remaining in Norwich are, to say the least, difficult. I do not say that because I wish anything to happen to the headquarters in Norwich. As one who represents a Scottish constituency, I know the importance of breaking the stranglehold of London on all business and commercial life. One does not have to be in favour of devolution as much as the Government are opposed to it—or dubious about it, like my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell)—to recognise that we need a diversity of not only ownership but location of ownership across the country. I am dubious about any assurances that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster might try to give us on the matter.

Hon. Members have continually returned to the point that it is somehow necessary to change ownership because the business is contracting, so there has to be some sort of commercial freedom that has hitherto been unavailable. Such a lack of commercial freedom did not restrict British Rail, prior to the threats of privatisation, from being in competition with companies to deliver parcels or, indeed, bodies. No competition was allowed in respect of the railway lines, but there was competition in respect of parcels. There is also the Post Office, which offers a range of services in the public sector, enters into competition with private sector companies and goes after commercial contracts with private businesses.

I do not understand why HMSO, in its myriad activities, cannot, for example, bid to provide local authorities with papers and services or offer to print examination papers for examination boards. If it can produce cheques for giros, why not for banks? Why could it not be allowed to print bank notes? Some of those activities might well require investment, but nobody suggests that the sizeable investment that HMSO has had to undergo over the past 15 years came from the City or broke the Treasury rules. It was generated from within the business. I cannot see why the rules that apply to some bodies that operate in the public sector should be denied to HMSO. I find the Government's blinkered attitude strange.

It is equally strange that when, at this late stage of a Parliament, the Government are trying to keep the privatisation fires burning, this is the best that they can get away with. The criteria for privatisation now are not how much money they can get or the scale of the operation; they are whether it can be achieved without legislation. That is the case with the privatisation of the nuclear industry and with that of HMSO. Both are businesses which have operated extremely efficiently and which, of their sort, could be classed as world leaders, but both are to be sold off.

We do not know what the sum involved will be yet. We shall find out, doubtless, in due course. We shall want to know whether the quality of service that the House and the country receive will be sustained. It is a service that enables people to go to HMSO retail outlets and purchase papers at the same time across the country. It publishes papers of a sensitivity that can sometimes be of tremendous commercial advantage to individuals. That service is carried out by people who are not especially well paid and who will not themselves gain from the privatisation. Those people have committed themselves to the service of the community. I emphasise the point that the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson) made—an ethic of public service still prevails and has its adherents.

Some of the people of whom we have been speaking, such as those who are recipients of non-contributory pension schemes, may begin to look at the matter differently if they are required to pay 6 per cent. or 9 per cent. of their salaries towards the pension fund, which will by and large, but not necessarily, just about meet present pension requirements. That is where the Minister's lack of clarity throws into doubt the sincerity of the whole operation. Between Thursday and today, the Government's position has shifted. On Thursday, HMSO was to be sold off in its entirety; tonight, the Minister said that he is willing to look at the printing and publishing business being dealt with separately. If the printing and publishing business is separate, I am not sure whether the headquarters at Norwich could survive.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way because I wanted to speak on that point, but time did not permit me to do so. It was also raised by my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack). I, too, have my doubts about the separation of the two sides of the business, although I realise that this is a parliamentary rather than a constituency matter. However, jobs could be at risk and I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising that concern, which I share.

Mr. O'Neill: Other hon. Members have raised the issue and will continue to do so.

We are not happy with this proposal. My colleagues in the printing unions are dreadfully worried about it because they have seen too many takeovers in the recent past, in which working conditions have worsened, factories and printing shops have closed down and pension funds have been messed about. We welcome the Minister's assurances, but I hope to God that his ambitions and ours will be realised. As we say in Scotland, "I hae ma doots aboot that," because we do not believe that those who want to take over HMSO will have anything like the ethics of public service behind them and will take the company's long-term interests to heart. Ultimately, they will run the company for three or four years, strip it down, separate off parts of the business that are not commercially attractive, perhaps give them away at knock-down prices, and then try to realise from the profitable core the best price that they can get. They will do that not for the taxpayers, this House or those who work for the business but simply for the company shareholders whom they represent and with whom their loyalty lies.

The House of Commons has far higher standards and far stronger commitments. We should have the right to vote on the issue and the House should have a clear prospectus of what is on offer. Until we do, I hope that no Opposition Member will encourage the Minister in the foolishness of his endeavours.

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne): I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak in this important debate. It has been interesting, not least because Opposition Members have given us a re-run of many themes and prejudices of old Labour. As the definitive voice of new Labour will wind up for the Opposition, it will be interesting to see at the end of the debate how the two philosophies are reconciled.

I shall make four main points. First, we must view the proposal as a natural progression. HMSO has had a sweep of history of some 200 years or more, but in terms of its recent history, we have been told that, in 1980, it began to recover its costs and some two years later, Government Departments were liberated from the obligation to purchase from HMSO. So competition with the private sector has been a fact of life for the organisation for the past 10 years or more. In 1988, it became an executive agency, so there is nothing new about the current proposal. It is the natural result of all that has gone before, particularly in the past 10 or 15 years.

Secondly, hon. Members on both sides of the House have echoed the view that, whatever happens to HMSO, it is important to have clear safeguards about the future role of the stationery office, especially vis-à-vis this House and the other place. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster made it clear the other day that he is determined that whoever buys the stationery office will maintain its independence and integrity. That is important for all those participating in the debate. It is also clear from the points that have been canvassed in the important exchange of letters between Madam Speaker and my right hon. Friend that an eventual buyer must be fully acceptable to this House.

Mr. Dalyell: Let us suppose that, at first, the buyer fulfilled all those criteria and the sale was accepted in good faith but then, for some reason that we cannot determine here and now, things went sour and became less and less satisfactory. Can the hon. Gentleman imagine himself or one of his colleagues on the Government Front Bench coming along to this House and saying, "Sorry, we have no means of producing parliamentary documents"? That scenario is not fanciful; it could too easily happen.

Mr. Waterson: I am grateful for the opportunity to deal with that point. I have no dreams of being on the Front Bench, but if I were, I cannot imagine that scenario arising. This is a matter not between the Government and HMSO, but between this House and another place and the stationery office in its new incarnation. All Opposition Members have signally failed to appreciate the importance of a contractual relationship. At present, the arrangement between this House and HMSO does not come close to such a relationship. As my right hon. Friend explained, there will be a series of detailed provisions not only on the existing position but on any future changes in the stationery office's structure or operation, on the basis that it would have a paramount obligation that those would be subject to Parliament's requirements. As the hon. Gentleman knows, any contract would include two possibilities: first, to sue for damages; and, secondly, if a breach or breaches were sufficiently serious, to withdraw from the entire contract and claim a "fundamental breach", to use lawyers' jargon.

Beyond that, as I said in an intervention on my right hon. Friend, considerable commercial pressure will be placed on the stationery office's buyer to ensure that the relationship does not go sour. The right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster) said that such a relationship was a key factor in any privatisation. I am the first to appreciate that that is a two-edged sword, but it gives the ultimate buyer a substantial commercial incentive to ensure that the relationship does not "go sour".

To continue with the question of safeguards, it is also important that this is a fully transparent process. As my right hon. Friend said, the shortlist of bidders will be published and officials of this House—not members of the Government—will be involved in the selection. He went further and listed the wide range of consultations that will take place, not only through the usual channels, but more generally in the House and no doubt in another place.

As I said in response to the intervention of the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), the whole process will result in a detailed, legally binding and enforceable contract with the newly privatised stationery office, spelling out in great detail a range of enforceable obligations including, as I have said by way of an example, a provision that any future changes in its operation should take account of Parliament's requirements.

As a lawyer, I am the first to appreciate that the devil is in the detail. However, commercial contracts of that type are entered into all day, every day, throughout the commercial sector, and it appears to me bizarre in the extreme to suggest that there are especially insuperable obstacles to legal draftsmen about what is now proposed, especially when, in addition to the supervision of the lawyers involved, there will be such a heavy weight of other, as it were, back-seat drivers looking over their shoulder to ensure that they get the detail right to protect the requirements of the House—and all that, with the recourse to law as a back stop, should anything go especially wrong. Further, we have spoken already about the protection for existing staff under TUPE, which would mean that their existing terms and conditions would apply.

We have heard a great deal from Opposition Members about that apparent poll of employees, suggesting that 95 per cent. of them oppose the idea. Is that a surprise? If one tells people that they are likely to be hit on the head by a meteor, they will start worrying about being hit on the head by a meteor. I wonder in what terms the options available to HMSO were described to the work force.

The third main issue is: what other options exist for HMSO? We have heard some airy-fairy talk in the debate about foreign contacts, developing business overseas and so on, without any true recognition of the scale of capital outlay that might be required. We have heard about a shrinking Government market. We have also heard how, between 1990 and 1994 alone, HMSO's turnover declined by more than 10 per cent. There are job loss implications in that trend; there already have been job loss implications, and it would be foolish and irresponsible of the House not to recognise that truth.

The fourth issue is the freedom that may be introduced to the stationery office's current operations—freedom from the constraints of Government and the public sector; commercial freedom to embark on those new and exciting markets that hon. Members spoke about. The stationery office and its employees should not look nervously to the past; they should look boldly to the future. The vast experience and expertise of HMSO's staff, coupled with the efficiencies that have been won in recent years, should make it, on any view, a major player in any market, national or international.

However, as I have said, access to capital—the freedom to raise capital where and how it wishes—is essential to grow that business, like any other. In other sectors, we are witnessing the development of the private finance initiative, producing hospitals and the like, and moves to give grant-maintained schools the opportunity to borrow on the open market. That is all part of the process, which is so much a feature of the Conservative philosophy, of setting free organisations which have a role in the modern world, and which have the expertise and the commitment of their staff, but which are held back by the dead hand of the public sector.

In that context, I might mention the possibility—only briefly, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because, were I to do otherwise, you would no doubt call me to order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. The hon. Gentleman already seems to be wandering out of order, so I should be grateful if he would stick to the subject of debate, as there are other hon. Members who wish to get in.

Mr. Waterson: I was mentioning only the very same arguments that we have heard in favour of what is proposed for HMSO. Many of them could apply equally to the Royal Mail.

Finally, a significant feature of the debate has been the attitude of Opposition Members. They have opposed every privatisation, whether it be of electricity, water, British Telecom or gas, and apparently propose to oppose this one. We have heard about the railways from the right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland, who was not regarded as out of order in making that argument. There was no pledge to renationalise—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman may be a lawyer, but he does not challenge the Chair like that. I should be most grateful if he would respect the Chair and conclude his speech, as he would appear to be doing, on the subject before us.

Mr. Waterson: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was not intending to challenge your judgment, but I was suggesting that a more general issue about privatisation has run as a theme through the debate. Although I would be the first to accept that we are discussing a specific privatisation, many of the themes are common to other sectors.

However, I was drawing my remarks to a conclusion. There was no pledge to renationalise British Rail. There is apparently no pledge to renationalise HMSO.

You and I are very familiar with the process, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It begins with Opposition Members objecting strongly to a proposal to privatise. It moves on to the rubbishing of every aspect at each stage of the process, seeking to sow unjustified fears in the minds of employees, potential investors and the electorate. It continues with carping from the sidelines while the hard work proceeds and the enterprise goes ahead. The criticism becomes more muted as the privatisation is deemed a success. Labour party policies are fudged and any commitment to renationalise is quietly interred at dead of night in that rather large socialist graveyard with which we have all become familiar. Finally, there is an acceptance—usually tacit—that once again privatisation is here to stay, bringing tangible and lasting benefits to consumers, taxpayers and employees.

9.4 pm

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): The hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) spoke at some length about privatisation, but this debate is not about privatisation in the usual sense. If the Government were serious about privatising HMSO, they would present a Bill to the House so that all hon. Members could debate the matter and consider the problems in detail both in Committee and on the Floor of the House.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster is an honourable man—I have dealt with him before on transport—and he should admit that he agreed to a debate on the privatisation of HMSO, without a vote, only after sustained pressure from hon. Members and the Finance and Services Select Committee. I believe that there should be a debate with a vote—and that it should be a free vote. We are discussing the provision of services to the House. The decisions that we make in the months ahead will affect the future work of Members of Parliament, particularly Back Benchers.

When I was elected to the House in 1979, I did not realise that I could receive a transcript of the proceedings of Parliament within 12 hours of a debate taking place. Over the years, I have realised what an asset that facility is, not only to Ministers and Front-Bench spokespersons but to Back Benchers like me. When constituents write to me and ask for my views and those of other hon. Members about an issue, I can reassure them about the matter and send them a copy of Hansard within a few days of its being debated here. The service is very useful for Back Benchers who do not have the civil service back-up Ministers enjoy.

HMSO's services were developed over hundreds of years, and I do not think that we should surrender them willingly. We have an old saying in the engineering profession: "If it works, don't fix it". Why are we seeking to fix something that works very effectively for us and for the people of this country?

Many hon. Members have spoken about the control that Parliament exercises over the pricing of Hansard. Not so long ago, the Administration Select Committee—of which I am Chairman—reached the unanimous decision that Hansard should be produced more cheaply for those who supply libraries, schools, universities and other academic institutions. That is possible only if we retain control of HMSO.

It must be cause for concern that the service might be delivered into the hands of private printers. Unlike some of my hon. Friends who want to speak in the debate, I have never worked in the printing industry. It has always seemed an uncertain industry—Maxwell comes to mind—of ownership changes and asset stripping. I do not know whether the famous Lord Hanson had any influence over it—it is always argued in the tobacco industry in my Glasgow constituency that, if a company is profitable and has good industrial relations, there is no need to worry about it— but lo and behold, because a company was on a certain site, a new owner could take away the facilities that it provided for the sake of making a quick buck.

At present, HMSO is an excellent asset with printing facilities across the river at Bermondsey. We might negotiate a contract with another printing company, but what will happen if the facilities move from Bermondsey to another part of London? That would make it difficult for Hansard to be delivered on time. We all know the problems of road transportation in London.

Hon. Members know that space in the House is precious; it is used by Officers of the House, Members, back-up staff and for many other purposes. The advantage of the facilities across the river is that they provide printing and storage. No contract, no matter how tightly it is drawn up, could ensure the continuation of those facilities.

The Canadian Parliament handed over its printing service to a private contractor and it is now an absolute disaster. New Zealand is also experiencing difficulties with private contractors, as are many other Parliaments. I am not arguing about privatisation—my views are well known—but, like every other hon. Member, I want to ensure that we keep the good facilities that we have. The dedicated Hansard staff service all the Committees and work night and day to ensure that the printer receives the material.

When there is a crisis, the House appreciates the work of Hansard. I recall the Falklands and the Gulf war when Ministers and Opposition spokesmen made certain comments that we wanted to see on the record before we proceeded—and we could within hours of the House rising. We have to ask ourselves whether we want to risk losing that facility. I do not want to run that risk and I shall vote against it.

[Mr. Michael J. Martin]

We should improve our existing facilities. Putting our proceedings on the Internet and improving computer links so that more people can read about what we do in Parliament has been mentioned. The press has failed abysmally to cover the work that we do. The dedicated work that Back Benchers and Ministers do receives no press coverage, but people want to know about various issues that affect their daily lives. We must have a debate and a free vote.

9.13 pm

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury): I shall begin by taking up one theme that was mentioned by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin)—public access to the documents produced by HMSO, notably Hansard, and the other papers it presently produces for the benefit of the House.

There will be considerable agreement on both sides of the House that the day-to-day coverage of Parliament provided by newspapers and the broadcast media falls below the standard that is desirable if we want the electorate to be informed about the issues that are debated in the House and the arguments that are presented by both sides of it.

Earlier today, I received a letter from the Buckinghamshire county librarian expressing some concerns to which I hope my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to respond when he makes his welcome debut at the Dispatch Box. I believe that that librarian speaks on behalf of other, similar, services in expressing anxiety about the possible impact of the proposals on the availability of Hansard and other parliamentary papers to the general public through libraries.

As the hon. Member for Springburn said, the present policy is to supply public libraries with HMSO publications, including reports of the House's proceedings, at discounted prices, with the aim of securing a properly informed electorate. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister can reassure me that the Government intend to make binding arrangements for the discounts to be continued after privatisation.

I have no objection in principle to the privatisation of HMSO. It is, in my view, somewhat otiose to argue that only through the public sector can the House expect documents to be delivered on time and printed accurately. Those of us with experience in the private sector of the way in which our printing and publishing companies deal with documents such as annual reports, or companies' financial results, will know that that sector is perfectly capable of meeting the demanding standards that the House would wish to impose on it.

Some Opposition Members have tended to overlook the fact that the contract to produce parliamentary documents on behalf of the two Houses would be highly prized. The company would have every commercial incentive to ensure that it delivered a service to Parliament that would enable it—the publisher and printer—to boast about that service, and about its continuing contract with the House of Commons, when seeking business with other clients both here and abroad. I expect the pressures of the market to ensure the delivery of the high-quality service that the House expects.

I was grateful for the assurances that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was able to give about the procedure that will apply to the details of the proposed privatisation. I hope that Ministers will be able to give us more details of their thinking before long. I believe that it was the right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster) who spoke of the possible risk of a foreign publishing company's securing the business; I do not think that that, of itself, is to be feared. I imagine that, in any case, under European Community law it would be illegal for the Government—or, possibly, the House of Commons—to discriminate in favour of a United Kingdom company as against a company based in another European Union state.

This, however, is the important point. Will my hon. Friend the Minister assure us that all hon. Members will be informed in good time of the nature of the criteria that will apply in the judgment of the individual bids that are submitted?

Mr. Dalyell: With a foreign company, what would happen to the stringent security arrangements that now apply to the employees of HMSO?

Mr. Lidington: As I understand it, employees of a private sector company, whether it is British-owned, German-owned or American-owned, would be subject to the same process of law and to the same contractual obligations. Given the increasingly international nature of the publishing business, those are constraints of which the management of any company that sought business the Government and Parliament might offer would be well aware.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to reassure me on the points that I have raised. The principle of privatisation seems to be sensible. We are discussing a business with a considerable turnover, and the arguments adduced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster for giving it the freedom and opportunity of the private sector are sensible, but we must ensure that we get the detail right, so that we can carry the measure forward with the full support that it deserves.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Many hon. Members wish to speak, so I shall ask the Minister just two questions. First, a factual question. With whom has he discussed the matter in relation to the staff? I am told that it was not discussed with the Amalgamated Engineering and Electrical Union; the Graphical, Paper and Media Union; or the GMB. I am told that he had one somewhat cursory meeting with the Civil and Public Services Association; the Institution of Professionals, Managers and Specialists; and the National Union of Civil and Public Servants, but that, other than that, there has been no contact. When the Minister replies, can we have the factual truth—or untruth—of that situation?

Secondly, I return to vetting. We are talking about some of the most sensitive documents that our country handles. Huge amounts of money could be made. Are we entirely, as the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) suggested, to rely on contract law? What will happen about the vetting of individual employees? With the Budget statement and equally sensitive documents, it is not sufficient for the firm to give a general blanket assurance. There must be very clear track records of employees who are to handle such matters.

I should like answers to those two questions.

9.21 pm

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): Much attention has been paid today to the interests of employees of HMSO and of this House and the other place. That is quite right, but I want to say a few words about the interests of the ultimate customer—the user of official information—and the dissemination of that information using electronic means. I have no doubt that, in future, it will become common for such information to be conveyed in that way, for it to be manipulated and for added-value services to be applied to it.

The Information Committee of the House, of which I am Chairman, has already given some attention to the matter of parliamentary copyright, not specifically because the matter of privatisation has arisen but because we recognise that copyright is in many ways the key to the way in which information is used. It must be a key to open doors, not lock them. I know that some publishers are concerned that it is being used to lock doors rather than open them.

I shall speak about Crown copyright this evening, because I know that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster is planning—early in February, I believe—to complete a review of the matter and that his views will then be published. Leading firms of legal publishers such as Butterworth, Sweet and Maxwell and Longman, and specialist electronic publishers such as Context, with whom the House has an agreement for the electronic dissemination of POLIS, are concerned about what they describe as

> "the limitations that HMSO has been attempting to impose on our freedom to reproduce materials which state what the law is and how it is administered."

Few matters are as important as freedom of information in relation to the law. Ignorance of the law is no excuse and it is vital that there should be no barrier to access legal information.

I have one or two questions for my hon. Friend the Minister, who is to wind up. If the privatised stationery office is required to obtain a licence to exploit Crown copyright from that part of HMSO which remains in the public sector—I assume that it will—will that licence be offered to the stationery office on the same terms as those on offer to competing private sector publishers? Will the stationery office be in a different position from others who add value to official information? What, if any, exclusive access will the stationery office have to Crown copyright materials? Will it operate in the same way as any other publisher of information in this area or will it have a special, privileged position?

I have a specific question about the statute law database project. Work has been continuing on that database for some time and I understand that the project will be completed next year. Will the stationery office have an exclusive right to offer services from that project to the public or will an open licence be available to any suitably qualified private sector publisher? I hope that all those important matters will be addressed.

I know that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has already said in evidence to the Select Committee on Finance and Services and in his helpful comments to the House that his instinct is for open government. That is encouraging, and I hope that, when he makes his decision about the use that will be made of copyright, he will demonstrate in a tangible way that he is determined to put his words into practice.

Mr. Robert Litherland (Manchester, Central): I have been connected with the print industry for 51 years. I started in the industry as a boy of 14, and I am rightly proud of the fact that I am a sponsored member of the Graphical, Paper and Media Union. My prime allegiance is to the workers who are affected by the privatisation policy.

The question that goes begging is, "Why privatisation at all?" The Minister repeatedly recognised the quality of service and the efficiency of HMSO's workers and paid tribute to the management and staff for their commercial success in recent years. Why the big hurry? Why are we discussing a deadline of the summer of 1996?

From the Minister's speech and from his statement last week, it appears that the arguments are excuse rather than good reason. It all boils down to the Government's policy of privatising public concerns however successful they may be. Their dogmatic approach is that HMSO must be privatised although, as hon. Members in all parts of the House have said, it is working and providing a good service.

A great deal of money has gone into the streamlining of this successful enterprise and I query the investment. Is it another example of the fattening-up process that takes place before every privatisation? HMSO is a free-standing organisation that has never had any history of leaks of highly sensitive details and that should be allowed to compete in the outside market and has the capability to do so—but to this Government that would be heresy.

What is dismaying—hon. Members have called for it tonight—and needs extra debate and questioning is the Minister's inability to give complete assurances on whether future private owners will sell on after purchase. He cannot give an assurance on what workers' pensions will be, whether they will be secure and whether all the terms and conditions, such as pay, holidays, health and safety, will be met. Can he give an assurance that a future owner—my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) mentioned it—could not be a foreign printer, perhaps a powerful German printer?

What about the most precious commodity of all: the workers. What will they make of the Minister's remarks? Will the proposal be to their benefit in the long run? I and, I am sure, they come to the conclusion, "Not a lot". They are not fools, Minister. They have witnessed the redundancies following the privatisation of gas, water and electricity.

The fattening up may be good for the fat cats, but it will be disastrous for many workers. What a prospect that is to offer workers just before Christmas, when they will sit with their families and ponder what next year will bring and what predicament they will be in. As has been said, the results of a ballot gave workers' views loud and clear: 95 per cent. voted against privatisation.

From the Speaker of the House down to the shop floor, concern is being expressed. The letter from the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to Madam Speaker states:

> "I recognise, and am sympathetic to, the concerns which you raise about the service which HMSO provides to the House and how to safeguard it for the future."

[Mr. Robert Litherland]

I shall not give a long quotation, but it continues:

> "No supplier would want to be associated with a failure to deliver the services required by such a noteworthy customer. Done well, the Parliamentary business would be the best possible advertisement for the company. Done badly, other potential customers would take flight."

To me, that reply does not reek with confidence. What would happen if the new owners could not meet their obligations? Perhaps, in his winding-up speech, the Minister will explain who would be accountable.

As has been recognised, there is cross-party concern for HMSO's future. We wonder where privatisation will end when, now, it is on our very Parliament's doorstep.

I am getting the nod to end my speech, but I for one, unlike the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, do not believe that a relationship with the private sector can be stronger or better than what we have now. I agree with the argument that there should be further debates and that the matter should go to a free vote.

Mr. Peter Mandelson (Hartlepool): This debate has been useful. It has revealed the paucity of the Government's argument on the privatisation of HMSO and exposed some serious and justified concerns among not just Opposition Members but Conservative Members. It has focused attention on employees' understandable anxieties. I hope that the Minister will respond in particular to the questions raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell).

The debate has left unanswered a host of legitimate questions about the future course of our parliamentary proceedings and work if privatisation goes ahead. I perfectly understand why the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson) has, as he said, decided to quit the House at the next election. He had some very strong things to say about the Conservative party.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: I ask the hon. Gentleman not to put a spin on what I may have said, and I hope that he will not misquote me further.

Mr. Mandelson: I do not want to count my turkeys or my chickens, but the hon. Gentleman had some harsh words to say about the Government's attitude toward public service. I share his views entirely. I will only say in addition that if he felt reassured by what the Minister had to say to him about job losses, he is very easily satisfied indeed.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster) made clear at the outset, the Opposition do not agree with this privatisation. We take that view not because we are opposed to all private sector involvement in the delivery of public services—I can reassure the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) on that point—but because privatisation for its own sake, regardless of economy, efficiency or effectiveness, simply cannot be justified.

The privatisation of HMSO is unwarranted on those three grounds. It is a needless rigamarole that involves great risks to the service that Parliament receives from HMSO. In all probability, it will leave everyone worse off or, at the least, dissatisfied—including, as I shall argue, quite possibly the private sector purchasers too. In our view, the privatisation is a recipe for huge tensions, if not chaos, between the prospective private purchaser and its chief clients—Parliament and the Crown—as my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) made very clear, and as my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Garrett) spelled out in his detailed and comprehensive speech.

This is of course the latest in a series of unjustified privatisations which have been pushed forward by the Government. One wonders where the Government's next lurch to the right will lead. Perhaps Madam Speaker herself will be next in the firing line. Perhaps she will be sponsored, rather as the speaking clock that says, "The time as sponsored by Accurist." We might hear, "Order—as sponsored by Securicor." That may be a joke, but then the Government are proceeding with the privatisation of the railways. If they can do that, anything might follow.

I come directly to what the Minister has described—he placed great stress on this in his original statement to the House last week—as the "point of substance" and the "nub of the issue". He maintains that, to safeguard jobs and expand job opportunities, HMSO should become a private sector company so that it can enjoy the freedoms of the private marketplace and avail itself of the opportunities that are provided by free competition, unshackled, unconstrained and uninhibited by the burdens at present placed on it by its public service and Parliament-related obligations.

I agree that that is the nub of the issue. On the surface of it—certainly as presented by the Minister—what he is setting out has some attractions to it, in his terms. In making his case, however, the Minister is being thoroughly disingenuous because the realities of the marketplace could turn out to be very different. As one hon. Member after another has made clear, we are not dealing with the privatisation of any ordinary business. If anyone had any doubt about that, Madam Speaker's letter to the Leader of the House and the 12 conditions which she set out make it absolutely clear that we are dealing not with an ordinary business but with an essential and highly complicated public service.

Let us examine the case that the Minister made last week and again tonight. He seeks to create the impression of a wonderful free market nirvana, which is set to liberate the imprisoned business of HMSO. In the next minute, he is anxious to spell out and emphasise that, in its work for Parliament and for the Crown, nothing will change and therefore the handcuffs will stay on; every protection, every peculiar standard and idiosyncrasy that we demand in this place, every vagary, every pressure, every timetable, every ebb and flow of parliamentary business will be met faithfully and on time by the newly privatised business.

That does not sound like commercial freedom to me in its accepted sense. It sounds like the sort of framework and conditions that are not linked to the costs, competition or considerations of profit, which are the basis of private business, but are instead fundamental to the provision of public service.

Of course there will be attractions to the private sector. The Minister has previously described HMSO as a valuable asset with substantial recent investment in plant and machinery. Who could gainsay the rich pickings there? But how long will that attraction last and how long will the new owners' interest be sustained if the business is maintained in its present state, as the Minister has claimed and promised repeatedly tonight?

The Minister said in his original statement that the new owners will organise their business as they are told to do in order to safeguard HMSO's unique parliamentary and public service obligations. What other self-respecting private business is told by its customer which specific "nature and structure" its company will have, not only now but for all time? The Minister used that description.

According to the Minister, Parliament will even be entitled to lay down

"the location of the press and the staff and the way in which the business is structured and organised."—[Official Report, 13 December 1995; Vol. 268, c. 993.]

He says that the business will not be broken up. The parliamentary press will be integral to the rest of the business and it will all stay as it is at the moment, so the Minister insists. According to him, the customer will be calling the shots about the supply of products in every respect. Some commercial freedom that. I do not call that an ordinary commercial freedom. I find it a very exotic definition of commercial freedom—if the Minister is to be believed. Of course we are entitled to wonder how far that will be the case and how his promises will be fulfilled in practice.

Let us not get on to the practice; let us dwell a little longer on the principle that the Minister enunciated in his speech. In relation to their official printing and publishing work, the new private owners—apparently—will be bound hand and foot by a Draconian, far-reaching all-embracing contract, the Minister claims, imposed by its core customers: ourselves and the Crown. Will these conditions, dictated by public service and Parliament's needs, really offer the privatised stationery office the full opportunities to roam, compete in the marketplace on an equal footing with its rivals, and pick up business as and when and where it wishes, as the tender document implies? I rather doubt it.

If something has to give in this arrangement, I think that I know what it will be. Will it be the company's commercial freedom or our publishing needs? I think that market forces will have their way and no slap on the wrist from us or attempted enforcement of our contract is likely to have any sway at all in the face of those overwhelming market forces, which the Minister has said—and advocates—as the proper conditions in which this new privatised business should operate.

The whole complicated and unnecessary exercise is a thoroughly misconceived and botched job from start to finish. It has been dreamed up by the peddlers of right-wing dogma who infest the modern Tory party. They change the name, change the status, introduce private shareholders, and clothe the whole thing in reassuring rhetoric, all as long as the private sector can be substituted in form and appearance for what is at the moment an extremely successful public enterprise.

That is the nub of the issue. The privatisation is not about safeguarding jobs and expanding job opportunities, as the Minister has claimed, but about protecting Tory dogma and advancing ministerial careers. The idea is to get one more privatisation scalp on the Government's belt, and, incidentally, many thousands of pounds more in the pockets of Coopers and Lybrand in the process, and then to sit back as the whole thing proceeds to fall apart. Of course it will not be those on the Conservative Front Bench who will clear up the mess; it will be us.

I am not surprised that the Government have fixed the debate so that no vote can take place at the end of it. Too many of their own Back Benchers—we have heard from many of them tonight—know that the privatisation is a needless, pointless, wasteful exercise, which, in its haste and clumsiness, will result in Parliament, its authorities and staff having to spend more time, more energy and more money on getting the same or worse service than they get from the current arrangements. What on earth is the point?

On behalf of the Opposition, I welcome the Parliamentary Secretary to his new position. I hope that he will be able to give a darn sight better explanation of this crack-brained scheme and a much better justification of it than we have heard to date. I hope that the assurances that have been called for on timing and other considerations will be given, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Bishop Auckland requested. Better still, the Minister could do us all an enormous favour and announce to general relief all round that the Government have had second thoughts in the Tea Room and called the exercise off. If they cannot do that, let us test the opinion of Parliament and put the issue to a proper vote in the new year.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service (Mr. David Willetts): This debate has been a welcome opportunity for hon. Members on both sides of the House to express their views about the effect of the proposed privatisation of HMSO on services provided to Parliament.

The debate has arisen from a series of concerns which Madam Speaker herself expressed in her letter of 28 November, and to which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster gave a full reply in his letter of 12 December.

It appears that the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) is not familiar with the fundamental points that my right hon. Friend made in his letter. It has been made clear before, and I am pleased to take this opportunity to repeat the point, that, for example, no supplier taking on the responsibility of a privatised HMSO would possibly want to be associated with the failure to deliver the services required by such a noteworthy customer as ourselves. There is an enormous potential for the House to ensure that it gets the services which it is rightly entitled to expect through a clear, enforceable and legally binding legal contract.

Mr. Mandelson: Where are the sanctions?

Mr. Willetts: The hon. Gentleman does not seem to understand the power of a legal contract in terms of the quality and the enforceability of service that it can bring. The sanctions would be available through law rather than through arrangements within the public sector. The sanctions would be explicit, legally enforceable, contractual arrangements.

[Mr. Willetts]

We have already made it clear that it is ultimately for the House to set that contract. We will work with officials of the House to ensure that it reflects the issues that have been legitimately raised in the debate.

Mr. Michael J. Martin: It is all very well for the Minister to talk about a contract; but it is not a contract to deliver 20 pints of milk to the door of the House of Commons but one to deliver the record of the parliamentary proceedings. If that is held up even by a day, it can cause havoc and represents a great deal of work wasted by the dedicated Hansard staff.

Mr. Willetts: That is why the contract could make it clear, for example, that local overnight production facilities should be available close to the House. These matters should be made explicit in a contract. Although this is a matter for the House rather than for the Government, I would suggest that there is potential for the House to set out clearly and enforce more rigorously the standards that it is rightly expecting.

Mr. Garrett: The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster said that the House would have a hand in the selection of the company to take over HMSO. How will that be done?

Mr. Willetts: Through Madam Speaker, we have invited officials of the House to become involved in all stages of privatisation, including the selection of the final winning tender.

Mr. Dalyell: Have they agreed?

Mr. Willetts: Perhaps I might carry on.

Mr. Channon: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Beith: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Willetts: I give way to my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon).

Mr. Channon: I may be interrupting the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). When dealing with the position of members of staff of the House, would it not be wrong for them to take part in that sort of decision? Surely they will be observers of, rather than active participants in, any such Committee.

Mr. Willetts: This is ultimately a matter for the House—it is not a matter for the Government. I can only say that the Government have invited, through Madam Speaker, the officials of the House to become involved in the process. It is not for the Government ultimately to decide.

Mr. Derek Foster rose—

Mr. Dalyell: Have they agreed?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) must control himself. [Interruption.] Is the Minister giving way?

Mr. Willetts: I give way to the right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster).

Mr. Foster: I am sorry to intervene, as I know that the Minister's time is short. However, this is a crucial point. My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow is asking whether the officials of the House have agreed to take part in such a privatisation procedure—yes or no.

Mr. Willetts: It is not for me to speak for the officials of the House. I have made clear on behalf of the Government that an invitation has been offered, but it is not for me to speak on behalf of the House. It would be impertinent for me to try to do that. That is why we have exchanged some important correspondence with Madam Speaker on this subject, but I am not going to try to tell the House how it should conduct its own affairs.

Mr. Beith: May I make it clear on behalf of the House of Commons Commission that the invitation that the Commission received was for officials to take part in a process by which a contract would be prepared? The Commission would be willing to allow the officials to attend such a meeting as observers only, to make clear what the interests of the House are, and not as participants. The Commission has not yet considered the invitation—because it is entirely new—to officials to be involved in the selection of a company that might be entrusted with such a contract. That matter has not yet been considered.

Mr. Willetts: It is very important that the House should be satisfied at all stages that the winning company meets the requirements that the House wishes to specify for the contract. That is ultimately a matter for the House, rather than for the Government. We, for our part, will do everything possible to ensure—

Mr. Garrett: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Willetts: I am afraid that I must make some progress. There are a lot of other points that I wish to cover, and I have only eight minutes remaining.

One of the other matters raised was the question of TUPE, and the hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) asked questions on that subject. I can assure him that TUPE applies at the moment of transfer, and TUPE will apply in this case. There is no period of time attached to TUPE as it takes place at a specific moment. The reason why people reflect on a 90-day rule is that if any employer wishes to change the terms of employment of his or her employees, it is normally thought reasonable by the courts to offer that sort of period of notice. That is a separate matter from TUPE.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) raised the issue of security vetting. If a Government Department contracting with HMSO has an important security concern, it will be perfectly free to specify exactly what security vetting of individual employees is necessary for it to publish such documents, as it does at the moment. The hon. Gentleman also asked about consultation with the trade unions. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has already had one meeting with trade union representatives and he hopes to have further meetings with them in the new year.

The hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Garrett) and my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) asked me about the arrangements for ensuring that the quality of public debate was encouraged—something about which both sides of the House care—by continuing the current arrangements whereby public libraries received government documents at a discount. I am pleased to be able to give my hon. Friend the assurance that those arrangements will continue.

Underneath the variety of specific points raised in the debate, perfectly legitimately, there was a deeper problem. The problem is that, for the past 15 years, every time we have explained the merits of privatisation, the Opposition have steadfastly refused to understand them. The fears voiced by the Opposition have been proved false by events. Yet again, we had today the threadbare arguments that we have heard before every privatisation. The right hon. Member for Bishop Auckland implied that private business men were sleazy and could not be trusted with money. We were told that the security requirements were such that it would be impossible for the requisite standards to be met by a private contractor. I must tell hon. Members that we can be proud that many of the world's banknotes are printed by private security printers in this country.

There is an assumption that only public ownership will do. There is an assumption that if one has a public policy objective, one has to own the means of production, distribution and supply and that, otherwise, one has no means of meeting those public policy objectives. That is our fundamental disagreement with the Labour party and it remains as clear now as it was when we embarked on privatisation 15 years ago.

Labour Members now ask why HMSO cannot enjoy greater market freedom to compete with the private sector while remaining within the public sector. That argument at least reflects a recognition that things cannot carry on as they are. Anyone who looks at the figures for HMSO over the past few years can understand why. In 1990, its turnover was £389 million. In 1994, its turnover was £351 million. In 1990, it had 3,400 employees; it now has 2,900. As currently constituted, subject to all the inevitable constraints of the public sector, the business will not be able to thrive. We offer the best prospect for the employees of HMSO to be part of a growing and expanding business.

It would simply not be acceptable to allow a public sector trading organisation, which borrows from the national loans fund—it has, incidentally, £30 million of public sector borrowing outstanding at present—to go out and compete with private sector printers or publishers. It would not be reasonable for a body that would not pay corporation tax to compete in the private sector. It would not be reasonable to expect Ministers, who are accountable to the House, to allow HMSO to take on commercial risks when those risks would ultimately be borne by the taxpayer.

The only way in which HMSO can enjoy the freedom that the Opposition now say they wish it to enjoy is for it to be part of the private sector. That is the only credible way forward. At the moment, HMSO faces increasing competitive pressure in its public sector marketplace. We have heard claims that the Ministry of Defence is now looking to market-test its publishing and printing requirements. I am not aware of that taking place as a result of the prospective privatisation of HMSO. It is what is going on throughout the public sector. The public sector is free to choose where it goes to purchase its printing and publishing services.

HMSO is competing with private bodies for public sector work. As currently constituted, it has no reciprocal freedom to go out and compete with private sector providers for business in the private sector. I do not believe that any hon. Member, on careful consideration of the arguments, could possibly imagine that HMSO could remain in the public sector and have such freedoms. All the Opposition Members who have said that they wish it to have greater freedom while remaining in the public sector have made as clear a case as one could possibly imagine for the privatisation of HMSO as the only way forward.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is the tradition of the House that the Department of the Clerk of the House is not brought into controversy. May I suggest that you bring to Madam Speaker's attention what has been said tonight and that she might take a statement on the position?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I can help the hon. Gentleman. The Speaker has already ruled on the matter. I thought that the hon. Gentleman might have been aware of that.

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

BROADCASTING

Ordered,

That Mr. Patrick McLoughlin be discharged from the Select Committee on Broadcasting and Mr. Derek Conway be added to the Committee.—[Mr. Bates.]

PUBLIC SERVICE

Ordered,

That Mr. Peter Ainsworth, Mr. Hartley Booth, Sir Sydney Chapman, Mr. Jim Cousins, Mr. Nigel Evans, Mr. John Gunnell, Mr. David Hanson, Mr. David Hunt, Sir Peter Lloyd, Mr. Giles Radice and Dr. Tony Wright be members of the Select Committee on Public Service.—[Mr. MacKay, on behalf of the Committee of Selection.]

PETITION

Nursery Schools (Rochdale)

10 pm

Mr. Jim Callaghan (Heywood and Middleton): I beg to ask leave to present a petition which reads:

To the House of Commons.

The Petition of the residents of Rochdale Borough and other places

Declares that the Government's proposals for funding the education of under five year olds by a system of vouchers exchangeable for a sum payable to an institution would have a negative effect on the provision of education for the five year olds in the Rochdale Borough and would put at risk the existing eight nursery schools.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Education to reconsider the proposals for funding nursery education via the system of vouchers with a view to establishing a fairer and more efficient way of providing children under five with the best possible education in their early years.

And the Petitioners remain.

There were 2,550 petitioners, and the petition was signed by Colin Lambert and others.

To lie upon the Table.

The Lizzards, West Drayton

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Bates.]

10.2 pm

Sir Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise a matter of great importance to my constituents who live in Yiewsley and West Drayton—the unauthorised and non-conforming industrial activity taking place on a 22-acre site in the metropolitan green belt.

I wish to declare an outside interest in that I am president of the London Green Belt Council, a voluntary association of residents' associations around London. My position is honorary and unpaid.

The site to which I refer is known locally as The Lizzards. Access to it is via Tavistock road and Trout road, Yiewsley. The activity about which my constituents have complained is the reprocessing of waste materials and the crushing of concrete. I am advised on good authority that much of the waste material is being imported from other contractors by a company known as Towerway Ltd.

The waste apparently includes earth, blocks of concrete reinforced with steel and similar material which is thought to come from motorway construction works. My information is that Towerway Ltd. makes a charge for receiving this material and is engaged in its resale. I am advised that Towerway claims to occupy the land under licence from a company known as Guinea Enterprises Ltd., which is registered in the Isle of Man. The directors are Isle of Man residents and are not known to the local planning authority.

The use of The Lizzards for this industrial activity came to my attention in the spring. A number of my constituents living in Tavistock road became aware of an unusually large number of heavy lorries using their road. The lorries were loaded with soil and concrete and entering the site by means of a makeshift road, which had been bulldozed across open land and given a temporary tarmac surface to enable entry. People living in Trout road also reported increased heavy lorry traffic. They have complained to me about a misuse of green belt land and an intolerable increase in heavy traffic along a residential road.

I immediately raised the matter with officers of Hillingdon council planning department, the local planning authority, who confirmed that they had informed Towerway Ltd. that its activity was non-conforming. As a result, on 24 April this year, the company applied for retrospective planning permission. Although, on 4 July, Hillingdon council rejected the application, the company disregarded the planning control and continued its activities. As a result, during the long hot summer that followed, my constituents continued to suffer from the noise of an unending procession of heavy lorries thundering past their homes from as early as 6.30 am, with an accompanying spillage of soil and other material on the public highway.

My constituents also suffered the loss of the amenity constituted by the green belt land, which is part of the Colne Valley park and intended for the public's general enjoyment. I inspected the site several times during the summer months and was saddened to see how large piles of soil had formed a large bank adjoining the bridleway, trees had been crushed, and an amenity that has been enjoyed for many years by local people who like to walk their dogs and enjoy the open landscape had been spoilt.

In spite of local planning officers' efforts, that company continues an unauthorised and objectionable activity in defiance of our planning laws. May I tell the House about the traffic volume? On Friday 15 December, no fewer than 107 vehicles travelled up and down Tavistock road between 6.30 am and 5 pm. On Saturday, the traffic started at 6.40 am and continued until just after 3 pm. Today, the traffic started at 6.40 am and, by mid morning, 23 lorries had gone up and down the road. How are my constituents to sleep, given the noise from those heavy lorries? It is an intolerable level of traffic on a quiet, mainly residential street.

The reprocessing activity is unlicensed and does not conform to regulations made by the London Waste Regulation Authority in accordance with the Environmental Protection Act 1990, which deal with transporting and recycling waste. I am advised that the authority has threatened prosecution. As a result of my interest in the matter, I received a letter from the planning and property consultants acting for Towerway Ltd. It claims that the company is engaged in a major restoration job by restoring the land to agricultural use without recourse to public funds and that residents should acknowledge that they live on historically commercial access roads and that lawful traffic and commercial activities share their right to be there.

From the inquiries that I have made, I can demonstrate that that is not a lawful activity and that Towerway Ltd. has no right to be there. The site in question was originally owned by the Henry Boyer trust. It was transferred to Guinea Enterprises Ltd. in the recent past but no transfer has been registered at the Land Registry. Before 1947, part of the site was filled or overfilled with a variety of types of refuse, including tyres, concrete and scrap metal. In 1947, the former Middlesex county council gave permission for gravel winning and excavation. There was also a requirement for the treatment of the filled land, not all of which may have been carried out.

In 1964, there was a consent by the Middlesex county council for the clearance of tip refuse, and that material has been extracted since then for road construction. I am advised that Towerway is not removing tipped refuse alone, but is engaged in reprocessing and tipping, for which planning permission is required. As I have mentioned, no such planning permission has been granted, so now we have an unauthorised activity on land that, until earlier this year, was valuable open space, acting as an important lung in the green belt.

Many of the activities of Towerway are, I am told, not new to the local planning authority, which has already had to cope with similar activity on green belt land at several sites, including Bungalow farm off the Bath road at Longford in the south of the borough. As a result of that case, there was a public inquiry and an appeal by the company was dismissed. Enforcement proceedings are now in progress. Hillingdon council is taking appropriate enforcement action in the case of Towerway's use of The Lizzards. However, that is a lengthy process and meanwhile the non-conforming use continues, to the detriment of local residents.

I have suggested to my hon. Friend the Minister—this is one of my principal reasons for mentioning the matter in the House—that the provisions of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 are inadequate to solve the problem of non-conforming users who completely disregard the established planning controls. It is difficult for planning authorities to cope with well-informed operators who know how to play the system. If they are registered offshore, they can attempt to avoid control by simply changing their name when action is taken. They are what I can only describe as "chameleon companies".

I shall explain to the House the way in which those companies avoid control. When an enforcement notice is issued, there is a right of appeal, which takes 12 months or more to be heard. Meanwhile, the offending activity continues. The stop notice procedure was intended to be an effective emergency remedy in such circumstances, but is inadequate because a local planning officer cannot effectively enforce the notice on the operator, who usually keeps a low profile and is not easy to identify or to find on the site.

It is no use trying to enforce a notice against a lorry driver entering or leaving the site. The stop notice must be effective against the operator in person. Such people make it their business not to be available for that purpose. It can be difficult to demonstrate in a criminal court that they have acted in breach of a notice if they control activities off site.

If the operator is on site, how does the enforcement officer tackle him? He is armed with little more than his pen and his personality. He has no power of arrest. He would have to be accompanied by a police officer. As we all know, police time is valuable; an officer is not always easily available for that purpose.

At Bungalow farm, Longford, where a stop notice was served at 7 am, another lorry entered the site shortly afterwards. The driver was cautioned, but then he vanished and the unauthorised activity continued. If the driver could have been arrested by a police officer, it would have been a huge deterrent. He might have been subject to a fine of £20,000 in a magistrates court and an unlimited fine in the Crown court. However, the offence was not an arrestable offence.

I wonder, therefore, whether my hon. Friend the Minister will consider discussing with my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary the possibility of making such persistent and flagrant disregard of a stop notice subject to a custodial sentence. Another possibility might be to give a local authority power to take physical steps to stop the breach, perhaps by confiscating equipment or preventing access to the site in question by installing structures or barriers to the site off the public highway.

Knowing my hon. Friend the Minister as I do, I hope that he will give his careful consideration to the difficulties that are being experienced by my constituents, and which I have described tonight. I hope that he will use all of his influence to support the local authority and, if he can, help to bring relief to my beleaguered constituents in Yiewsley and West Drayton.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir Paul Beresford): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Sir M. Shersby) for raising this particular difficulty. I understand from his description the difficulties experienced by his constituents who live anywhere near the sites. They are inevitably affected by the heavy lorry movements, the noise, dust and disturbance. It is particularly annoying for them when they believe that those activities are not within the law, as no planning permission was applied for.

My hon. Friend will know that I cannot comment on the merits of the allegedly unauthorised activities that are taking place on the sites, or on the planning enforcement action that the council is taking now or may take in the future. It is possible that the matters may be the subject of some form of appeal to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

Nevertheless, there are lessons to be learnt. We suspect that so-called cowboys have set out to ride roughshod over the planning control regime. In 1989, the planning enforcement regime was reviewed thoroughly. That review was quickly followed up by the Government, and the Planning and Compensation Act 1991 was enacted as a result.

Authorities have a versatile and effective tool kit for dealing with the whole range of unauthorised development and I encourage local authorities—particularly this one—to utilise that to the full. I suspect that the local authorities may be able to go a little further in certain areas.

One of the most important provisions in the 1991 Act is that enabling authorities to counter a particularly harmful breach of control. They may seek an enforcement injunction in the High Court or the county court. If the courts grant an injunction, it will be directed at named individuals, or at companies, who will be required to stop the activity involved in the alleged breach of control. An injunction can also be sought if an authority anticipates that a breach of control is about to take place. Anyone named in an injunction who does not observe its requirements will usually be in contempt of the court. Continuing contempt may result in a term of imprisonment.

To make it easier to obtain that type of injunction, a special procedure enables an authority to obtain an injunction against someone whose identity is unknown. That can assist authorities greatly if they are dealing with a fly-by-night operator who presents a false identity or who is adept at changing his or his company's name. I can remember a local authority resorting to long-range camera photography in order to nail certain individuals.

An authority may issue an enforcement notice and reinforce its effect with a stop notice. There is no right of appeal to the Secretary of State against a stop notice, so it can effectively prohibit an unauthorised activity almost immediately. The maximum summary penalty on conviction of not complying with the prohibition in the notice was increased from £2,000 to £20,000 by the 1991 Act.

We sometimes hear criticism that planning authorities are reluctant to use a stop notice because it may result in their having to pay financial compensation to the person whose activities are prohibited by the stop notice if that person succeeds in an accompanying enforcement appeal to the Secretary of State. In fact, compensation would not be payable if the enforcement appeal succeeded on the grounds that planning permission should be granted. If the appeal succeeds on one of the other legal grounds in section 174(2) of the 1990 Act, some compensation may be payable, depending on the particular circumstances.

I believe that planning authorities do not need to fear having to pay compensation if they draft their enforcement notices correctly in relation to planning law and the facts of the alleged breach. We know that enacting planning legislation is not enough. The Government's policy and procedural guidance to planning authorities also play a part. My Department's planning policy guidance note 18, entitled "Enforcing Planning Control", emphasises that the Government do not condone any wilful breach of planning control and that they encourage vigorous enforcement action to stop or remedy unacceptable unauthorised development.

Earlier this year, consultants appointed by my Department completed a review of the effectiveness of the enforcement amendments in the 1991 Act and a copy of their report is in the Library of the House. The consultants concluded:

> "This review of the use and effectiveness of the enforcement system indicates that the new and amended provisions introduced by the 1990/1991 Planning Acts are largely working well and that significant legislative change is not required".

That is generally reassuring. In the first instance, perhaps my hon. Friend should look to his local authority to take some of the hints and suggestions that have been made and be a little more forward in attacking the problem.

Nevertheless, my hon. Friend has related such a tale of horror that I shall look again at the matter to see whether we can learn anything from it. We shall keep the enforcement procedure under close review. I have considerable sympathy with my hon. Friend and I wish him well in his bid to rid his constituents of the difficulties that he has related to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT

Local Authority Housing

1. Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to encourage more local authorities to transfer their housing stock to alternative landlords. [4875]

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. John Gummer): To facilitate the transfer of council estates in poor condition, I announced on 28 November a new deprived estates challenge fund worth more than £300 million over the next three years.

Mr. Waterson: Does my right hon. Friend agree that large-scale voluntary transfers of housing stock have several benefits, including the diversification of housing stock, better management and faster repairs for tenants while providing capital receipts for local authorities which can be put back into social housing, used to pay off debts or used to reduce the council tax burden on council tax payers?

Mr. Gummer: I agree with my hon. Friend, and I am pleased to see that authorities such as Manchester are now seeking to use LSVT to ensure that they can tap the capital that is tied up in housing estates and use it for the benefit of tenants.

Area Cost Adjustment

2. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects the inquiry into the area cost adjustment to be concluded; and if he will make a statement. [4876]

The Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration (Mr. David Curry): It is our intention that the review team should report in June 1996. Professor Robert Elliott of the University of Aberdeen has agreed to chair the review of the area cost adjustment. He is an expert on labour markets and earnings in the public sector. The local authority associations have nominated Roy MacIver, until recently the Secretary-General of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities. My right hon. Friend has nominated David McDonald, a former under-secretary in my Department.

Draft terms of reference for the review are being discussed by members of the review team and local authorities' representatives. When these are settled, a copy will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Fabricant: That sounds encouraging. Does my hon. Friend agree that there must be something intrinsically wrong with a system whereby a school in Staffordshire with 900 students receives more than £250,000 less than a similar school in Surrey which has similar costs? Is not it even more wrong that Labour-controlled Staffordshire council is sitting on huge reserves which it does not use? Is it not about time that we funded schools centrally from the Department for Education and Employment? Let us have central funding, but local control.

Mr. Curry: I do not agree that something is intrinsically wrong with a system in which there are differences in funding. The fact is that there are schools in different areas, and the purpose of the review is to find out what the total additional costs are. On that matter, my hon. Friend and I will have to agree to disagree.

As far as Staffordshire is concerned, a 3.1 per cent. permitted increase in budget and a 5 per cent. per capita increase in education funding should be fully adequate to fund increased demography and any reasonable teachers' pay award.

Mr. Tipping: The Minister said that the report would be available in June next year. Will he now give a commitment that a new and fair system will be in place for the financial year 1997-98? Does he appreciate that local authorities want action and not words? The present system discriminates against Nottinghamshire and the east midlands, which just want a fair deal.

Mr. Curry: Everyone wants a fair deal, but everyone disagrees as to what that fair deal is. There is a very good case for taking into account total employment costs around the country. In the review, we are trying to bring up to date this indicator, as we do with other indicators on a regular cycle. If the review team is able to come up with an agreed outcome which is robust and gives better answers than we have at the moment, we will seek to employ that at the earliest opportunity.

Sir Anthony Grant: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the present system prescribes that a person who takes one step across the border of Cambridgeshire into Bedfordshire is suddenly deemed to be in a very expensive area? Is this not a crazy system which has gone on for far too long? I appreciate my hon. Friend's efforts in this matter, but will he make sure that there is no undue delay in the review? Will he consider using the travel-to-work area system, rather than the arbitrary county boundaries?

Mr. Curry: We examined carefully the travel-to-work area system in the past year, and it did not prove sufficiently robust. The county councils tried to make their scheme of actual costs work, and that did not work either. That is why we have introduced an independent review, and we have appointed as chairman somebody who is an expert in labour market economics, because this is about costs in the labour market. I hope that the review will be able to produce a robust outcome that all the parties will agree produces the best system. That is perhaps the most optimistic part of my expectations.

Mr. Dobson: Can the Minister confirm that, according to Government figures, if Staffordshire county council were to receive the same grant allocation for education per pupil as the Tory borough of Westminster, it would be able to recruit 4,895 extra teachers next year?

Mr. Curry: Would the hon. Gentleman like to make the same calculation for Tower Hamlets, Hackney, Camden and Lambeth? What benefits Westminster benefits all the other inner London authorities, and it is about time that the hon. Gentleman realised it.

Local Government Finance

3. Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the effects of the decision to raise capping limits on local authority expenditure. [4877]

Mr. Gummer: The flexibility is to enable local authorities to meet priorities in education, and has been given in response to local authorities' requests and assurances that they will act responsibly.

Mr. Spring: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the proposed capping limits for Suffolk county council should prevent it from wasting taxpayers' money? Does he share my outrage at the squandering of council tax payers' money in the form of the council leader's Christmas card, which bears the red rose insignia of the Labour party? Does my right hon. Friend agree that such an utterly tasteless display of Labour propaganda at Christmas is an absolute disgrace?

Mr. Gummer: I was surprised, as my hon. Friend was, to receive such a Christmas card from the Labour leader of Suffolk county council. I believe that the Opposition would be extremely annoyed if the Department of the Environment sent out Christmas cards with the Tory torch—even though that would be justified, as only the Government have an environment policy.

Ms Eagle: As the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has admitted that the settlement for schools will be used up by increased numbers of pupils, salaries and inflation, and as the Treasury has also admitted that council taxes are expected to go up by 8 per cent., is not it therefore true that council tax payers will be paying more and getting less under the new settlement?

Mr. Gummer: No, I do not think that it is. The hon. Lady would know that, if she looked at the facts and at councils that are properly run and that seek to make savings when unnecessary spending takes place. We have just heard about a small example in Suffolk. More than £2 million has been spent on signs for roads in Suffolk, and £250,000 on a road that will never be built. That is only in one county, and if that money were applied to education, much more could be done.

Mr. Atkins: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the removal of capping restrictions, together with the 5.5 per cent. increase in the education budget for Lancashire, means that there is no excuse whatever for the county council not to pass on that money in full to schools; and that no justification from the controlling Labour group will be accepted as an excuse if parents, Members of Parliament and others see that that does not happen?

Mr. Gummer: I am sure that everybody in Lancashire, as in every county in the country, now knows precisely how much extra money is available for schools. If it does not get through to the schools, it will be the Labour-controlled county council's fault.

Empty Houses

4. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many empty houses there are in the United Kingdom. [4878]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. James Clappison): There are 845,000 empty houses in England.

Mr. Cunningham: When will the Minister stop being complacent about the large numbers of homeless people? Specifically, what will he do about the Department of Trade and Industry's void properties and the Ministry of Defence's void properties?

Mr. Clappison: The hon. Gentleman should know of the importance that we attach to reducing the number of empty Government-owned homes. We made that a priority in our White Paper; and the announcement of the privatisation of married quarters will also assist the process. The hon. Gentleman should also realise that, included in the total that I have given him, there are a large number of empty private properties, many of which have been brought into use in the private rented sector during the past few years as a result of our deregulation proposals. The Labour party always wants more regulation—that is the party's instinct—which would reduce the supply and reduce the amount of private rented accommodation available for homeless people.

Mr. Dunn: Although I accept that a large number of empty homes are owned by local authorities, will the Minister confirm that 18 of the 20 worst local authorities in terms of empty homes are Labour-controlled?

Mr. Clappison: Certainly. It is a shame that some local authorities with high numbers of vacant properties cannot reach the standards of those with low numbers. Hackney, Labour-controlled, has the highest number of empty properties—5 per cent. It is a shame that it cannot match the standards of Wandsworth, fewer than 1 per cent. of whose properties are vacant.

Mr. Raynsford: Why will not Ministers acknowledge their failure to tackle the scandal of empty properties, instead of attacking local authorities? Incidentally, local authorities are the only organisations to have reduced the number of their empty properties in the past few years. Will the Minister recognise that the Government's record is the worst of all? The number of empty Government properties has increased scandalously, in fact. The Ministry of Defence has the worst record; its homes should now be offered to people in need instead of being privatised under the disgraceful deal which the Secretary of State for Defence is doing with his adviser.

Mr. Clappison: It is a shame that the hon. Gentleman cannot join me in maintaining that the worst performing local authorities should try to reach the standards of the best. It is also a shame that he had to ride to the rescue of the beleaguered Labour-controlled Hackney council.

We have attached great importance to bringing empty Government homes back into use, as the hon. Gentleman knows. The White Paper gives great priority to that, and to our proposal to auction surplus empty homes after they have been vacant for six months.

The hon. Gentleman must decide, with the hostility to privatisation that he has just displayed and his commitment to more regulation, whether he is part of new or old Labour. At the moment he is certainly pitching his tent with old Labour.

Planning Permission

5. Mr. Michael Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether his Department will reconsider the powers of county councils and district councils to give themselves planning permission on their own land. [4879]

The Minister for Construction, Planning and Energy Efficiency (Mr. Robert B. Jones): The procedures governing local authority development were revised in 1992. We have no plans for a further review at present.

Mr. Spicer: Is my hon. Friend aware that that is almost exactly the same answer as I had to give when I was the Minister responsible for planning? It has not worn well with the passage of time. Does he accept that, in the interests of natural justice, the gamekeeper should in this context be separated from the poacher?

Mr. Jones: I am glad that my hon. Friend accepts that the right answer should be given by successive Ministers. Of course we have looked at the matter; the last thing we want is abuse by local authorities. If my hon. Friend has any evidence of that and draws it to my attention, I shall certainly look at it closely.

Mr. Wigley: Does the Minister accept that these circumstances could be dealt with by a more general change? There could be a right of appeal against planning permission that is granted, just as there is now a right to appeal against a refusal. There is a pressing case for such a balance generally, not just in relation to local authorities.

Mr. Jones: The Environment Select Committee rejected that when it looked into the issue. It took a lot of evidence showing a conflict of interest, which is why the Government reviewed procedures at the time, in 1992.

Sir Irvine Patnick: A couple of weeks ago I initiated a debate on this very matter to which the Minister responded. The practice is becoming more and more prevalent: in order to raise cash, local authorities with land are capitalising on it and then giving themselves planning permission. But because this is not a national issue, it has not been called in by the Minister. Something must be done about this bad practice.

Mr. Jones: My hon. Friend has to recognise that the key thing is whether the proposals are in line with the local plan. If they are contrary to the local plan, they are referred to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and can be judged on their merits. On the other hand, if they are in accordance with the plan, the proper place to object to them is in the inquiry into the plan.

Mr. Vaz: Does the Minister accept that his answer to his hon. Friend camouflages the crisis that affects our planning system? What is he going to do about the large backlog of cases at the planning inspectorate, the huge delays in processing appeals and the enormous cost of the planning appeals system? When are we going to have a planning policy that is coherent, consistent and cost-effective?

Mr. Jones: I believe that we have exactly that. The point is that when we have all the plans in place for each local authority throughout the country, the situation will be much clearer and that will result in far fewer people having to test their planning applications at appeal because they will be able to judge them against the plan developed for that particular area.

North Downs

6. Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to meet the Secretary of State for Transport to discuss safeguarding the area of outstanding natural beauty of the north downs. [4880]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir Paul Beresford): My right hon. Friend has no immediate plans to do so. However, officials from our two Departments work closely together, particularly within the Government office for the south-east.

Mr. Rowe: Is my hon. Friend aware that in the area of outstanding natural beauty of the north downs there is a motorway construction site which is surplus to Department of Transport requirements? If Government rules prevent the Department from allowing Maidstone borough council to use that site for park and ride, there is a serious risk that it will be sold and, eventually, planning permission sought for a use totally inappropriate to an area of outstanding natural beauty. It will be his Department that will have to make that decision. Will he give an undertaking to discuss this difficult situation with the Department of Transport before it becomes very much more difficult to resolve?

Sir Paul Beresford: As my hon. Friend is aware, I do not know the details of this matter. If they are as he describes, I would have thought that there would be some enormous planning hurdles to be overcome before planning permission could be given. Of course, if he is concerned, we will certainly discuss and look into the matter.

Water Companies

7. Mr. Purchase: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to review the procedure for regulation of the water companies; and if he will make a statement. [4881]

Mr. Gummer: I have no plans to review the water industry's efficient regulatory system.

Mr. Purchase: Consumers will be thrilled by that scintillating answer. Is the Secretary of State aware that the second Cadbury review of corporate governance is considering seriously the question of supervisory boards? Would it not be sensible for the Secretary of State to consider how best we might proceed, given the abject failure of the present regulatory system, so that local people could once again sit on the supervisory boards and have a proper say about and input into the way in which the industry is regulated?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman has forgotten the whole history of the water industry. We have problems there at the moment because of the lack of investment under the Labour Government. I know that that is true because I read carefully the words of the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), who said that the Government had said that investment in the water industry had been cut under Labour. She said:

> "That is not true. The plans that we hoped to implement were not entirely fulfilled."—[Official Report, 30 November 1995; Vol. 267, c. 1385.]

The fact is that they were cut, cut and cut again. Now, the investment is continuing and it is properly regulated.

Mr. Barry Field: May I recommend to Mrs. Gummer that Father Christmas places in the Christmas stocking of my right hon. Friend a little pamphlet from Conservative central office which I wrote on this very subject to give my right hon. Friend a little light reading over Christmas? Does he agree that it is remarkable that no matter how much the Almighty allows it not to rain, the Opposition cannot bring themselves to agree that water metering is the best way forward for charging for water?

Mr. Gummer: I shall look forward to the pamphlet, but it is interesting that the Labour party is in favour of all environmental things in general but none of them in particular. The truth is that unless resources are properly looked after, we cannot have sustainable development. That is why the Labour party has no environment policy whatsoever.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: Can the Minister confirm whether he has had reports that there are likely to be considerable water shortages next year, given the lack of rain last summer and the relatively dry weather this Christmas? If so, what is he doing in negotiation with the water regulator and others to tackle that?

Mr. Gummer: Those reports have one thing in common: they say that the shortage of water arises because of a shortage of rain. Unless the hon. Gentleman has a special way of delivering rain, discussions with the water regulator will make no difference. The water companies have an extensive programme of further investment and already spend extremely large sums. The retained profits and £3.5 billion of borrowing by the industry have financed that unprecedented investment. Much of it makes up for the lack of investment when the industry was nationalised, which is what the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase) wants to return to. I assure the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) that I am looking at the position in the south-west, which is one of the areas most affected.

Mr. Nicholls: The fact that the Monopolies and Mergers Commission recently upheld Ofwat's decision to peg water charges in the south-west shows that regulation is working in terms of that aspect of the industry. Does my right hon. Friend agree that, given that the water company in the south-west cannot even deliver water to every house in my constituency and cryptosporidium affects water supplies, further regulation of the quality as opposed to the cost of the service should not be ruled out at this stage? Will he comment on that?

Mr. Gummer: The drinking water inspectorate and the environment agency deal in their respective ways with quality. I am happy to point out to them, as I have in the past, my hon. Friend's views on those matters. I am glad that my hon. Friend points the House to the fact that the mixture of the water regulator and the opportunity to appeal to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission show the toughness of the regulation, the affect on South West Water and the insistence that South West Water meets higher standards immediately.

Low-cost Housing

8. Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to allow local authorities to build more low-cost rented housing. [4882]

Mr. Clappison: Housing associations are now the main providers of new social housing. We expect around 70,000 additional lettings to be provided in 1995-96 through a mixture of public and private funding.

Mr. Miller: How many new starts will there be in 1996 in the low-cost rented sector?

Mr. Clappison: The hon. Gentleman would do better to concentrate on the fact that housing associations provide 27,000 new starts out of a total of 70,000, which does not take account of the value of new social lettings through tenants going on to buy their own homes and the refurbishment of properties. He would do well to look at the value of the housing associations' contribution to providing high-quality property through the involvement of the private financial sector.

Dr. Spink: Does my hon. Friend agree that, where social housing is provided, it should be of the highest possible quality? Will he convey to the Government the thanks of my constituents who have just received a 47 per cent. increase in the housing investment programme, which should be spent on improving the quality of existing council houses in Castle Point, which is currently substandard?

Mr. Clappison: I am happy to convey my hon. Friend's message. He is right to say that we seek to provide high-quality accommodation to meet social need.

Ministry of Defence Housing

9. Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representation he has made to the Secretary of State for Defence over the planned privatisation of the Ministry of Defence's married quarters estate. [4883]

10. Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has made to the Secretary of State for Defence over the planned Ministry of Defence's married quarters estate. [4884]

Mr. Curry: We have made it clear that we wish to see genuinely surplus property used to provide homes for people. It will help to create sustainable and mixed communities if homes are available for both purchase and rent.

Mr. O'Hara: Does the Minister share my concern that those perfectly good homes are being sold off like so much Army surplus stock when social housing, which is his Department's responsibility, is desperately needed?

Mr. Curry: The important thing is to ensure that people live in the surplus houses that are available. There are about 70,000 MOD homes, of which 14,000 are empty. That is 14,000 too many. We must ensure that people can live in them. Whether that goes for social housing or for low-cost starter homes appears to me to be much less important. What matters is that they are used.

Mr. Jamieson: Does the Minister recall that in July 1994, his Department's task force report described the MOD policy of having thousands of homes standing empty as short-sighted and anti-[illegible]? Is not it clear to the Minister that Defence Ministers have totally ignored the advice of his Department by having 14,098 empty properties—552 of them in the Prime Minister's constituency? When will he take firm action to ensure that the MOD releases those properties for social housing, as he has said repeatedly that it should?

Mr. Curry: That is precisely what the MOD now proposes. It is manifestly the case that the programme of disposal has not proceeded quickly enough in the past few years. The MOD has had to cope with "Options for Change", which has meant much shifting of personnel and many changes in personnel in the armed forces, so it needs to ensure that houses are available. What matters now is that we ensure that those houses are used. Regardless of whether those houses are made available for rent, the eventual purchaser will have no interest in holding on to empty stock. He will want to dispose. It is immaterial whether he disposes into the private rented sector or the home ownership sector. What matters is that those houses are used.

Mr. Ian Bruce: My hon. Friend will be pleased to know that tomorrow—I am sorry, on Friday—on Thursday—[Laughter]—I shall present the keys to some MOD homes to new tenants from Magna housing association in my constituency. Many of those MOD properties will be sold to the private sector. However, where housing associations exist in districts where an enormous number of homes become vacant as a result of MOD changes in constituencies such as mine, will he ensure that they have the funds to recycle those homes into super housing association homes, and to get the very many people on the waiting list into them?

Mr. Curry: My hon. Friend has always been a stickler for terminological exactitude. [Interruption.] In other words, he knows what day of the week it is. He will know that some housing associations have already shown considerable interest in acquiring that stock and some of them, such as the North housing association, can do so with their own funds and do not need to apply for funding.

I am sure that the purchaser of the properties from the MOD will have no interest in holding on to the stock but will want to dispose of it, some of it to housing associations, who are natural purchasers.

Contaminated Land

11. Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received regarding contaminated land. [4885]

Mr. Clappison: The hon. Gentleman is among those who have made representations, and I am sure that the whole House appreciates the campaign that he has mounted on behalf of those people affected by the asbestos tragedy in Armley. I hope that, for his part, the hon. Gentleman will appreciate what the Environment Protection Act 1995 has done in pressing home again the important principle that the polluter should pay.

Mr. Battle: I am grateful for the Minister's comments at the start of his answer. When will the Government publish the contaminated land guidance to the Environment Protection Act? In Leeds, there are about 929 hectares of derelict land, about a quarter of which is believed to be contaminated. Would not it be a wise investment now to give the resources to the local authorities to allow them to survey that land and bring it into productive use for homes and jobs?

Mr. Clappison: The hon. Gentleman knows of the statutory guidance that must be issued, and that consultation must take place before it is issued. We are expecting that consultation to be carried out early next year. In the meantime, those people in Leeds who have an interest in the tragedy of the contamination by asbestos, especially Leeds city council, would do well to reflect on the important principle that the polluter should pay, and the relevance to that principle of recent legal findings on other areas of liability affecting the asbestos tragedy.

Mr. Ashby rose—

Hon. Members: "Hear, hear."

Mr. Ashby: I thank the House. Does my hon. Friend realise that there are many pieces of contaminated land in inner-city areas, which are an eyesore? We cannot really wait for land values to catch up with the cost of dealing with the contaminated land. Does not he realise that there must be some public input in order to remove such eyesores in inner cities?

Mr. Clappison: My hon. Friend is aware that we have stuck firmly to the principle that the polluter should pay. He will realise the importance of the definitions that we established in the Environment Act 1995 and the regulatory machinery that we put in place to enforce that. I share the sentiments expressed by my hon. Friend: we should deal effectively with the problem of contaminated land in inner city areas and develop those areas.

Mr. Barnes: Does the Minister agree that opencast mining is not the natural way to deal with contaminated land with coal reserves beneath it? Avenue coke works in my constituency has been closed and the land is highly contaminated—British Coal Property should be aware of the principle that the polluter should pay and should clean the area without inconveniencing local people by introducing opencast mining provisions.

Mr. Clappison: The hon. Gentleman will realise that we have issued much tougher planning provisions to deal with that issue. Every case will be considered strictly on its merits in the context of those tough provisions.

Anti-social Tenants

12. Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his proposals to help local authorities deal more effectively with anti-social tenants. [4886]

Mr. Curry: On 18 July and 18 October I announced a substantial package of measures to help local authorities to deal more effectively with anti-social tenants. After discussions with the housing association movement, I intend to extend that package to housing associations.

Mrs. Lait: Many of my constituents, who have been badly affected by the behaviour of anti-social tenants, welcome the measures. Is my hon. Friend aware, however, that many of the victims of anti-social tenants feel unable to give evidence because they are intimidated? Can he give the House an idea of how the victims will be protected by the package?

Mr. Curry: I agree with my hon. Friend. Something that I hear repeatedly as I travel around the country is that people know who cause the problems on estates—it may be just one or two families or their kids—but cannot find a way of dealing with them. Those involved may be taken to court and put on probation or their case may be deferred and they return to the estate and cause problems again. We intend to introduce new powers involving injunctions associated with arrest so that people can take action without fear of intimidation. We also intend to make it possible to use professional witnesses, as some local authorities—mainly Labour authorities—are already doing, to try to remove the element of intimidation so that people can enjoy the right to live peaceably in their own homes.

Ms Ruddock: While the Government's proposals are welcome as far as they go, is it not a scandal that it has taken a decade of rising complaints and 17 deaths in noise disputes to get the Government to act? Does the Minister accept that every citizen has the right to enforcement of the law on noise? If so, when he gives responsibilities to local authorities why does he say that the level of service will depend on local conditions and resources? Where is the money to come from?

Mr. Curry: The hon. Lady confuses noise nuisance with anti-social behaviour. The latter is by far the more serious problem as no one has been materially injured by noise in the way that people have been injured by some anti-social behaviour. Both problems affect the quality of life on housing estates and both must be tackled and I hope that both sets of measures will receive a wide welcome. It is distressing that a number of Labour local authorities appear not to want even to implement the package on anti-social behaviour that we shall make available to them, although sensible authorities such as Manchester will implement it. I hope that the laggards will learn from the winners.

Mr. Hawkins: Following the point that my hon. Friend has rightly made, does he agree that in many of our seaside resorts Labour councillors and Labour activists are themselves unscrupulous landlords? They encourage people from outside the area, who become extremely anti-social tenants when they move in, and cause many of the social problems. Is that not the reality of Labour local government and does it not show, once again, that Labour is unfit to govern?

Mr. Curry: I am conscious of the problems in seaside resorts around the country caused by the changing nature of activities in those areas and by the people who settle there to collect benefit. We have taken measures under the planning system to resolve those problems and we shall take further measures to deal with houses in multiple occupation. I shall listen to the views of those who believe that additional measures should be taken so that seaside towns can enjoy the prosperity which has been theirs historically and which they deserve for the future.

Energy Efficiency

13. Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his most recent estimate of the number of homes to be insulated in the coming year under the home energy efficiency scheme; and if he will make a statement. [4887]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: We expect more than 400,000 homes to be insulated under the home energy efficiency scheme in the coming year, bringing the total number of homes insulated under the scheme to more than 2 million.

Mr. Welsh: Will the Minister explain why he has cut the home energy efficiency scheme budget by £31 million in direct breach of a Government and ministerial promise to everyone involved? Is he aware that that will lead to the insulation of 200,000 fewer houses next year, the loss of 1,000 jobs in the small business sector and the loss of £12 million to manufacturing industry? In view of the economic, health and other effects of his decision, will the Minister now reconsider?

Mr. Jones: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman. Some £30 million was added to the scheme in anticipation of the acceptance of value added tax at 17.5 per cent. As he knows, the House voted against that measure, so the £30 million figure has now been reviewed.

Mr. Gallie: My hon. Friend the Minister has anticipated the point that I intended to make. The home energy efficiency grant for last year was linked to the VAT increase. On that basis, given the uptake of the award, should the Government not be congratulated rather than criticised?

Mr. Jones: My hon. Friend is clearly in favour of that excellent scheme. The hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) failed to appreciate the fact that we have protected the most vulnerable groups while continuing to offer a substantial discount to those people who do not qualify for the free service.

Mrs. Helen Jackson: How can the Minister justify a 20 per cent. reduction in energy efficiency in homes around the country when, as Chairman of the Environment Select Committee, he recommended increased expenditure on home energy efficiency schemes? Was it not a cynical exercise to increase expenditure for only one year in order to justify the imposition of VAT on home heating, which has hit the poorest and the worst off in our community?

Mr. Jones: That is clearly not the case, as we have protected vulnerable groups and increased the scheme considerably over the years. I remind the hon. Lady that there was no such scheme under the last Labour Government because they did not care about energy efficiency. We are determined to ensure that homes become more energy efficient in the coming year through a variety of measures, not least through the Home Energy Conservation Bill, which will encourage local authorities to make sure that people take up those schemes.

Rented Homes

14. Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many homes for rent were started by local authorities and housing associations in 1978-79; and what is his estimate for 1996-97. [4888]

Mr. Curry: In 1978-79 local authorities started about 62,000 homes for rent and housing associations started about 17,000. This year we estimate that about 49,000 social homes for rent or shared ownership will be started by housing associations, or released through home ownership grant schemes, and about 1,000 will be started by local authorities.

Mrs. Prentice: In view of the statement earlier by the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) that only 27,000 homes will be started by housing associations in 1996-97 and the fact that under the last Labour Government 112,000 new homes, on average, were started each year, will the Minister tell us this Christmas time exactly how the Government intend to house the homeless?

Mr. Curry: The hon. Lady is confusing two points. With regard to the general provision of housing, what matters is that properties become available for new lettings. The only thing that concerns a family needing a home is whether a house is available and whether they will have a roof over their heads.

The housing associations are the main flag carriers of new social rented housing in this country. We also have an effective rough sleepers initiative to deal with the homelessness problem. The hon. Lady will know that we are developing that initiative and that we are consulting about how we should take it forward. It is operated by the Government and the housing charities in a unique display of very effective co-operation.

Local Government Finance, London

15. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to discuss the standard spending assessment formula with representatives of the London boroughs. [4889]

Sir Paul Beresford: Standard spending assessments are discussed throughout the year with the local authority associations in the settlement working group and in the standard spending assessment sub-group. Currently, we are also available to meet authorities to hear their representations on our proposals for the 1996-97 settlement, including those for standard spending assessments.

Mr. Dykes: Does the Minister accept that the working of that complex formula can adversely affect outer London boroughs such as Harrow? Its proximity to Heathrow airport and its many ethnic minority communities mean that it has to bear extra costs of social provision, education, housing for the elderly and other services. Will my hon. Friend look again at the formula to see whether Harrow can have a fairer deal?

Sir Paul Beresford: I would dispute any suggestion that it has not had a fair deal. The shift of expenditure under the formula shows that Harrow has had a reasonable deal. I am sure that, with my hon. Friend's assistance, the local authority will be able to meet the demands well. A comparison of local authorities around the country shows a massive variation. Labour authorities, in particular, seem to spend an enormous amount of money for little value. I am sure that my hon. Friend can assist his local authority.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 19 December. [4905]

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Jones: Will the Government rejoin the future large aircraft project urgently? Does the Prime Minister understand that the French and the Germans are increasingly sceptical of our approach to the project and may move to exclude us? Is he also aware that 2,000 Airbus workers in my constituency have lost their jobs and that the remaining 2,000 are desperate for Britain to rejoin the project? Given Britain's pathetic economic growth prospects, surely the Prime Minister wants a strong aerospace industry.

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for having given me an indication of the subject that he intended to raise and I appreciate his concern to protect jobs in his constituency. On the substantive point, the Government are committed to joining the future large aircraft programme provided that our conditions concerning price, performance and affordability are met. That matter is under discussion with the United Kingdom industries concerned and with our European colleagues.

Q2. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 19 December. [4907]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Shaw: In the next few days I shall be visiting the hospitals, the homes for the elderly and the retired and the nursing homes in my constituency. I shall visit many businesses and voluntary organisations. [Interruption.] All those people have benefited from additional resources as a result of the recent Budget. Can my right hon. Friend also give me some words to tell our customs officers in Dover, who are thoroughly against the policies that the Labour party would introduce in terms of the legalisation of cannabis and drugs? [Interruption.] Our customs officers have provided a valuable service in keeping Britain free from drugs. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that he supports the customs officers in Dover in that action? [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. I will give the hon. Gentleman an Adjournment debate next year.

The Prime Minister: I think that my hon. Friend has just had one, Madam Speaker. I very much agree with him about the excellent work carried out by customs officers at Dover and elsewhere in tackling drug trafficking. My hon. Friend can tell them categorically that we have no intention of legalising cannabis. We do not believe that it is the right way to proceed. As the chief constable of West Yorkshire said in the past,

> "Legalisation or decriminalisation just isn't the answer."

> "I've not yet met a heroin, or ecstasy or crack cocaine user that didn't start on cannabis".

Mr. Blair: Will the Prime Minister tell us what he has repeatedly refused to deny, which is that the costs of rail privatisation—the costs of the sale and of the extra subsidy—are set to amount to $1 billion over the next two years? Would not that £1 billion be better spent on improving a public rail service?

The Prime Minister: No. Even with the spirit of Christmas, I must say that the right hon. Gentleman is talking nonsense. On a like for like basis, overall Government funding for the railways after privatisation is expected to be broadly similar to the levels of recent years. The precise level will depend on the privatisation process and on the outcome of competition for the franchises. Instead of criticising the funding, the Labour leader would be better employed examining the £10 billion worth of investment that Railtrack plans, which would not occur in the public sector. If the right hon. Gentleman is so opposed to privatisation, will he tell us how he would replace the £10 billion worth of investment in British Rail? Which taxes would he increase? By how much would fares have to rise? Or will he at last realise that privatisation will produce a better service for customers?

Mr. Blair: We could start by taking the £1 billion and investing it in the rail service. Let us see whether the Prime Minister can answer one simple question: will he guarantee that the level of service which now obtains will be the same after privatisation in the privatised services—not hope, not wish, but guarantee?

The Prime Minister: I note that the right hon. Gentleman had no response whatever to the £10 billion worth of investment. He talks about £1 billion, but £10 billion is promised. As for future services, he can see what is already beginning to happen. The passenger service requirements provide a guaranteed level of service. That has never existed in the past. Services to the passenger are already improving—[HON. MEMBERS: "Where?"] I will tell Opposition Members where. The operating companies are offering a range of new services. They are responding to their customers more quickly. There are new information services. To give Opposition Members a practical example, completely new train services are being provided—[HON. MEMBERS: "Where"?]. I will tell Opposition Members where. For example, over 100 trains a day have already been added to SouthWest Trains' timetables. When will the Leader of the Opposition realise what is happening and realise also the opportunities for improving a service that has been too bad for too long?

Mr. Blair: We shall realise it when the Prime Minister guarantees that service levels will remain the same—[Interruption.] Yes, when he guarantees it. What is more, have we not just—[Interruption.] We shall listen to the Government when they guarantee that the service will remain the same, but they are not prepared to do that. Is it not right that at the end of the week—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The barracking is intolerable.

Mr. Blair: The Prime Minister keeps telling us about his plans for British Rail. Is he not the man who planned no increase in value added tax and then increased it? We are not interested in his plans. Have not his rail plans been overturned by the courts, his chief inspector of prisons walked out of his first prison inspection, members of his party are at each other's throats over Europe and the Government cannot get the national lottery right? Has not the right hon. Gentleman's year ended as it began—in weakness, chaos and incompetence?

The Prime Minister: Whenever the right hon. Gentleman loses the argument, he changes it. He has lost the argument on privatisation. He had no response to the £10 billion and no response to the fact that there has never been a guaranteed minimum service until now. Now the service is being improved and he cannot bear the fact that we are winning the argument in terms of improving services right across the public sector. All that he can do is to run down everything that happens in this country on every conceivable occasion for his own partisan political interests.

Mr. Garnier: As more than 13,000 British troops are deployed to Yugoslavia, will my right hon. Friend send the best wishes of the House to them? Does he agree that, had the Labour party won the last election, we would not have had one tenth of the soldiers to send to that place, given the savage cuts that Labour would have introduced?

The Prime Minister: And would probably try to introduce were it ever given the chance again. We know the Opposition's record on defence and we know their capacity to hide their long-term affiliation to the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament, and we know that the armed forces know and the people of this country know that the armed forces would not be safe in their hands.

Mr. Ashdown: Does the Prime Minister understand why the possibility of a lone British veto tomorrow against a European subvention to help to privatise Irish Steel is regarded by the Irish Prime Minister as inexplicable? Will he explain? Will he assure us, in particular, that he fully understands the damage that could be done by that to British-Irish relations at a crucial moment in the Irish peace process?

The Prime Minister: I suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should examine the whole matter; it is a very complex issue involving the interests of Irish Steel—very important to Ireland—and British Steel, and the matter is under discussion. We are seeking—and I hope that it will be possible to reach—an agreement that safeguards the United Kingdom's interests. That matter is under discussion at the moment. It would not be productive for those discussions for me to pursue the matter now, but there is an interest both in Ireland and in the United Kingdom. We are seeking, and have done for some weeks, to reach an agreement which meets the interests of the steel industry both in the United Kingdom and in Ireland. I hope that we shall be able to reach such an agreement. If we cannot, it will not be for lack of trying on this side of the channel.

Mrs. Gorman: Has my right hon. Friend seen the newspaper report that Labour Members of the European Parliament, in supporting the French strikers, blamed their plight on the fact that the French Government were supporting the single currency? Does he not find it surprising that Labour MEPs should be supporting his own sceptical point of view? Is he not even more surprised that their position differs radically from that of Opposition Front-Benchers, who support the European Parliament and all its works?

The Prime Minister: I believe that the very wide and deep divisions in the Labour party on Europe were clearly apparent in the statement that I delivered to the House yesterday afternoon, when one Labour Back Bencher after another stood up and, in essence, flatly contradicted what the leader of the Labour party has been saying for weeks. As for Labour party policy, my hon. Friend may be interested to know that there was more than one summit in Madrid last week. The summit of socialist leaders, attended by the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), the deputy leader of the Labour party, must have been very amusing. The right hon. Gentleman agreed to a significant extension of qualified majority voting, support for a European strategy on immigration, the social chapter, and restrictions on how long people can work. What he did not discuss were the details of fishing policy—and he a Member from Hull.

Q3. Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 19 December. [4908]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Pickthall: As the national lottery regulator was warned by the Ministry not to take free air trips on his visit to the USA, but nevertheless did so, and given that the Secretary of State for National Heritage knew about that but refused to comment on it at Question Time yesterday, does the Prime Minister not think that it is time that both of them were sacked?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage is considering the matter and will make an announcement shortly.

Mr. Gallie: Is my right hon. Friend aware that in 1979 only 30 per cent. of people in Scotland were home owners? Is he aware that the figure is now 57 per cent., and a Shelter report published today suggests that 77 per cent. of Scots aspire to home ownership? Can my right hon. Friend assure me that the Conservative party will drive towards that objective?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is right. Surveys show that more than 70 per cent. of Scots aim for owner-occupation, and that is particularly true among younger age groups. Since the right to buy was introduced in 1980, well over 300,000 houses and flats have been sold to their tenants, and owner-occupation has increased from 35 per cent. to 57 per cent. The right to buy has been immensely successful—introduced by a Conservative Government, opposed by gut instinct by the Labour party then, and still, in truth, loathed by it now.

Points of Order

3.30 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. During last night's debate on the preposterous proposal to privatise the Stationery Office, the Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service, the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), was a little naughty—I put it charitably—in his statements about the Clerks Department, as can be seen in column 1317 of Hansard. Was that brought to your attention, Madam Speaker, and can you clarify the position of the Clerks Department, which by tradition is neutral and does not become involved in matters of political controversy?

Madam Speaker: There may still be misunderstanding in some quarters about the position of Officers of the House in the process leading to privatisation of Her Majesty's Stationery Office. As the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) made clear yesterday, the House of Commons Commission has authorised Officers of the House to participate in the process of preparing the contract that would be necessary to protect the interests of the House after privatisation, and in that context to attend meetings of the privatisation steering group in an observer capacity.

The choice of the firm whose bid will be accepted is purely one for the Government. That said, Officers of the House will be available to give information to representatives of the Government about the special nature and the special implications of the work that the House requires, and will continue to require to be done by whoever is responsible for its printing services. That information may help the Government to make their choice, but neither the House nor any organ of it will make that choice.

As soon as any name of a firm that is to take over the functions of HMSO is announced, it will be for Officers of the House—acting on behalf of the House of Commons Commission—to negotiate the terms of an appropriate contract. Preparatory work for that eventuality is already under way. It will be for the Commission itself, at the end of the process, to approve the terms of any contract that is drawn up. I hope that I have made that abundantly clear.

BILL PRESENTED

EMPLOYMENT (HOMEWORKERS)

Mr. Dafydd Wigley, supported by Mr. Cynog Dafis, Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones, Mr. Elfyn Llwyd, Mr. Andrew Welsh, Mr. Alex Salmond, Mrs. Margaret Ewing and Ms Roseanna Cunningham, presented a Bill to provide safeguards for homeworkers and for associated workers: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 26 January and to be printed. [Bill 36.]

Fisheries

[Relevant documents: European Community Documents Nos. 10409/95, on the annual report by the Commission on the multi-annual guidance programme, 10862/95 relating to guide prices for fishery products in 1996, the unnumbered Explanatory Memoranda submitted by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on 27th November 1995 relating to the EC/Morocco Fisheries Agreement, on 12th December 1995 relating to the Community observer scheme in North West Atlantic Fisheries Organisation (NAFO) waters, on 12th December 1995 relating to joint international inspection in NAFO waters, on 12th December 1995 relating to control measures in NAFO waters, on 12th December 1995 on a pilot satellite tracking project in NAFO waters, on 12th December 1995 relating to Community catch possibilities in NAFO waters for 1996, on 12th December 1995 relating to reciprocal access and 1996 quotas with Norway, and on 12th December 1995 on amendments to the criteria for the decommissioning of fishing vessels.]

Madam Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

There is great pressure to speak in the debate, so I have imposed a 10-minute limit on all Back-Bench speeches. I plead with Front Benchers to keep in mind the number of hon. Members who I know wish to speak.

3.33 pm

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Forsyth): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of the unnumbered Explanatory Memorandum, submitted by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on 8th December 1995, relating to the fixing of total allowable catches for 1996 and certain conditions under which they may be fished; and supports the Government's intention to negotiate the best possible fishing opportunities for British fishermen consistent with scientific advice and the need to sustain the stocks for the benefit of future generations of fishermen.

On Thursday the Fisheries Ministers of the European Union will meet to decide the 1996 quotas for fish stocks. Today's debate allows the House to consider these matters and to scrutinise the relevant documents, which are set out in the Order Paper. Already this year the House has had a number of debates on fisheries. Earlier in the year and again in October, it considered proposals for limiting fishing effort in waters west of the United Kingdom. More recently my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) succeeded in raising his concerns about the common fisheries policy in an Adjournment debate.

The main focus for today's debate are the proposals which the Council of Fisheries Ministers will consider later this week in Brussels to determine the fishing opportunities for the various fleets of the Community next year. I am delighted to have this opportunity to open the debate. As I made plain when I attended the meeting of the Council of Fisheries Ministers in October when the final critical decisions were taken on the arrangements for western waters, I attach great importance to the prospects for the industry which is so important to remote communities, not just in Scotland but around the whole coastline of the United Kingdom.

I was brought up in Arbroath on the north-east coast of Scotland and I well recall the vibrancy of the harbour and the fish market, and the community spirit that was encapsulated in the local fishing fleet. It is a great sadness to me personally to see how the industry has changed over the past 20 years. Looking back only 10 or 15 years, one sees that the volume of the main white fish landings in the United Kingdom was little short of twice the volume that we can expect next year.

If there is to be a single measure of the success of the European common fisheries policy it should be the health of our fish stocks. On that, plainly, the jury is still out. Some 60 per cent. of those stocks are considered by the scientists to be at risk biologically. That means that the stocks are below or at about the lowest level which has been seen over the 30 years during which they have been subject to close scientific monitoring. That statistic tells its own story about the performance of the common fisheries policy.

Some hon. Members may argue that the state of the stocks is not as bad as the scientists advise. There may be some truth in that because fishery science is not an exact science. At the Council we shall certainly take into account the views of the fishermen in pressing for changes to the Commission's proposals, but I do not think that anyone can dispute the overall conclusion that our stocks are not in the same healthy state as they were 10 or 15 years ago.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): Does my right hon. Friend accept that the fundamental problem with the common fisheries policy is the principle of equal access to the common resource? Does he agree that that works very much to the detriment of the British fishing industry? Will he assure the House that the Government will go to the intergovernmental conference next year determined to see this written out of the regulations? Will they serve notice now on our European partners that that is our bottom line?

Mr. Forsyth: I have considerable sympathy with what my hon. Friend says. I think his point is that the idea of equal access to a common resource is more of an aspiration than a reality. In practice the principle of relative stability, for example, has been contrary to that. I assure my hon. Friend that the Minister of State will fight hard for British interests at the Council meeting, as he has always done in the past.

Mr. Gill: I thank my right hon. Friend for giving way again. I listened with interest to his answer but I should like to press him on the point. Will he serve notice now on our European partners that we will accept nothing less than a writing out of the fisheries regulations all the references to equal access to a common resource?

Mr. Forsyth: We have never had equal access and we have no intention of accepting that principle. I hope that that helps my hon. Friend to some degree.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): I am most grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way—he has been most courteous as usual. Is not the fundamental problem that fisheries policy is subject to qualified majority voting? For the British, who have maritime interests just like the Icelanders and Norwegians, of paramount national importance is the fact that land-locked countries such as Luxembourg and Austria, and Mediterranean countries too, can have a vote on our Atlantic fisheries, which is clearly preposterous.

Mr. Forsyth: I read with interest my hon. Friend's comments in the Adjournment debate that he secured some weeks ago. I can say to him only that there are, of course, deficiencies in the common fisheries policy, but that, at the end of the day, we simply must find a means whereby we can meet the requirements to conserve stocks. Whatever the system, whether we are out of the CFP or not, we will have to proceed by negotiation and agreement. There is the opportunity for my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to achieve a good deal for Britain's fishermen. I am sure that he will take that opportunity when it comes.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): While my right hon. Friend is giving way, it is probably helpful if he gets interventions out of the way at the same time. My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) talked about the intergovernmental conference. I do not think that anyone in the House finds the common fisheries policy satisfactory. Will my right hon. Friend give the House an undertaking that the Government will consider putting the problems of that policy before the IGC?

Mr. Forsyth: I am not sure what my hon. Friend is seeking to get me to do. If he is suggesting that we should seek to amend the treaty, with his own knowledge of these matters, he will know how difficult that would be to achieve, and I will deal with that later. Of course, there is the opportunity by regulation—which, as has been pointed out by my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood, requires agreement by qualified majority voting—for us to achieve the forms and changes. I hope that I will take those opportunities, as will my hon. Friend the Minister of State as the negotiations proceed.

There is only one answer to our predicament: the need for more effective conservation. Fishing activity is the single biggest factor in deciding the fish mortality level. We must collectively face up to the need to reduce fishing's impact on fish stocks. The need to limit fishing activity's scope was recognised many years ago, long before the United Kingdom joined the European Economic Community, and well before the common fisheries policy was agreed. In the 1960s, the establishment of the North-East Atlantic Fisheries Commission brought together the countries in this part of the world to co-operate on fish stocks conservation. That commission, not the European Commission, brought together Fisheries Ministers, with the benefit of scientific advice, to decide total allowable catches for the main stocks of interest to the commercial fishing fleets.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): If the Secretary of State is not going to campaign for radical common fisheries policy reform by way, for example, of greater emphasis on regional and national management of local fisheries stocks, will he give the House an assurance that he will campaign for far tougher policing on fishing grounds? What discussions has he had recently with Norwegian authorities in terms of tougher policing, the doubling of fines, the confiscation of licences and the banning sine die of vessels caught fishing illegally?

Mr. Forsyth: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that it is important that we have effective enforcement. We are spending some £26 million on that and my hon. Friend the Minister is anxious to improve our performance in that matter. The hon. Gentleman makes an important point.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On the scientific aspects of the matter, what will be done to induce Poland, Japan and Korea to become signatories to the United Nations conference on straddling fish stocks and highly migratory fish stocks, an important resolution that we have agreed and that they have not?

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman is raising a slightly different issue from that which we are discussing this afternoon, but he makes a crucial point: the importance of international co-operation in dealing with fish stocks and of recognising in this debate that fish do not recognise international boundaries. Despite that fact, I am sure that—with your indulgence, Madam Speaker—my hon. Friend the Minister of State will address the hon. Gentleman's question when he winds up the debate.

The proposals that Fisheries Ministers—

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) rose—

Mr. Forsyth: I shall give way, but for the last time.

Mr. Salmond: Many observers would accept the fact that Spain, from within the European Union, and Norway, negotiating from outside, seem to be remarkably more successful in achieving their fisheries objectives than are Her Majesty's Government. Can the Secretary of State explain why, and tell us what he intends to do about it?

Mr. Forsyth: As on so many subjects, such as the Scottish budget, I refute the hon. Gentleman's analysis. He lives in a world in which he believes what he wants to believe; he does not seem to take account of the facts.

The proposals—

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles) rose—

Mr. Forsyth: I said that I was giving way for the last time, but as it is the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) who wishes to intervene, I shall make an exception. But this really is the last time.

Mr. Macdonald: With regard to the imbalance in enforcement between Spain and the United Kingdom, why is it justifiable and acceptable to the British Government that Spain has only 12 fisheries officers to police its regime, whereas we have more than 200?

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman is not right about that.

Dr. Godman: He is.

Mr. Forsyth: He is not. The Spanish have been increasing the number of their fisheries officers—[HON. MEMBERS: "How many are there?"] However, I certainly share the hon. Gentleman's concern that that should be done, and my hon. Friend—[Interruption.] I do not know what Opposition Members are shouting about. They were the first to come forward and argue for Spanish accession, and I do not recall any of them saying anything about fishing during those debates.

The proposals that Fisheries Ministers will consider this week—

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim): If what the Secretary of State says is true, why does the European Community's own document inform us that the annual number of surveillance hours by Spain is 50, whereas for our country the figure is 4,800 hours?

Mr. Forsyth: Well—[Interruption.] Any advance on 50? I said that the numbers were increasing and I entirely agree about the importance of that development. Opposition Members' concern for the policing of fisheries interests is somewhat belated—I shall deal with that subject later.

The proposals that Fisheries Ministers will consider this week are, and have to be, based on the scientific advice received by the Advisory Committee on Fisheries Management. The United Kingdom plays a full part in contributing to that international scientific advice.

The advice that we received this year points to the need for major new restrictions on catches of herring and mackerel, and on the plaice fisheries in the North sea. The scientists have also advised that we should continue to restrict catches of the main round fish stocks—cod, haddock and whiting—throughout the seas around the United Kingdom.

The Commission has had to take account of that advice in developing its own proposals. For stocks that the Community manages jointly with Norway, there has been a series of bilateral negotiations, which were conducted toughly on both sides. The agreement reached in the early morning of 9 December provides for a two-year programme of phased cuts in the total allowable catch for herring, mackerel and plaice. The cuts in quota for those species next year will be about 30 per cent. The agreement also provides for broadly stable TACs for cod, haddock and saithe, but for a significant cut in the North sea whiting catch.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Forsyth: I said that I would not give way again. I shall give way to my hon. Friend, but this really must be the last time, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Townend: I have some sympathy with my right hon. Friend; he cannot be blamed for the betrayal of the British fishing industry by the former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath). Does my right hon. Friend accept that the common fisheries policy, as based on the representations of the scientists, proves that the fisheries policy has been an unmitigated disaster?

If the system had worked, we would have seen quotas increasing year on year. But when it dictates that tens of thousands of good fish be discarded back into the sea to die, there is something wrong with it. Surely the final nail must be when the House legislates to protect the British fishing industry, and is then taken to court and asked to pay £30 million in damages. That is surely the end.

Mr. Forsyth: It is not within the power of this House to legislate to put more fish in the sea. Our basic problem is that we are having to deal with too many people chasing too few fish. I do not think that the sort of comments which my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) has made about my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) add to the debate or get us further forward in seeking to address the difficult problems. Whether we were in the CFP or not, the issue of stocks would have to be addressed, and I hope that we can turn our attention to that matter this afternoon.

The other fishing opportunities which the Community has negotiated with third countries, such as Iceland, the Faroes, Greenland, in the north-west Atlantic and north Norway offer our fishermen broadly the same opportunities as applied this year. Fisheries Ministers in the United Kingdom have maintained a close dialogue with the fishing industry throughout the run-up to the negotiations in the Council, and the Government will have regard to the advice that we have received from the industry.

We recognise that the cuts implied by the Commission's proposals entail sharp and large reductions in quotas and, in the short term, such swings must undermine confidence. We recognise that these cuts in quotas will have serious implications for fishermen's incomes, and all of us are sympathetic to their position. Some of the cuts will be offset by increases in prices, and that is apparent in the mackerel market at least.

My hon. Friend the Minister of State will be fighting hard to get the best deal possible for our fishermen, consistent with the need to protect the longer-term interests of the industry. I am also aware that hon. Members have a number of specific concerns on matters of particular interest to the fishermen in East Anglia, in the south-west of England and in Northern Ireland. My hon. Friend will of course address these.

The Government share the values of the British fishermen. We respect their qualities of independence, enterprise and self-reliance. We believe in minimising the burden of regulation by the state, and allowing fishermen as much freedom as possible within the constraints necessary to conserve fish stocks. We demonstrated that only days ago when we withdrew the obligation on fishermen to report in as they crossed the 4 deg. west line in the north of Scotland.

I am well aware that many fishermen do not believe that they have been well served by the Community's common fisheries policy. Most of them recognise that the CFP has not been successful in conserving fish stocks. They point to the burden of regulation under which they now work. They do not believe that that burden is being applied fairly throughout the Community. They feel that their fishing rights are increasingly insecure because they believe that the CFP is founded on a principle of equal access by all Community fishermen to fish stocks throughout the Community waters. My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) made that point.

I understand fishermen's fears, but we should not underestimate our success in maintaining relative stability, in limiting access to our territorial waters and in applying effective controls on Spanish access and fishing efforts in western waters. These are successes which we have achieved within the Community, and which cut across the principle of equal access.

Those who argue that we could deal with these threats to the rights of our fishermen by abandoning the CFP need to consider carefully the practicalities and the costs of that course. I am sure that my hon. Friends who advocate this do not want the UK to act in breach of treaty obligations entered into with the approval of the House. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh yes we do."] My hon. Friends are the first to argue for the rule of law.

Renegotiating the treaty to exclude fisheries from the scope of Community competence would be a monumental and probably impossible task. It would require unanimity and ratification by all member states, and that could be bought only at a huge price. We cannot assume that we would be successful in such a high-risk strategy. Reforming the CFP only requires changes in regulations by qualified majority voting. We also need to recognise the practical needs of managing fish stocks that we share with our neighbours, which means that some sort of common fisheries policy will still be needed.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Forsyth: I have been generous in giving way, and Madam Speaker is keen that we make progress. I know that the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) does not share the view of Opposition Front-Bench Members on these matters.

It would be far more realistic and effective to work for improvements within the CFP, and that is our strategy. Those who argue that we should seek to co-operate behind the barriers of 200-mile fisheries limits must have forgotten the lessons learnt painfully during the early years of the North East Atlantic Fisheries Commission. The common fisheries policy offers us a substantial improvement on the voluntary and ineffective system epitomised by the North East Atlantic Fisheries Commission. Those who think that Norway offers us a model for managing our fisheries should study that model more closely before they assume that it could be easily or costlessly replicated here.

The fishing industry does not need bogus options. What is needed is the courage to face up to the real issues, and to recognise the practical realities and the real opportunities to improve the working of the common fisheries policy. That is why Fisheries Ministers have initiated a review of the CFP. This is a review not by the Commission, but by an independent British group. It has been drawn from the fishing industry, the processors, the scientists and the environmental interests. I understand that members of that independent group expect to report early next year. I look forward to seeing their findings, because there will be opportunities to carry forward changes to the CFP without waiting till the next major review, in 2002.

That is also why the Government have committed substantial sums—£53 million over five years—to decommissioning older fishing vessels, and reducing fishing capacity towards the targets which we have accepted in the multi-annual guidance programme. It is also why the Government have led the fight to resist the cumbersome and bureaucratic proposals that the Commission advances for fisheries management, most recently for regulating fishing efforts in western waters. My hon. Friend the Minister of State will be able to talk about some of those initiatives and opportunities later in the debate.

Underpinning all that work is a fundamental need to ensure that the fishermen and their representatives are drawn more closely into the process of managing their fisheries. That is something to which Fisheries Ministers in the United Kingdom are firmly committed.

I despair of the Opposition amendments. This month the Liberals are suggesting that we advance the next review of the CFP. Only last month, the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) saw no need for that in an Adjournment debate.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland) indicated dissent.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but he said:

> "The common fisheries policy should comprise a host of other detailed matters. I welcome the review group and look forward with interest to the outcome. The year 2002 will come upon us sooner than we think, and we must begin to put in place the measures that we want to see by then."—[Official Report, 22 November 1995; Vol. 267, c. 585.]

As for Labour, whose members pose as the fishermen's friend, what has it understood about fisheries policy? Nothing that I can see in the amendment. What has it to contribute to the reform of the CFP? Does not it recall its acquiescence in the 1986 Iberian Treaty of Accession? The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) said:

> "We welcome the accession of Spain and Portugal. It is the right move for the Community and for Spain and Portugal. We welcome it because we recognise the merits of those two new democracies joining the rest of Europe and facing Europe's problems with us."

> "The Opposition do not welcome accession blindly, ignorantly or oblivious of the difficulties and anxieties."—[Official Report, 10 December 1985; Vol. 88, c. 883.]

The Opposition seem all too keen to gainsay what the hon. Gentleman said then. That treaty provided for the special protection of the Irish box to end at the end of this year. If the Government had done nothing, the Spanish boats would have been free to enter the whole of the Irish box outside territorial waters. Do not the Opposition understand that the deal that we negotiated last year maintains some protection for these sensitive waters; that it maintains the exclusion of the Spanish from the North sea; that it caps Spanish fishing effort in the west at the levels provided for in their Act of Accession? There is no Spanish armada, and that is a measure of our success: not walking away from the CFP but improving it from within.

What of conservation? I do not recall much about that in the Labour party's last manifesto—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) knows that there was nothing in it. Nor was there anything in the manifesto for the European Parliament, or in Labour's actions when in office during the 1970s. Indeed, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) was a Minister at the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food at the time. I do not recall that he or his colleagues did much to assist the fishing industry then.

Of course we recognise the need for effective conservation. We have committed £53 million to decommissioning. We have pursued the difficult agenda of limiting fishing effort.

There is a difference between the amendments tabled by my hon. Friends and the Opposition Front-Bench amendment. My hon. Friends are motivated by conviction and a passionate concern to ensure that the Government fight for British interests. I am prepared to accept that some Labour Members are similarly motivated; but the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition is in another league altogether. It seeks to criticise the Government for not getting a good enough deal for our fishermen, yet every time the Government put the UK's interests first and fight for them, Labour leaders are to be found lining up with their socialist friends on the continent to denounce Britain for standing alone. When the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East and his colleagues were in office, so afraid were they of standing up to our partners that they allowed Brussels to filch massive sums from the pockets of UK taxpayers. Only when Baroness Thatcher took office was a substantial rebate secured.

To be fair, a handful of Opposition Members could, in all sincerity, have put their names to the amendment—but they are not among those whose names appear on the Order Paper. The amendment has not been framed to keep the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on side—far from it. It is simply a squalid exercise in synthetic patriotism by those whose sole objective is to try to entice some of my hon. Friends to withhold their support from the Government, so that the Opposition can hasten the day when they obtain power to deliver these islands, lock, stock and barrel, to the forces of federalism.

It is nauseating to see the party which for decades has clothed itself in the red flag now seeking to wrap itself in the Union flag; whereas in reality Labour would sail under a white flag and be forced to abandon our fishermen to the party's vision of an ever more integrated Europe.

I am the first to acknowledge the degree of concern among my hon. Friends. I must tell them and the communities they represent that we understand their anxieties, and that we have fought, and will always fight, for their right to fish the waters around our shores—consistent with maintaining adequate fish stocks. My hon. Friends' determination will command respect among the fishing communities of Britain, but I appeal to them not to risk compromising that respect by associating themselves with a bunch of sell-out merchants whose earlier crimes have already resulted in a sentence of 16 years on the Opposition Benches. Nothing in their behaviour suggests that they deserve any remission; indeed an extension of the sentence would seem to be the only answer.

The Minister of State will speak for the United Kingdom's fishermen. He will fight for their interests and for those of the United Kingdom generally. Let this House send out the clearest signal that we are united in our determination not just to get the best deal on quotas but to achieve a long-term solution which offers this vital industry the security that it deserves.

4.3 pm

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

> "believes that the agreements of the Council of Fisheries Ministers, allowing Spanish fishing vessels into the Irish Box and allowing increased access for Spanish fishing vessels to the waters of the west of the United Kingdom, present an unacceptable threat to the long-term economic viability of fishing communities in England, Northern Ireland, Wales and Scotland, and place unsustainable pressure upon the fish stocks in these already sensitive waters; recognises the failure of the United Kingdom Government to implement a decommissioning policy until 1993, and notes that Ministers only abandoned their unfair, unpopular and unworkable days-at-sea proposal after the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations challenged the Government in the European Court of Justice; concludes that the United Kingdom Government has not effectively represented in Europe the interests of the United Kingdom fishing industry, and has failed to implement in the United Kingdom a fisheries policy that is in the interests of the United Kingdom fishing industry; recognises that the over-riding priority of the Common Fisheries Policy must be the conservation of fish stocks, for only through healthy stocks can the fishing industry survive; believes that the Common Fisheries Policy in its present form does not adequately meet this priority; and calls on the United Kingdom Government to work in Europe to secure reforms of the Common Fisheries Policy to ensure the conservation and fair allocation of fish stocks throughout the European Union, with effective enforcement by all member states."

The House will be aware that this is the major annual fisheries debate of the parliamentary year. It precedes the important December meeting of the Council of Fisheries Ministers, which is to agree total allowable catches, quotas and other changes to the workings of the common fisheries policy.

I welcome the Secretary of State for Scotland to our debate. I hope that there is nothing to be read into the fact that the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food left halfway through the Secretary of State's remarks. We shall assume that he had another engagement.

The Secretary of State referred to the 1992 Labour party manifesto. My hon. Friend the Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), who will wind up for the Opposition, may refer to the fisheries document we issued, but I do not think that we should spend much time arguing about the 1992 manifestos. [Interruption.] There is a difference between a Government who win on their manifesto, and a party that loses on its manifesto. [Interruption.] Perhaps Conservative Members do not know the constitutional position. Oppositions are not bound by their manifestos; Governments are.

The Conservative party manifesto for 1992 states:

> "We are determined to see that the renegotiation of the Common Fisheries Policy protects the interest of UK fishermen and retains our share of the Community's fishing opportunities."

Who in the House believes that the Government have delivered on that? Not a single fisherman in the country does. I have spoken to fishermen's leaders from Plymouth to Lerwick today, and they support the amendment standing in the name of Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): I do not believe that fishermen's federations, certainly in Scotland, support the Opposition's amendment, for one reason in particular. The debate is about total allowable catches. There is not one mention of them in the Opposition amendment. Would the hon. Gentleman like to explain that?

Dr. Strang: Yes, I will come to the issue of total allowable catches and quotas. I know that the Government would like the debate to be only about the quotas which are set every year, but it is not just about them. Everyone who knows about the protracted arguments and discussions that have taken place since the agreement last Christmas knows perfectly well that the arrangements which will come into force on 1 January 1996 are of crucial historic importance to our fishing industry, as I shall explain.

Right hon. and hon. Members who represent fishing constituencies will be well aware that the stocks in those waters are already under immense pressure and are crucial to our fishing industry. The priority must be to conserve our stocks. There should be less, not more, fishing effort in those areas.

As this is the right hon. Gentleman's first UK fisheries debate as Secretary of State for Scotland, may I draw his attention to the words of the then Minister of State, who is now Financial Secretary to the Treasury, on going into the negotiations in October 1993 on the question of additional Spanish access to the waters around our islands?

Far from saying that increased access and effort was inevitable, the hon. Gentleman said that Spanish and Portuguese fishing activities should be confined as closely as possible to their historic patterns, and that there should be no access to the Irish box. He was quite right. Access to those waters should have been based on historic fishing activity. The fact is that the deal was a reflection of the Government's failure to represent the UK national interest in Europe.

The Government had had since 1985, when the Spanish terms of accession were agreed, to secure support in Europe for a just deal. In the event, the then Minister of State was not able to persuade a single other member state to refrain from voting in favour of the deal. It is true that, under the Spanish accession treaty, it was necessary to renegotiate the Irish box by the end of 1995, but we did not have to make arrangements for additional Spanish access to other waters around the UK by that deadline. Under the accession treaty, those arrangements did not have to be in place until 2002.

Ministers have still not adequately explained why the Government accepted that additional Spanish access should be effective from 1996 as opposed to 2002— [Interruption.]

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East) rose—

Dr. Strang: I heard the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) make a sedentary intervention, but, as the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) is on his feet, I shall give way to him.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I do not wish to be unkind, because I like the hon. Gentleman very much—[Hon. Members: "Oh."]—I mean that sincerely. As no British Government, irrespective of which party is in power, have the right now to make decisions of that sort and say what will happen with regard to Spanish access, would it not be wiser to try to help the fishing industry out of this absurd constitutional mess rather than engage in political games? Does the hon. Gentleman realise that no fishermen, whether in Scotland or England, will be happy seeing their politicians slinging mud at each other when there is little that any British Government can now do?

Dr. Strang: I do not accept that there is little that any British Government can do, and nor will the fishermen's leaders. However, the hon. Gentleman's point has some merit. I agree that the fishermen's leaders, and fishermen who are watching this debate, do not want to see mud slinging, and I do not intend to sling mud, but I must explain what has happened in recent years.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Will the hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Dr. Strang: I shall give way for the last time.

Mr. Nicholls: How on earth can the hon. Gentleman expect the fishermen or anyone in the House to take seriously his suggestion that something radical should be done, when, during the five years that he was a Fisheries Minister, at a time when we were not crippled by qualified majority voting, he achieved precisely nothing?

Dr. Strang: I was never a Fisheries Minister, but I accept collective responsibility for all the decisions of that Government.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: What were you, then?

Dr. Strang: I shall tell the Minister where I was. I was in the Department of Energy and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

I do not want to spend much time discussing history, because, as the hon. Member for Southend, East rightly reminded the House, the fishermen are not looking for mud slinging. I remind the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) that that Labour Government did not take the crucial decisions on the common fisheries policy. Indeed, previous Ministers of Agriculture have criticised the Labour Government for not settling. The House will understand that the settlement came after the Conservative party came to power.

I wish to be fair. The decisions implicit in our entry into the European Community under the leadership of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) were important in relation to setting the stage for the common fisheries policy. But let us stick to the historical facts. The Government have not represented the interests of our fishing industry in Europe, and their record at home is just as bad.

In the past three years, four Ministers of Agriculture have each made their mark on our fishing industry without dealing with any of the problems facing the industry. First, the present Secretary of State for the Environment, the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), was the mastermind of the unfair, unpopular and unworkable tie-up regime. The Government's tie-up regime was so iniquitous that the High Court referred it to the European Court of Justice. So this year, we had the demeaning spectacle of the UK Government fighting the UK fishing industry in the European courts.

On 17 October, the Minister of State, who is in his place, finally announced that the Government would not, after all, implement the tie-up regime. We welcomed that announcement. The Secretary of State for the Environment also deprived our industry of a decommissioning scheme for many years while other industries in Europe had that option. Five years ago, he said:

> "decommissioning is not the way to reduce the pressure on fish stocks".—[Official Report, 13 December 1990; Vol. 182, c. 1171.]

The right hon. Gentleman was running scared, following the appalling mismanagement of the Government's previous scheme.

Finally, the Minister bowed to pressure—from the industry, from Members of Parliament representing fishing constituencies and from the official Opposition—and introduced a decommissioning scheme in 1993. Unfortunately, that scheme was so small that the Agriculture Select Committee concluded that the cuts achieved would > "be more than offset by efficiency gains in the remainder of the fleet".

Then we had the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) and her bright new dawn. She was going to listen to the industry. In July 1993, the Government invited the industry to submit conservation proposals for technical conservation measures. The industry co-operated, and submitted detailed proposals. Two and a half years later, not a word in response has been heard from the Government.

Then we had the right hon. Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave). It was he who negotiated the deal on Spanish access—and abstained on it, and came back and told the House what a great deal it was.

To the right hon. Gentleman's credit, however, he made one commendable commitment. In January 1995, as hon. Members will recall, the Labour party forced a debate to condemn the deal on Spanish access. To prevent a Government defeat in the House of Commons, the right hon. Gentleman announced that £28 million would be added to the £25 million that had already been allocated for decommissioning.

Decommissioning is not a panacea. It has an important part to play in reducing fishing effort to help conserve our fish stocks, but surely the Secretary of State for Scotland and his ministerial colleagues understand that it is unacceptable that we should be decommissioning vessels to facilitate additional fishing opportunities in waters around the UK for the fishing industry of one of our European partners—in this case, Spain.

I guess that that additional money provided for decommissioning made the vote in the House of Commons on 18 January 1995 one of the most expensive votes that the Government have ever had in the House of Commons.

Of course, the Government give with one hand and take away with the other. Our new Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the right hon. and learned Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg), slipped into this year's Budget the announcement that the Government are to refuse to launch in England the European Union grant schemes for fisheries processing and marketing, port facilities and aquaculture production. The Minister also scrapped the national fishing harbour grant scheme.

That is the Government's record. They have imposed unfair and unworkable regulations on our fishing industry. They have failed effectively to represent the industry in Europe. The real problems and issues that have confronted our fishing industry for many years remain unaddressed by the Government.

One outstanding matter is an obligation to cut our fleet. Like all other EU member states, the UK must cut its fleet capacity under the multi-annual guidance programme. The present round began in 1992 and must be completed in 1996. As a result of the Government's past failures, we are expected to cut our fleet by 19 per cent. from 1991 levels by the end of next year.

The European Commission estimates that, by the end of last year, we had reduced our fleet by only 5 per cent. The latest figures show that, by the end of next year, we shall have reduced our fleet by about 10 per cent. in total.

That leaves 9 per cent. of the fleet that the Minister is supposed to get rid of between now and the end of 1996. I address my remarks to the Minister of State, who will reply to the debate, although I can understand that he has slipped back a row or two. Will the Minister describe to us the way in which he proposes to find the extra 9 per cent. fleet reductions? Is he just waiting for our fishermen to go bankrupt? I hope that, when he winds up, the Minister of State will set out what he expects the consequences to be if the Government fail to meet the UK's requirement under the multi-annual guidance programme.

It is becoming clear that the current common fisheries policy is fundamentally flawed. Its priority must be the conservation of fish stocks, but that is not the priority. Across Europe, too many boats still chase too few fish—that is not controversial.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay) rose—

Dr. Strang: I did say that I had given way for the last time, but I will give way to the hon. Lady, so that she can make an intervention rather than interrupt me from a sedentary position.

Mrs. Gorman: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, where there is a common resource such as the fishing territory, there will always be exploitation? If he genuinely wants to prevent our fishing fleet from being cut still further, he should support the amendment tabled in my name and that of 17 of my colleagues. It calls for a 200-mile exclusive fishing zone around our coast where adequate, or to the median line, which would give our fishermen the equivalent of private territory in which to continue to ply their trade.

Dr. Strang: I think that the hon. Lady understands that the Opposition do not support the policy that I believe she espouses: withdrawal from the common fisheries policy, and possibly, withdrawal from the European Union itself. I should have thought that there was common ground on the subject of the additional Spanish access, and perhaps on other aspects of which I have been speaking this afternoon.

All member states have recognised the overcapacity, as has the UK fishing industry. As the Minister of State advised the House last month, nearly 60 per cent. of the main stocks in the waters we fish are at risk of biological collapse. The contentious issue is how to tackle the problem. The UK Government must take their share of the blame. Their recalcitrance over decommissioning, and the consequent failure to reduce pressure on stocks, will further hinder the chances of matching fishing effort to fish stocks.

Tonight we are debating proposals for next year's total allowable catches, which contain some heavy cuts which will be felt hard in various sectors of the UK fishing industry. There is particular concern at the effect of the cuts in North sea sole and plaice total allowable catches on our east coast industry. That is one problem that Ministers will face in the Fisheries Council later this week. My hon. Friend the Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe will address those matters in greater detail. It is not enough for the fishing industry across Europe to be hit by short-term annual attempts to rectify a long-term and worsening problem.

The common fisheries policy needs to be reformed, to make conservation the priority. There is clearly a need for a review of quota management.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Strang: No, I will not.

The problem of discards has to be addressed; the need for conservation cannot be squared with the throwing back of dead fish. There is also a scientific aspect: total allowable catches and quotas should be based on scientific advice, and tempered by a political assessment of socio-economic needs. With that in mind, it makes no sense to cut the resources available to our scientists responsible for assessing the health of fish stocks.

As the fiasco over the Government's tie-up regime made clear, fisheries policy cannot be reformed in the face of united opposition from the fishing industry. As I have said before of the common fisheries policy, the priority of conservation is far too often overridden by the drive to eliminate any preferential treatment of the various national fleets. Fishing industries in all member states must have absolute confidence that the management of their fisheries is carried out in their interests. The Labour party has been arguing for some time that there is a powerful case for greater national control for each member state within the framework of a reformed common fisheries policy.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Tony Baldry): Will the hon. Gentleman explain to the House what he means by the phrase "the whole of national management"?

Dr. Strang: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not suggesting that there is no prospect for reform of the common fisheries policy. I shall tell him what the phrase means, and in time I shall develop it further. It means that, in practice, we must move towards a system of management that is closer to our coastal waters and to our fishing communities. We suggest that that will mean greater involvement by national Governments. The hon. Gentleman may not understand what the phrase means, but the fishermen understand that we cannot go further down the same road.

The amendment is designed to advance the case of the fishing industry and the fishing communities throughout the United Kingdom. I appeal to all right hon. and hon. Members to support it.

Sir Edward Heath (Old Bexley and Sidcup): Once again, the Government have devoted inadequate time to a debate on a very important subject. As a result, Madam Speaker, you are compelled to limit all speeches to 10 minutes until the wind-up. That gives those hon. Members who wish to do so little opportunity to discuss the subject seriously.

However, in my brief contribution I propose to deal with the abusive remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend), who ought to be ashamed of the way in which he degraded himself with his interruption. His comments follow the maniacal article by Christopher Booker, which appeared in yesterday's edition of the Daily Mail. The article's assertions are entirely false, and I shall deal with them now—although I shall have to go back in history further than other hon. Members have done so far in the debate.

Mr. Booker begins his article by referring to components of the "great fisheries disaster" of which he says:

"the first, of course, being Sir Edward Heath, in 1972, signing away all the fish in Britain's waters as 'a common European resource'".

There is no truth whatever in that statement. The principle was laid down by Act of Parliament, as were all principles. However, the policies to be followed were not laid down, and there was no common fisheries policy at that time—nor was one being discussed. That did not occur until 1983—10 years after I left office and my Government left power.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South) rose—

Sir Edward Heath: There is no time to allow interventions.

That is an entirely false statement about what happened at that time. Mr. Booker continues:

> "So secretively was this done (the House of Commons was kept in the dark) that Britain's desperate fishermen now openly accuse him of 'treason'".

I make two points in response to that. First, my actions were not secretive; I have a record in my own papers. The principle was published, and it was open for debate in the House. We debated our proposed entry into the Community day after day in both Houses of Parliament. Anybody who knew about the principle and who wished to discuss it had an opportunity to do so. As the records show, the issue was not discussed by anyone because no one regarded it as objectionable. Therefore, it is a lie to say that we were secretive and held back information from the House.

Mr. Booker refers to fishermen now openly accusing me of treason. I take that assertion with a grain of salt. I was born by a fishing port. On my way to school, I would watch the fishermen coming into port, and I would stop to talk to them. There were no fishermen after the war; that had all finished. I then spent 15 years ocean racing, and for most of that time I captained British teams. [Laughter] It is no laughing matter; I had close contact with fishermen at that time. We could owe our lives to fishermen in certain circumstance; we knew that, and we maintained good relations with them. I am not a traitor to my country, although the hon. Member for Bridlington may think I am.

The policy formulation followed. We retained the 12-mile rule: six miles entirely for us and six miles for other fishermen. Under the negotiations, the latter six miles were limited to fishermen who were already fishing in those waters. So the countries with fishermen already there could keep them there. It was a perfectly workable arrangement that everyone accepted.

At the time, it suited us to keep the six-mile rule for other countries because our fishermen were getting a large amount of their catch in Icelandic waters, not in local waters. The bitter war over Icelandic fishing when we were in Government led to the stretch of Iceland and the matter was finally dealt with in 1976—after we left office—by the Hague agreement in which the stretch was extended to 200 miles for every country.

Now we are hearing glib suggestions that we should all go back to a 200-mile limit. Anyone can see that it is not workable today, as any fisherman will agree. The waters covering the European Union, the Mediterranean and the North sea overlap to such a large extent that we have to have an arrangement and the way to reach an arrange is through the European Union. That is what we are doing. The Government are quite right to pursue that endeavour and it can be achieved successfully.

The other argument concerns the amount of fishing that is possible. Any dispute between fishermen and those responsible should be sorted out by mutual discussion. The scientific adviser says that there ought to be some limitation. I heard fishermen say on television yesterday that there are masses of fish wherever they go. That can be sorted out without having an open row and suggestions that the fisheries policy should be abandoned. It is so unnecessary.

After the Hague agreement in 1976, the first common fisheries policy was established in 1983 and has continued. People talk about the losses experienced by our fishermen as a result of the Government policy in 1970-73, but I have the figures that show the changes.

In 1970, the total catch by British vessels was 963,000 tonnes; in 1971 it was 964,000 tonnes; in 1972 it was 942,000 tonnes; in 1973 it was 998,000 tonnes and in 1974 it was 954,000 tonnes. Those figures are very similar and my Government were responsible for that power. It is why the article is false and the remarks by my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington were abusive and I strongly object to them.

When we listen to the views of some of my hon. Friends today, we should note that there is a complete difference between the fishermen and the Euro-sceptics. Earlier today, a spokesman for the fishermen said that they wanted nothing whatever to do with Euro-sceptics. The fishermen value the European Union, and want a satisfactory arrangement within the European Union. The last thing they want to do is damage it.

Sir Richard Body (Holland with Boston): My right hon. Friend has been speaking to the Spanish fishermen.

Sir Edward Heath: I quite realise that some of my hon. Friends want to damage it. They can laugh all over their faces, because they do not have to think responsibly about the effect on other people.

I want to say something to my hon. Friends who represent the fishing industry. There is an important vote tonight. It may be quite important, not because it will change the position, but because of its political effect on the Conservative party. That is quite plain.

Of course my hon. Friends must take notice of the fishermen in their constituencies, but I also remind them of the remark by Burke so many centuries ago that is often repeated in the House. The purpose and responsibility of a representative is to look after the interests of his constituents, but he must also consider the interests of the country and the community. That is the basis of our work here.

Every hon. Member owes his constituents not only his energy "but his judgment". Those were Burke's words. We can offer our fishermen our energy, but my hon. Friends have to make a judgment tonight as to whether it is an event and a matter that justifies their defeating the Government. That is the crucial question to be answered. I do not think that many of our constituents, other than fishermen, would agree with that course of action. Indeed, I do not think that fishermen want to destroy the Government. Therefore, I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to give careful thought to what they will do at the end of the debate.

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): The Minister said that the key element is conservation, the key problem being too many boats and too many fishermen chasing too few fish. There is agreement on both sides of the House about the importance of conservation, and the key to successful conservation is enforcement.

If there is to be successful enforcement, there must be the perception of a level playing field, as it were, on which all the Community's fishing fleets operate. That is not the current perception. British fishermen feel that they are bearing the brunt of enforcement in achieving conservation. They feel that other fleets and other fishermen are escaping their fair share of responsibility. As a result, there is growing demand for withdrawal from the common fisheries rather than reform. I agree that withdrawal from the CFP is not practicable. It is not possible without withdrawal from the European Union. It is not, therefore, a serious option to be considered. But no one should underestimate the anger that is felt in fishing communities and which leads them to opt for withdrawal.

The Minister seemed to be asking for details to flesh out a package of reform. Most importantly, we need allies. It is striking that the Government seem to be isolated on fisheries policy year after year. They seem to be consistently outvoted when they argue their case with the other fisheries Ministers. It is not difficult to understand why the Government are consistently isolated. They are out of step on almost every other issue within the European Community. For example, they are out of step on the social chapter. As we have seen over the past couple of days, they are out of step on economic and monetary union. They are out of step also in discussions on foreign and security policies and moving them forward. It comes as no surprise, therefore, that the Government find themselves isolated on fisheries policy and unable to acquire the allies that are necessary if we are to defend British interests and obtain a fair deal for British fishermen.

The secretary of the Western Isles Fishermen's Association, which covers the Western Isles fleet, visited Madrid last week with a BBC television crew. He went to the big fish market there and found small, immature fish openly available for sale. He saw juvenile fish that should not have been landed. They should not have been for sale in any EU state. Apparently he saw hake only 4 in long. Whatever rules and regulations we write, they will mean nothing unless there is fair enforcement overall. If they mean nothing, the confidence of our fishing community will be undermined and eroded. As I said to the Secretary of State, the latest figures that I have show that there are only 12 fisheries officers in the whole of Spain.

Mr. Baldry rose—

Mr. Macdonald: Perhaps the Minister has the latest figures.

Mr. Baldry: In fact, there are 30 fisheries inspectors working for the Spanish Ministry of Agriculture; in addition, some 240 fisheries inspectors work for the autonomous Spanish regions, and 300 civil guard personnel devote part of their duties to fisheries enforcement work. Spain has 31 patrol vessels of the Spanish naval marine unit. Some 106 vessels are operated by regional Governments and the marine civil guard—all on fisheries protection work—and there are six aerial surveillance helicopters, so that is quite a substantial input by the Spanish Government in enforcing their fisheries regulations.

Mr. Macdonald: In that case, how can such a vast force fail to notice four-inch long fish being sold in the main market of the capital city of Spain? The Minister cannot simply recite figures and say that the number of fisheries officers in Spain has increased from 14 to 30, compared with 200 in the UK, without also acknowledging that there is a real problem: the perceived lack of a level playing field, whereby British fishermen have to work within the rules, because of the very tight and efficient enforcement of the rules in the United Kingdom, while Spanish fishermen get away with landing juvenile fish and breaking the rules time and again. That reality underlies the fear in relation to Spanish access. The Minister must address that point, and he must get allies—this is the key point—in the Council of Fisheries Ministers to help him to do that if he is to satisfy British fishermen.

Another aspect which plagues, troubles and depresses British fishermen is the existence of the Spanish flagships, which are counted against the British register, and their impact on the whole decommissioning process. Some 28 per cent. of the UK-registered fleet of more than 10 metres are now Spanish owned; they are crewed by Spaniards and land their catches in Spain. That exceeds the amount by which Britain is supposed to reduce its overall fleet to meet the EC guidelines. The UK is required to decommission 19 per cent. to meet EC targets. Unless we do that, our fishermen cannot get any aid to help to rebuild and renew their fleet. Yet the Spanish-flagged element counting against the British fleet is far in excess of what we have to decommission.

Worse than that, hardly any of the Spanish-flagged vessels are decommissioning. They make a massive contribution to our perceived overcapacity and yet make no contribution whatever to the solution of decommissioning. Where is the level playing field? A disaster is looming, of which the Minister must be aware. If it is not causing him sleepless nights, we fear for the future of the British fishing industry. If the decommissioning target of 19 per cent. is met exclusively by the real British boats within the British fleet, by the end of the decommissioning process, almost half the British-registered fleet will be Spanish owned. I fear what the reaction in British fishing communities will be if that were to happen.

I ask the Minister, when he replies, to address himself specifically to that question, because those vessels are making a mockery of the common fisheries policy, the British Government and their protections. It is still going on. Spanish boats are still being added against the British register. I appreciate that the British Government tried to find a solution. They were warned at the time that it would fail and it did, because it went against EC guidelines. It is vital that the British Government address that problem and find a solution. I suggest that one possible solution would be to have a real linkage between boats that are registered in Britain and which have to operate economically in Britain—that is, establish some kind of economic linkage. For example, boats would have to make a proportion of their landings, say three quarters—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order.

4.45 pm

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): I sometimes think back with nostalgia to the rather cosy debates that we used to have a number of years ago, when only Members who represented fishing industries, like myself, took part. On the other hand, I warmly welcome the wider focus now given to the fishing industry, because we will begin to find a solution to the plight—that is the only word to describe it—of our fishermen and the difficulties that they face only through the concern of many hon. Members or, indeed, people in the country.

I do not suppose that there has ever been a debate on this subject in the history of the House in which a former Prime Minister has spoken, and I very much welcome the fact that my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) has done so. I shall say a few words about his concluding remarks, because for all I know, they may have been aimed at me or, indeed, my colleagues who have the honour to represent fishing communities, and he was right to point out the precise dilemma that we face.

I do not want to vote against my Government tonight. I do not want to see my Government defeated. That would not be in the interests of my country or of the fishing industry. However, it is incumbent on people like myself to speak up for the industry and to fight for it, and in my years in the House that is what I have sought to do. One television interviewer said tonight, "Surely you want to be popular with your fishermen." I would like to be popular, but if one goes into politics one cannot always be popular, and at the end of the day one has to do what is right. What makes me despair is what has happened in recent years to our fishing industry and to the fishing industries of other countries.

That brings me to the amendment tabled by a number of my hon. Friends who are usually known as "Euro-sceptics". I welcome their interest in the fishing industry because it focuses attention on the difficulties of that industry. Having said that, I think that their amendment is misguided, particularly in the context of today's debate, because what the debate should be about is, of course, what will be before the Fisheries Ministers when they meet in Brussels on Thursday and Friday in relation to the setting of quotas for the coming year. That will affect in the immediate term the livelihood of fishermen in my constituency, because some pretty massive cuts are proposed for individual quotas and total allowable catches.

I refer to one of the reductions that the Commission proposes on species that are of direct concern to the fishermen of the south-west of England, and Cornwall in particular. I will not go into the precise details, but in the English channel a reduction of 41 per cent. is proposed for the allowable catch of sole. In the Bristol channel, a reduction of 27 per cent. is proposed. For plaice, a reduction of 34 per cent. is proposed. Those reductions follow on from reductions in previous years. What we are seeing, therefore, is cheating on a massive scale, because fishermen have to cheat to survive. They do not do it willingly; they loathe cheating, but that is the system that we now have. The problem is, what on earth can we do to change that system?

In their amendment, the Liberal Democrats ask for the review of the common fisheries policy to be brought forward. That may sound attractive, but unless the voting system is altered there will be a repetition of what happened on 23 December last year, when the United Kingdom was outvoted and the rest of the Community voted—under qualified majority voting—to allow 40 Spanish boats to fish in the waters of the former Irish box, where stocks were already under pressure. Where is the conservation in that? My friend—I regard him as my friend—the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace), the Liberal Democrats' agriculture and fisheries spokesman, is a sensible man. His party wants to abolish the veto altogether. I want to restore it, however, for the purposes of the review of the CFP.

For the past three days, people have been asking me, "How are you going to vote?" I am not sure how we are going to vote. I must face up to the dilemma posed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup: the balance between what I regard as in the national interest—maintaining the Government—against the importance of speaking up for the fishermen in my constituency. I make no secret of the fact that, together with my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Hicks)—who, I am sure, shares my views entirely—and my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Mr. Coe), I have spent a good deal of time talking to Ministers. We have presented them with a number of proposals, in particular on the central issue that should be debated here tonight—the reductions in quotas. I have received certain assurances, which I value very much, on what I believe will be the negotiating position of Her Majesty's Government when the Fisheries Council meets at the end of the week. I am fairly confident that, just before Christmas, we shall not be faced with reductions such as those that I mentioned earlier.

In my amendment—which, of course, has not been selected—I have asked my hon. Friends in the Government to negotiate changes upwards in the case of quotas which are not based on hard scientific evidence. The fishermen's organisations reckon that there is scope for that. I accept that in some instances cuts will have to be made, because the scientific evidence points irrefutably in that direction. I accept the conservation argument.

The hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) mentioned fairness, and that is at the root of the fishermen's anger: they do not think that the system is fair. Let me give an example. I am glad to see that the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is present. In the wake of the Budget, the Ministry decided to abolish harbour grants in England, but not in Scotland nor, I believe, in Wales. That is not fair.

Mr. Baldry: My hon. Friend is right. I have listened carefully to colleagues' views over the past few days, and my hon. Friend—along with my hon. Friends the Members for South Hams (Mr. Steen), for South-East Cornwall, for Falmouth and Camborne and for Wyre (Mr. Mans)—has made the importance of the harbour, marketing and processing grants to local fishing industry. I see the force of their case, especially their arguments that expectations had been raised about the giving of those grants earlier in the year. In the light of their representations, we have decided to reinstate the grants.

Mr. Harris: I am very grateful to my hon. Friend. The decision will be particularly welcome in Newlyn, where an application of long standing was being rejected because of the cuts.

All hon. Members on both sides of the House must find a way forward so that we can restore real confidence to the fishing industry. I wish that we could put aside party politics, and politics involving the future of Europe, and concentrate on achieving a solution. That is what our fishermen need and deserve.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I share many of the sentiments expressed by the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris), whom it is my privilege and pleasure to follow in so many fisheries debates.

This debate has attracted a wider audience than usual. Despite all the media speculation, we would do the fishing industry a gross disservice if we did not spend some time focusing on issues of particular interest to that industry at the Council meeting that will take place on Thursday and Friday this week. As the hon. Member for St. Ives pointed out, there are to be considerable reductions in total allowable catches of a range of species, and that will have serious consequences for the industry as it plans for 1996 and the future.

As has been said, there is growing concern—there has always been concern, but it seems to be increasing annually—about the scientific basis on which some of the TACs are decided. Only a few years ago, the fishing industry was being told that the North sea whiting was a predatory fish, and that it would therefore be helpful to catch as many as possible. Dangled before the industry was the possibility of smaller mesh sizes and lower minimum landing sizes—which, in fairness to it, it resisted. In 1990, the TAC for whiting was 135,000 tonnes; although the fishermen were told to fish as much whiting as they could, the TAC has now been reduced to 67,000 tonnes. There is something wrong with that.

The Minister will be aware that the Scottish industry in particular would like the Hague preference to be invoked in respect of North sea whiting. Is that on the Government's agenda for Thursday's negotiations?

Mr. Baldry: Yes.

Mr. Wallace: I welcome that news. Let me add that, when the Hague preference has been invoked in the past, there has been a tendency to average it out rather than bringing it up to the full amount; the industry will be looking for the full amount.

Western mackerel is an important species in my constituency. In terms of quota allocation, tonnage and horsepower, 30 per cent. of the United Kingdom's pelagic fleet is based in Shetland, but what has happened to the TACs for western mackerel? In 1992, they were increased by 15 per cent., in 1993 by 10 per cent. and in 1994 by eight per cent. On the basis of those growing TACs, over the past two or three years and into next year, constituents of mine will have invested some £50 million in new vessels. That is an important business decision.

If a Japanese company had invested that amount in microchips, no doubt there would have been a press conference at the Scottish Office, with the Secretary of State cutting the first sod for the factory. It is a substantial investment, which has been made on the basis of what were originally growing TACs. However, they were reduced by 20 per cent. this year, and it is predicted that they will be reduced by 33 per cent. next year. That is no long-term basis for stability on which the industry can make serious investments.

It appears that this year Norway has gone forward by the lowest common denominator, on the basis that it sees opportunities in the Atlanto-Scandian herring negotiations. If he has time, will the Minister confirm that the United Kingdom—the European Union, indeed, but with the United Kingdom receiving a share—will seek a share-out of the winter herring, now known as the Atlanto-Scandian herring, in the waters to the north of Shetland? A premature allocation would be regrettable; it would be better if UK vessels were allowed to fish the stock as they have in the past.

We may well find that a substantial part of that stock can be caught in European Union waters, which would entitle the European Union and, in turn, the United Kingdom to a substantial share in the future. That would help to offset some of the disappointments and lost fishing opportunities that have resulted from the cuts in mackerel and herring TACs.

The hon. Member for St. Ives mentioned plaice. The reduction in plaice TACs has had a serious effect on the east coast, and there has been a knock-on effect because of the fewer opportunities for swaps. That applies not only to the east coast, but all around the channel ports and into the south-west. Those in the south-west fear that, if opportunities in regard to quota stocks of Bristol channel and North sea plaice are cut, many of the non-quota stocks fished by fishermen in the south-west will be under ever greater pressure. It is important to take that dimension into account.

I could go into many details, but I shall deal finally with the west coast nephrops precautionary total allowable catch, which was originally set at 16,000 tonnes. That TAC was based on very little scientific evidence. My understanding is that the scientists do not know when prawns spawn or how long they live: it is an inadequate science. Over the years the TAC was reduced to 12,600 tonnes on no more detailed or sophisticated scientific evidence than that for some time that was what was being landed. It appears that that amount was fished out early this year and it is thought that returning to 16,000 tonnes, which was satisfactory in the past, would give adequate fishing opportunity to those who fish the west coast nephrops. I ask the Minister to consider that in his negotiations later this week.

Underlying all these problems is the unsatisfactory nature of the TAC arrangements. There is no proper mechanism to channel into the decision-making process the fishermen's experience of stocks and the change in behaviour. I understand that there were substantial quantities of cod in the Humber in the latter part of this year when boats were tied up and the fishermen could not go after it.

In the 1992 changes to the common fisheries policy there is reference to a scientific, technical and economic committee. But economic and social consequences seldom seem to be taken into account. As I have said, the roller-coaster approach is damaging not just the catching sector but the processing and marketing sectors. If we could take forward the multi-annual strategic approach that was agreed in 1992 it would encourage scientists to look to the longer term when considering TACs and not base their conclusions on just one year's findings. That could lead to greater stability in the industry.

I reject the idea that a 200-mile limit within which Britain would have complete sovereignty would be a solution to our problems. As I said in the debate on 22 November, a 200-mile limit off Canada has not stopped the collapse of the cod industry on the Atlantic seaboard nor has it stopped the overfishing of pollock on the Russian pacific coast. A limit is no panacea.

[Mr. Wallace]

I regret, although it is no reflection on the Chair, that we cannot vote on the amendment that was tabled by the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) and his hon. Friends because it would have been bombed out of court. By a long way there is no majority in the House for Britain to renege on its international obligations and withdraw from the common fisheries policy. The policy requires a thoroughgoing reform along the lines that I suggested in the debate on 22 November, and there must be proper enforcement.

During the Secretary of State's speech the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) intervened and spoke about the hours of enforcement. That was one of the most telling points in the debate because if the fisheries policy is common its enforcement must be common as well. That has been missing and the fishermen perceive gross injustice and unfairness. We need to address that as efficiently, effectively and vigorously as possible.

My hon. Friends and I will vote against the Government. There are a good number of reasons for doing that and many of them have been set out in the amendment. The Government had a late conversion on decommissioning although hon. Members in all parts of the House mentioned it time and again in fisheries debates. European taxpayers' money is funding the modernisation of the Spanish fishing fleet, but we are not allowed to have access to funds to modernise the British fishing fleet. The days-at-sea legislation had a damaging effect and it was abandoned only after recourse to the European Court of Justice.

I went through the Division lists and it would be interesting for other hon. Members to do that to see how many of the 17 hon. Members who signed one of the amendments on the Order Paper voted in favour of restrictions on the amount of time that fishermen could spend at sea. There is also the whole question of Spanish access and the issue of a secret deal. The Secretary of State referred again to the fact that the House agreed to Spanish and Portuguese accession in 1986, but he failed to mention that the terms of that agreement were secretly changed. The House has never been properly told why that happened. The fact that there was no support for Britain last year on the detail of Spanish access shows how we have lost friends, and that in turn damages our ability to support our fishing industry.

The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) said that from outside the Community Norway seems to have a better deal for its fishermen. Within the Community, Spain seems to do well for its fishermen. The Government invite the House to back them and say that they will support the best interests of British fishermen, but many of us long ago gave up on the Government knowing what are the best interests of British fishermen.

5.4 pm

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim): There is no doubt that the dictated common fisheries policy is driving the fishing community in Northern Ireland and in other parts of the United Kingdom into severe decline. Fishing in Northern Ireland is worth more than £20 million a year and offers employment to more than 2,000 people, 1,200 of whom are actively engaged on trawlers. It is an important industry but every year it receives further body blows that are forcing fishermen out of the industry altogether.

The main concern of Ulster fishermen is the allocation of quotas in the Irish sea. In past years Northern Ireland's fishermen have witnessed those allocations being greatly reduced. For instance, since 1990 the total allowable catch in the Irish sea has been reduced by 40 per cent. The whiting allocation has been cut by 44 per cent. and the TAC for prawns, which are the foundation of the Ulster fleet, has been cut by 25 per cent. Government policies in alliance with the European Union mean that Northern Ireland fishermen cannot build vessels that are capable of fishing the deep waters to the west of Ireland and Scotland. It is ridiculous that Northern Ireland fishermen have to sit idly by while fishermen from other parts of the European Union are able to exploit those resources.

The strong feeling among many fishermen is that they are forced into quotas which bear no relation to the fish that are to be found in the fishing grounds. On top of that, the depleted quotas are further hit by the detrimental effect of the Hague preference on United Kingdom allocations. That preference, which is part of the common fisheries policy, awards fishermen in the Irish Republic extra fish at the expense of their northern colleagues.

In 1995 British fishermen in the Irish sea lost 805 tonnes of cod to the Irish Republic, which annually fails to catch its own allocation. That example is repeated in other stocks. Consequently, the United Kingdom has to swap away some of its other quota allocations so as to regain some of the fish without which vessels would be tied up at the quays. Despite the return of cod quota British fishermen are still 290 tonnes short of the previous year's allocation of Irish sea cod. The Hague preference along with drastic quota cuts mean that Ulster's fishermen are being driven from their traditional fishing grounds.

A major factor complicating matters this year is the uncertainty surrounding the future of international swaps. It is important that those swaps should proceed because by means of them fishermen are at least able to gain access to a quota that would not otherwise be available. The nettle of the iniquitous Hague preference system, which acts to the detriment of Northern Ireland fishermen, must be grasped. Additionally, we have the prospect, from 1 January next year, of the entry of up to 40 Spanish fishing vessels into the Irish box, while restrictions are placed on people who have fished in the Irish box for generations. Spanish fishing vessels, renowned for disregarding fishing controls and regulations, are being allowed in.

In relation to 1996 total allowable catches and quotas, it is the same depressing story of more cuts. Something needs to be done about the haddock TAC for the Irish sea. The ridiculously small quota allocated for haddock means that fishermen are not able to take advantage of the tremendous haddock fishery. There is a proposal to have further cuts in cod to the tune of 6.9 per cent. Cuts are also proposed for plaice and sole. Those are unacceptable to Ulster fishermen.

Although Northern Ireland and United Kingdom fishermen are having quotas cut and are being rigidly regulated and policed by the authorities under European Union regulations, the same cannot be said of other EU countries, which makes fishermen very angry. A recent comparison of member state enforcement resources, undertaken by the EU itself, showed that the United Kingdom was devoting far more resources than any other member to enforce the fishing regulations.

I refer to a paper issued by the EU on the European Commission's estimate of existing resources and their utilisation. I find that, annually, Belgium puts in 15 surveillance hours, Denmark none, Germany none, Spain 50, France 500, Ireland 700, the Netherlands none, Portugal 100 and our own nation 4,800. Those are not my figures, but EU figures. That must alarm everyone in the fishing industry. It is a pity that there are not a few Nelsons back in the fishing industry to put a telescope to a blind eye and to let the fishermen get a proper quota. We are told that we should not say those things, but if the law is unfair, it must be dealt with, and this law is unfair. No wonder our fishermen are angry and frustrated, not only at the EU laws that have created the framework for their industry's destruction, but at the zeal with which these regulations are policed by our own authorities.

On a separate, but not entirely unrelated, issue, 1995 saw the European Court judgment on the fishing industry's judicial review of Her Majesty's Government's proposed days-at-sea legislation. Although the court's decision came down on the Government's side, it was clear to many people that the industry won a moral victory through the withdrawal of the proposals. The industry, however, incurred the legal costs. Why will not the Government say that they will not demand that money from the fishing industry? Today, one concession has been given. That on the legal costs would be a good concession to give to the fishing industry.

That is another difficult burden for the industry to bear at a time when it is coming under increasing pressure. The Minister should consider waiving the Ministry's legal costs associated with the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations' legal challenge to the Government on this issue. It is all right for a former Prime Minister to tell us that all fishermen are for the European Community. He should come on some of the ships that I have been on and he would hear a different story altogether. Many fishing industry members are outraged at what is happening. I agree with a colleague sitting along this Bench, the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor). As we have handed away power after power to Europe, we are not now going to be in a position to remedy this situation.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): In the course of a largely knockabout speech, the Secretary of State for Scotland aimed a sideswipe at the Euro-sceptics by saying that much of their interest in the fish industry was "belated"—I think that was the word he used. Of course that is correct—it is belated. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) for answering the question asked by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) and pointing out that, of the 17 hon. Members on the Euro-sceptic amendment this evening, 13 voted with the Government on fishing industry tie-ups on 9 December 1992.

Many of us, including the Secretary of State, may not have records that we would like to remember in relation to the fishing industry. I remember a debate in 1991 on tie-ups, when, as a junior Scottish Office Minister, he sat with his feet on that Dispatch Box, sniggering, while many of us tried to argue a case about fishing safety and safety at sea in the fishing industry. Unfortunately for him, that debate has not been forgotten around the communities of Scotland.

There has been some entertainment this evening for those of us who have observed the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food touring the Back Benches, speaking to the potential rebels in the vote tonight. Now we know that the inducement that is being offered is to restore the financial instrument for fisheries guidance, which was cancelled only last month in England. I am not sure whether the fishing harbour grant scheme, which was cancelled last month in both Scotland and England, is to be restored as well, but the night is still young.

My advice to the potential rebels on the Tory Back Benches tonight is, "For goodness' sake, do not be bought cheaply, as so many of your predecessors have been in fishing debates." I remember a previous Minister of Agriculture standing at that Dispatch Box, saying that he gave his word to the House that under no circumstances would the regulations elsewhere in Europe be any different from those pertaining on United Kingdom fishermen. How many of us believe that that commitment has been kept and honoured in the past few years?

Therefore, my advice to Conservative Members thinking of rebellion is, "Watch your votes," because what is said in honeyed words now might be different from what is said once the danger of the vote has passed.

I want to ask the Minister three specific questions, and I hope that he will deal with them in summing up. Earlier, in an intervention, I made the point that it seemed evident that Spain, from within the common fisheries policy, and Norway from outwith the CFP, have secured a better deal for their fishermen than the UK has in the past few years.

The former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath), reminded us of the Hague preference, which is another example that is worth remembering. That preference, which has been so useful to our fishermen, was achieved because of the intervention of Garrett Fitzgerald when he was Irish Foreign Minister in 1976. It was the Irish who secured the Hague preference, which has been so useful to fishermen north of Bridlington in the past few years. Substantial evidence exists, therefore, of the point that was made earlier in the debate.

One reason why the Norwegians have been dictating the pace of the negotiations is that they, in relation to the pelagic side, have the comfort of the new 1 million tonne revived stock of Atlanto-Scandian herring. I want to ask the specific question: as that is an international stock, what percentage of it does the Minister believe the UK and the Scottish pelagic fleet will be entitled to when it comes back on stream in the coming year?

Mr. Baldry: On the part of the stock that is in international waters, those negotiations will start in the new year, and obviously, we will seek to obtain the largest possible quota for the UK industry—it is as straightforward and as simple as that. One must remember, however, that a sizeable part of that stock is in Norwegian waters.

Mr. Salmond: I will take that as an indication that the Minister appreciates the importance of that stock in a circumstance where the pelagic fleet will face tough times as a result of the Norwegian negotiations.

[Mr. Salmond]

The second precise point is on cod and haddock. From scientific evidence, it seemed to fishermen representatives that there was room for an increase in cod and haddock total allowable catches, but the TAC was restricted for cod, and there has been no increase for haddock. There is an important point here. Many of us believe that a relaxation in the TACs would result in fewer fish being caught and being discarded. Will the Minister return to that point, given that the scientific evidence does not seem to support the tough stance that the Norwegians successfully forced on the European Commission two weeks ago?

Thirdly, I want to emphasise the point about whiting made by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland. It is impossible to fathom the Commission's thinking on the whiting stock. A few years ago, it was defined as a predatory species that had to be fished down, and the minimum landing size had to be reduced so as to cut its numbers, so why is its TAC now being sharply reduced? Does the Minister intend to invoke the Hague preference to try to ensure that there will be at least some fishing opportunities in the coming year for that important stock for the Scottish industry?

I am greatly concerned about structural support for the fishing industry. In a memorable phrase, Cecil Finn of the Scottish Fishermen's Federation said that the industry was "still wallowing in the broken water of the do nothing years".

He was talking about the years between 1987 and 1993, when—because of the obduracy of the then Minister of Agriculture, who set his face against decommissioning schemes because of his personal experience as a Minister in previous years—although the United Kingdom industry had 12 to 15 per cent. of the overall European fleet, it received only about 2 per cent. of the structural funding.

That put our industry and our communities at a huge competitive disadvantage. It now looks as though, in both objective 1 areas, and certainly in my area of Grampian, the PESCA scheme, which was introduced to try to compensate fishing-dependent communities for the effects of the difficulties that the industry has faced over the past few years, is also being jeopardised. That is happening because of the Scottish Office's refusal to allow local authorities the additional cash required to qualify for European funding. I hope that the Minister will pick up that point, too, in his summing up.

My third key point about structural support is that it would be helpful to clarify whether the harbour scheme is back on for this year. That was not clear from the exchange between the Minister and the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris).

Mr. Baldry: The hon. Gentleman cannot have been listening, because the rest of the House heard, and clearly understood, that I have heard and carefully considered the representations by some of my hon. Friends, and that the harbour scheme has been reinstated.

Mr. Salmond: For Scotland too?

Mr. Michael Forsyth rose—

Mr. Salmond: Just a nod will do.

Mr. Forsyth: If the hon. Gentleman will give way, I shall happily answer the question.

Mr. Salmond indicated assent.

Mr. Forsyth: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Scottish position was that we did not follow the English on FIFG—the financial instrument of fisheries grant. But yes, the harbour scheme will be open.

Mr. Salmond: We know about the FIFG. That is why I asked about the harbour scheme, and I thank the Minister for confirming the position there.

The question marks over structural support at this difficult time for the fishing industry, and the track record on decommissioning, represent one of the Government's great failures over the industry. But the Government have had many other failures, too. The failure on flag of convenience vessels was a policy failure, which caused the industry huge difficulties and totally wrecked any hope of reaching the multi-annual guidance programme targets. The Government's entire strategy floundered because of that decision. I served on the Committee on the Merchant Shipping Act 1988, and the Government were warned that the use of nationality as a basis might flounder in the European Court, but they went ahead just the same.

There was also a failure concerning accelerated access for the Spanish. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) gave way to the wrong Euro-sceptic, when, earlier in the debate, the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) was about to tell us of the secret deal that resulted in the Spanish being allowed, almost unilaterally, to revise their own treaty of accession, and thus to secure accelerated access to western waters. The hon. Lady was about to reveal to the House what the Government had had in mind, and whether there had been any concession by Spain on qualified majority voting. She should have been encouraged to continue.

The Government's biggest failure has been their failure to bring about a coherent fisheries policy. Today we have heard that a review group is to meet, and is expected to report early next year. However, the Scottish Fishermen's Federation is still awaiting the formal reply to its submission of September 1993, which contained a series of suggested ways of approaching the problems of the industry.

Time and time again, the fishing industry has offered the Government a strategy, and time and time again, the people at the Dispatch Box have greeted it with deaf ears. That is why, when fishing communities all around the coast have been sold down the river so many times by Ministers, if the Government are defeated on their fisheries policy tonight, there will be rejoicing in every fishing port the length and breadth of the United Kingdom.

Sir Richard Body (Holland with Boston): My right hon. and hon. Friends in the Government can be assured that they will have a majority tonight, because members of the Labour party intend to demonstrate their support for the fishing industry by staying at home—preferring, I regret to say, a rather longer Christmas holiday than they would otherwise have.

Of course, there are some notable exceptions, such as the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). The hon. Gentleman and I can remember when fishing was an important industry for Lincolnshire; no one can claim that it is now. Fishing is in serious decline. I believe that fewer than 20 boats now go out of Grimsby, and in Boston we have only 40 boats in all, only a fraction of which go out at any one time.

Those who argue on behalf of the fishing industry have said again and again that the common fisheries policy will cause the total allowable catch to go down and down, because it contains no effective conservation measures. I shall draw attention to two main factors. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister of State has been considering them, and I hope that he will argue them effectively on Thursday.

The first problem is the size of nets. We are now catching immature little fish that have had too little opportunity to grow. Most of the cod we now catch are half the size that they should be. From a conservation standpoint, that is woeful.

Secondly, there are the discards; I am sure that you know all about them, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Discards are the fish that are thrown back dead into the sea, because we are not allowed to catch them. If those were only a few fish, no one would much mind, but various estimates have been made of their numbers, and the best is that discards probably account for about 1,000 million fish a year. Surely that is a crime against conservation. I hope that the Minister of State will raise that matter vigorously on Thursday, and press instead for a levy on excess catches.

Hon. Members with some part of the inshore fishing industry in their constituencies know that, as matters now stand, despite what my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) said—I do not know where my right hon. Friend has met fishermen, but I suspect that it cannot have been in this country—no fisherman has any confidence in the future of the industry after the year 2002.

Fishermen know that, when that day comes, their existing rights will have to be renegotiated, and they have no idea where they will stand then. That has created appalling uncertainty in the fishing industry. Fishing has been largely a father-to-son affair. No father in the fishing industry with a teenage son will encourage his son to join him as he will have joined his own father years before.

Moreover, even with the old dilapidated boats that we have in Boston and elsewhere, no fisherman is going to replace his boat—partly because, in the present uncertainty, no bank will lend him the many thousands of pounds that that would cost. Indeed, hardly any fishermen I know are willing to spend large sums on maintaining their boats as they should be maintained if they are to continue fishing for a few more years.

Many inshore fishermen in their forties ask me whether it is not time to get out of fishing now, rather than wait for 2002, when they will be in their fifties and it will be far more difficult for them to find another occupation. The year 2002 may seem far away to many of us, but for people concerned with inshore fishing, it is drawing close.

My hon. Friend the Minister knows that last year, at a representative gathering of fishermen in Lowestoft, I said that the common fisheries policies was so absurd, and acted so unjustly against our fishermen, that I was convinced that the Government would renegotiate it. I was pressed about that, and I said that I felt so certain about the matter that I would not reapply for the Whip until the Government renegotiated. I only hope that, on Thursday, my hon. Friend the Minister will enable me to put that matter right.

5.29 pm

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down): It is somewhat ironic that, at a time of year when most of commerce and industry is looking forward to the festive season, we are debating an industry that is in a state of depression and is wondering what fate will befall it after this week's EU conference. It has been a momentous year in fishing, with traumas, successes and legal victories.

Decommissioning, which is a reflection of the depression in the fishing industry, should not be taken as a victory. It has certainly helped in trying to eradicate some of the hardships in the industry, but it is not a victory in itself. Northern Ireland's fishermen are worse off than most other UK fishermen.

My constituency has three of the four fishing ports in Northern Ireland, and they depend very much on the fisheries in the Irish sea area VIIa. Local fishermen must cope with quotas—which, they say, bear no relation to the fish to be found in the area—but the depleted quotas will be further hit by the detrimental effect of the Hague preference allocations. Unfortunately, this year new complications have crept into the equation in the shape of the uncertainty surrounding international swaps. It is vital that the swaps proceed. They provide a much-needed lifeline that sustains viable fisheries in area VII, and their importance in the wider western waters area is crucial.

My constituency is unique as it has a water border with the Republic of Ireland. Fishermen from my constituency, who are restricted by quotas, can see their colleagues just a couple of miles away in the Irish Republic merrily fishing. They are not catching the quotas allocated to them under the Hague preference. It is important that the international swaps are negotiated in such a way that Northern Ireland fishermen get the better part of their traditional access to the Irish sea fisheries in area VIIa. The swaps must not be used as a back door for additional Spanish or other European fishing fleets to gain access to protected waters.

I understand that evidence given by the Advisory Committee on Fisheries Management at a recent meeting seemed to be based on fairly weak foundations. The ACFM seems to contend that if a TAC is not caught, the fish do not exist. That is nonsense and it has no scientific base whatsoever. The vast majority of countries annually fail to catch their TAC, and sometimes only 50 per cent. or 60 per cent. of the catch is taken up. On that basis, scientists propose to make further cuts, which seems to be totally unscientific and illogical. The cuts will have little or no impact on nations that do not catch their TAC, but a very substantial impact on those countries whose TAC is so restricted as to be minimal.

Northern Ireland's fishermen have been crying out for some time for something to be done with the area VII haddock TAC. Fishermen tell me, and I have no reason to doubt them, that there is a very substantial haddock fishery, but as the United Kingdom quota is so small—it is only some 600 tonnes—they have been unable to take advantage of the abundance of stock. Despite all their efforts, they have been told that the stock merits only a brief mention in this year's report by fisheries' scientists, despite the fact that the scientists agree that the fish are there. What are fishermen supposed to do? Why is the scientific community not as quick to advise on increases in quotas as it is to advise on cuts?

The second matter to which I should like to refer is cod area VIIa. The ACFM advised that there should be almost 7 per cent. of further cuts in this TAC. The cut is not as severe as in previous years, but fishermen in Northern Ireland have no confidence in the ACFM's proposals. Catches during 1995 in the species and sector have been as good as, if not better than, in previous years, so how distinct to area VIIa is the cod stock?

Has any calculation been made of the consequences of decommissioning? One of the consequences is that there will be a reduction in the effort put into fishing. Have these points been taken into consideration? I contend that if they had, the proposed 6.9 per cent. reduction in cod for area VIIa would not have been proposed.

Fishermen have little confidence in the ACFM's proposals for plaice and sole because, again, it appears that an unscientific approach has been taken to the problem. There is substantial evidence of well-recovered stocks of haddock, cod, plaice and sole in the sector.

I hope that in their negotiations towards the end of the week, Ministers will take the matter on board and challenge the evidence that has been given. It seems that our European partners do not take proper cognisance of the scientific evidence, which is freely available, and they seem panic-stricken as they go for further and further quota cuts.

I referred earlier to the relationship between the fishermen of Northern Ireland and of the Republic of Ireland. We have heard from other hon. Members that some of the quotas are simply not caught in the Republic of Ireland. Each year, the Department of Agriculture at the Northern Ireland Office enters into negotiations with its counterpart in the Republic of Ireland to arrange for local swaps of those parts of the quota that will not be caught.

Could not the Government enter into a more meaningful and long-term agreement with the fisheries department in the Republic of Ireland, whereby there could be an exchange of unfished quotas between the two fishing fleets? After all, until a few decades ago, the fleets had a common approach and common fishing areas, and they still have the same interests. Could not the Government make this a more meaningful and permanent arrangement, so that the element of uncertainty between the north and south of Ireland could be eliminated?

I hope that there will be an increase in quotas for cod and whiting in area VII, and that the quota arrangements for haddock in area VIIa will be enhanced to take cognisance of the scientific evidence, which seems to show that fishing shoals have returned there. Finally, there is a need for more permanent swap arrangements with the Republic of Ireland.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): I have no interest to declare in the debate, other than that as a practical butcher and farmer, I have enormous sympathy with the plight of that other group of intensely practical people—British fishermen—as a result of the machinations of the common fisheries policy. I have not hidden my ambition to see this country leave the CFP, which is also the object of the Save Britain's Fish campaign, to which I and several of my colleagues have pledged our support.

Some in the Chamber will seek to question my motives for supporting the amendment in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson). I do not impugn the motives of the integrationists on these Benches, and I trust that they will desist from impugning mine. Some people recognise the danger that the renegotiation of the CFP by 2002 would, in the words of my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris),

> "mean the end of the fishing industry as we know it".—[Official Report, 22 November 1995; Vol. 267, c. 581.]

However, if those people, perversely, do not support amendment (b), suffice to say that the ballot box will be the final arbiter.

I have spent some time reading and re-reading the Official Report of the debates that took place on 23 October and 22 November to refresh my memory of the arguments deployed by the Minister of State in defence of the CFP. I accept that his basic position is as set out in his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Porter), when he stated:

> "Withdrawal from the common fisheries policy is not an option, either legally or practically."—[Official Report, 17 July 1995; Vol. 263, c. 969.]

I will deal with those points in due course.

My hon. Friend's case against withdrawal from the CFP seems to hang on three points: first, the time that it would take the Government to negotiate satisfactory bilateral agreements with other countries; secondly, the absence of any especially strong or co-ordinated objections to the CFP in the past; and, thirdly, the legal problems associated with disengagement.

I trust that the House will recognise that none of those arguments is sufficient in itself to justify the perpetuation of a regime that is so obviously defective in that it is precipitating the demise of British fishing industry, failing to protect fishing stocks, encouraging short-term exploitation at the expense of genuine conservation, making criminals of otherwise honest people alienating public opinion and perpetuating the situation in which a vital British interest is compromised by the process of qualified majority voting.

On the point about negotiating satisfactory bilateral agreements, it is a fact that the Government are concluding such agreements with all sorts of countries on all sorts of issues as a matter of routine. Does my hon. Friend the Minister of State accept that, in the calendar year to date, the Government have concluded no fewer than 81 bilateral treaties and 28 multilateral treaties? The time that Ministers and civil servants expend in the process has never previously deterred Governments from pursuing their objectives. That is an entirely spurious argument to advance as a reason for doing nothing about the common fisheries policy.

My hon. Friend the Minister of State has asserted that there have been no protests in the past about the CFP. In 1971, however, the fishing industry was assured by the Government that its interests would be protected. Indeed, I have a photocopy of a letter dated 4 October 1971, signed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath), in which he said:

> "For our part, as the White Paper said, we are determined to secure arrangements which will safeguard the interests of British fishermen."

When the Prime Minister of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, no less, gave such a categorical assurance, the whole industry was entitled to believe that there was no cause for concern.

Fishermen at that time, and subsequently, were entitled to believe that their interests really would be protected. It is only now that the realisation is dawning that this never was—and under the terms of the CFP never could be—the case. The fact that it has taken 20 years or more for the duplicity of a previous generation of politicians to manifest itself cannot in any way justify my hon. Friend's determination to preserve the present arrangements.

I also submit that any person looking dispassionately at the present unsatisfactory situation would recognise that the reason why there were no strong objections about fisheries, as my hon. Friend the Minister of State avers, at the time of the Spanish and Portuguese accession is in good measure because the Spanish and the Portuguese were not scheduled to gain full access to the CFP until 2002. It is the bringing forward of their full membership of the CFP to 1 January 1996 that has precipitated the present outcry.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gill: I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman. As he knows, we are limited to 10-minute speeches and I am anxious to make several points. I hope that he will have an opportunity to make his contribution to the debate.

Whatever the Government may say about the Spanish accession, a deal was done at the time of the later accession of Austria, Finland and Sweden to the European Community whereby full membership of the CFP for the Spanish and Portuguese was accelerated by six years. At no stage were right hon. and hon. Members informed that that was being done, nor the reasons for doing it.

My hon. Friend the Minister of State's assertion that Members of Parliament were fully aware of the ramifications of the United Kingdom's entry into the CFP is questionable. Furthermore, I question whether hon. Members were able to follow the Government's more recent footwork in accelerating the full entry of Spain and Portugal into the CFP. I wonder how many parliamentarians, even today, are aware that the CFP is not spelt out in treaty form, but exists only by dint of EC regulations.

I turn now to the Minister's statement that it is not practically possible to withdraw from the CFP. Indeed, he addressed that problem in an earlier debate. He is on record as saying:

> "It is politically unrealistic to imagine that a new deal can be done that will result in other countries in the European Union giving away fishing opportunities to the United Kingdom."—[Official Report, 22 November 1995; Vol. 267, c. 591.]

Precisely. It is inconceivable that any other member of the European Union would vote for any substantial change in the present arrangements, under which the majority of European Union countries get a bargain at the expense of the United Kingdom.

We get what can only be described as a raw deal, notwithstanding the fact that this country contributes more than 60 per cent. of the European Union's fishing stocks. My hon. Friend the Minister recognises that, under qualified majority voting, it is practically impossible to obtain any redress for Great Britain. Those who believe that the application of a veto will alter that situation are deluding themselves and misleading the people whom they represent.

On the subject of the legal obstacles to withdrawal from the CFP, I remind my hon. Friend that the political reality is that, at the next general election, the electorate will not stop to consider the legal niceties, but will simply vote in accordance with their perception of what is right or wrong.

I conclude my remarks by reminding my hon. Friend the Minister that Cicero's maxim

> "salus populi suprema est lex"—

the good of the people is the chief law—is, in the context of his present difficulties, the overriding political imperative in the run-up to the next general election. This fisheries policy is not the will of the people: it is the diktat of bureaucrats and their political apparatchiks.

5.48 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): An interesting paradox of these debates is the fact that the stronger the opposition in the fishing industry to the common fisheries policy grows, the more vigorously Ministers come here to defend it—inadequately and disingenuously—and the less they can deliver. They busily defend it in the Chamber while obtaining little that will benefit the fishing industry in the United Kingdom.

Today the Government are putting the squeeze on their supporters and telling them not to rock the boat or damage relations with Europe. Their line is that if we rock the boat on the common fisheries policy it could endanger our whole relationship with Europe. Meanwhile the Conservatives' leader, the Prime Minister, goes to European Councils, rocks the boat and damages our relations with Europe. In other words, the Government are telling their Back Benchers not to behave like the Prime Minister.

Instead of coming here to deliver their laboured defences of the common fisheries policy—as witness the Minister's opening speech—Ministers would be better employed getting some achievements for the British fishing industry. They should be as virile in Europe in obtaining something for our fishermen as they are in the House when defending the CFP to their own Back Benchers. I do not want to pursue that path today, but most of the debate has centred on it.

Our fishing industry is in crisis, and nowhere more so than in Grimsby, whose fleet, as the hon. Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) suggested, has shrunk below the limits of viability. The same is happening all over the country. As British vessels go out of business, their track records are bought up by quota hoppers. Most of the fishing done in excess of our targets is done by foreign companies which arrive and buy up British quotas because they are over target in their own countries. So they escape their targets by buying up the British quotas, and if flagship vessels went out of business we would find ourselves below target.

Ministers are imposing a double whammy on the industry. First, it is hit by the common fisheries policy. That is inevitable; our fishing grounds are the richest in the world, so we shall face intense competition if we turn a larger European fishing effort loose on them. If the CFP were effective in terms of conservation, we would not be holding today's debate because the industry would not be facing the problems of over-fishing and shrinking stocks.

Ministers have not defended British interests at all. When it comes to negotiations, something else is always more important so they give way on fishing—on Spanish access to our fishing grounds, for instance, to get Norway into the European Community. Always the higher aim results in fishing being sacrificed. To that extent, Ministers do not defend British fishing interests in Europe.

At the same time as the CFP is damaging our industry, Ministers are failing to provide it with the sort of backing and support which our competitor countries give their industries. They are our competitors, not our partners. The French fishing industry still gets the fuel subsidy to which Ministers have been objecting. That subsidy helps with the fuel costs of French fishing boats which come to fish in our fishing grounds—and it comes from the French Government. No such support is forthcoming from our Government.

Other industries such as the Spanish receive Government support for modernising their fleets, which then compete with our aging fleet which receives no Government support of that kind. Nor does our industry have the benefit of ports of landing facilities, which are provided as a local government service to the Danish and Dutch fleets. We pay heavy landing charges for which there is no Government help.

The industry might be able to put up with one or other—with the depredations of the CFP on the one hand or the lack of Government support on the other. The ports of landing in Europe are inadequately policed, so that there is no real control over the catches taken from our waters. The fishing industry might be able to cope with the slow anorexia that the Government are imposing on it, but it cannot cope with both problems at once.

It is wrong for Ministers to come here and vigorously defend the CFP when that defence is no more than a cloak for their inactivity and inadequate support for the industry. The industry cannot support the double whammy being imposed on it. When we lament the coming cuts in quotas, Ministers always tell us in these debates that they intend to go to Europe and get a good deal for our interests. They then come back after Christmas and apologise, saying that they were outvoted and could not get their way—they could not get the deal that we had been led to expect. The same will happen again this time.

We are being asked to accept substantial reductions in the total allowable catch of plaice; that will be disastrous for Grimsby, which relies mainly on cod but also on plaice. The problem would be compounded if the Minister engaged in the yearly swap agreed with the Dutch on plaice quotas. If plaice quotas are to be reduced, we cannot agree to any further such swaps with the Dutch. I hope that the Minister will tell us that he will not go ahead with it this year.

What is needed is greater stability. The National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations is asking that year on year swings be moderated to 15 per cent. The industry needs that certainty to be able to plan ahead. We should not enforce sudden, massive quota cuts on the industry, sometimes based on scientific advice which is not good at year-by-year predictions but which is very good at predicting long-term fluctuations in stocks. The problem with year-on-year predictions is that they do not take into account the perceptions of the industry. Many skippers complain to me about scientific advice which is not borne out in the fishing grounds, where stocks are much greater or smaller than scientists say. Hence scientific predictions need to be combined with the knowledge of the industry in a process of consultation before being enforced.

I hope, therefore, that the Minister will commit himself to moderating year by year swings and to ensuring that scientists consult the industry before quota cuts are based on advice that may be wrong. In its pathetic and shrunken condition, the industry needs Government support of the kind provided for the competing industries in Europe. It also needs stability and certainty so that it can survive to inherit the better years which must lie ahead.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): A proportion of those who still work in what survives of the fishing industry in the south-west live in my constituency and work out of Brixham. They tell me that there are more MAFF inspectors than police officers there. That is a sad indictment of what has gone so terribly wrong in our industry.

There is an overwhelming recognition by everyone in the industry of the need for conservation. People understand it because it represents their future and their children's future. At any rate, that is what they believed. There is no fisherman in the country who does not understand the need for conservation. Despite the gloom cast over the House by the Secretary of State's predictions of likely future quota cuts, the fishermen to whom I have spoken are all perfectly willing to accept those cuts—if they are limited to what they would refer to as the British fishing fleet. That is where the real problem lies, because around 28 per cent. of the tonnage of the British fishing fleet is not British at all, but Spanish. If we could get over that problem, many of our difficulties would disappear.

Two quite separate problems face the Government. The first is conservation and the need to reduce our fishing effort. Everyone accepts and understands the arguments for that all too well. We can do something about that, perhaps, in a common fisheries policy.

The second problem exposes the impotence of the Government. Following the judgment in the European Court of Justice, the Government cannot insist that British vessels are precisely that: British owned, British registered and with British flags. The real problem is that 30 per cent. of those vessels are owned by foreigners who are quota hoppers and who are living off the backs of our fishermen and destroying our industry.

The first problem is one with which my hon. Friend the Minister is well qualified to deal. I wish him well on Thursday when he goes to Europe. He has a difficult task, but, like his predecessors, he has done a good job for the industry in fighting our corner. The real problem lies with the quota hoppers.

As I voted with the Opposition on the last occasion when the matter was before the House, I listened carefully to the Labour party's proposals. It seemed to me that the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) proposed, first, that total allowable catches should be based entirely on scientific evidence. The second plank of his argument was that scientists should be given more resources so that they can understand precisely what the problems are and make accurate assessments. The third part of the argument was that we should ignore the scientists on socio-economic grounds.

Many Conservative Members wanted to understand what firm proposals the Opposition had to get us out of the dilemma, but there was nothing there. For those of us who in the past had tried to get some comfort from Opposition proposals on this difficult issue, there was none to be had.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's speech could be summarised as, "Brace yourself because there is bad news to come." He tempered this with the slightly good news that harbour improvement grants would be restored. I welcome that, but I would like my hon. Friend the Minister of State in his winding-up speech to say that he will take another look at the way in which the Spanish and the Dutch in the North sea have been exploiting our quotas. That is the key to the problem.

I accept that the lawyers say that we lost last time and that the law is against us. Fine—but I do not believe that it is beyond the wit of man to find a way around that conundrum. I judge that the compromises that have been made in the past, to the detriment of the industry, were made by the Foreign Office because it does not regard the industry as significant or important. Invariably, compromises have been reached and the industry handicapped because the Foreign Office has decided that other issues are more important. When it comes to qualified majority voting, it believes that the fishing industry is dead and buried and insignificant, so we abstain on fishing to get Spanish support on some more important topic. That is unacceptable.

I urge hon. Members who do not have fishermen in their constituencies to accept that there can be nothing more distressing than to see a fishermen having to go down to his boat, not with a net and a lifejacket but with a chainsaw, to destroy it. That is what the Spanish and Dutch are forcing our industry to do. It is distressing, wrong and short-termist. That is why my hon. Friends and I have tabled an amendment.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Can my hon. Friend say whether there is any other country in the European Union whose fishing industry has been dealt with in such a devastating and damaging way as has the UK fishing industry?

Mr. Allason: My hon. Friend puts his finger on the point. Not only have we been handicapped in that way, but it appears that it is our money that has been spent on improving the Spanish fleets. There is nothing more upsetting for our fishermen than to know that funds paid by them through their taxes have gone to our competitors. They may be our partners in the European Union, but they are competitors and they are putting us out of business with our own taxpayer's money.

I urge my hon. Friend the Minister of State to give an undertaking to take another look at the abuse of flags of convenience. In those circumstances, I would reconsider the way I voted last time the issue came before the House. I wish my hon. Friend the Minister well on Thursday, but I urge and beg him to fight for British interests because if he does not, no one else will—certainly not the Foreign Office.

6.5 pm

Mr. William Ross (East Londonderry): The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) said that this was the most important fishing debate of the year. If the Labour party thinks so much of the subject, why on earth did it not get a full day's debate out of the Government, rather than a half-day? That does not say much for its negotiating skills. I am sorry to have to start on that note, because there was much in what the hon. Gentleman said with which I agreed. If the matter is important, let us have a full day's debate next time.

If it were possible that the Government might be cajoled into following the course of action suggested in the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), I would urge my right hon. and hon. Friends to support them. That is no secret. However, that will not happen—or at least, not yet. Our fallback position will be that set out by the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris)—with, of course, particular reference to the interests of Northern Ireland.

Every year on this issue, there is nothing more or less than a further instalment of crisis management. Far too much catch capacity is chasing too few fish. Allied to that is a lack of accurate information about the quantity of fish present in the sea. We have to expect that the efficiency of the vessels will continue to increase. There will be fewer and fewer vessels chasing the same number of fish.

If I have a quibble with what the hon. Member for St. Ives said, it is on his comment about firm scientific advice. Experience has shown that scientists' assessments can be wildly astray. It may well be that a large margin of error is always involved, but if, on top of that, the sort of, cheating to which the hon. Gentleman referred is added in, it is no wonder that the assessments go astray. In fact, it would be a miracle if the scientists got it right. Unless everybody is prepared to play by the rules of the game, there is no chance whatsoever of coming up with firm estimates of the numbers of a species in an area at a given time.

For instance, last year, the advice was that cod and whiting in the Irish sea were in a parlous state. This year, the advice is optimistic, but only the status quo for catches is being allowed. I hope that my remarks will be read in conjunction with those of the hon. Members for South Down (Mr. McGrady) and for North Antrim, (Dr. Paisley), who touched on aspects of what I am trying to put across to the House.

We need to be willing to reassess the situation as fishing returns demonstrate the abundance or scarcity of a particular species in a given fishery.

As the United Kingdom Minister can argue for only three species at a time, although there are 18, his ability to debate the entire range is somewhat limited. Is the information that has been given in that respect correct? For instance, we are told that this year the Irish sea contains a huge amount of haddock. The hon. Member for South Down referred to that matter in detail. We know from the returns that the fish are there, but we are not allowed to catch them. The figure mentioned is 600 tonnes, but the scientists say, "Well, perhaps we could catch up to 2,000." So why should not Northern Ireland fishermen catch them?

[Mr. William Ross]

So long as we proceed with short-term, ad hoc, arrangements, we shall get nowhere. Short-term changes must be measured against the general framework of total allowable catches and quotas, which are out of tune with the real position in the Irish sea.

Despite what the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) said, much of the United Kingdom's problem stems from its failure to defend its interests when we entered the EEC. I listened to the right hon. Gentleman rejecting that argument, which was put rather brutally by one of his right hon. Friends. I have been told that, although the principle was agreed, embodied within the principle was the whole concept of qualified majority voting. If that is so, whatever case the United Kingdom put forward, it would never have been accepted. It had not a snowball's chance of getting anywhere.

Whenever we return to the position in the Irish sea, we find that the Irish Republic never catches the high quotas that it is allowed for cod and whiting, for instance. The reason for that is simple: it was given twice its true entitlement on historic fishing returns. That seems to me and the fishermen in Northern Ireland to be mad, and something needs to be done about it. If we do not catch the quota, the uncaught fish will act as a magnet to other nations looking for fish. That is unavoidable. We must have sufficient swaps to ensure that those quota are caught.

Will the Minister assure us that the promise made by Earl Howe in the other place on 26 October 1992, that the Government will continue to reduce any disadvantages to Northern Ireland and Wales—by, for example, utilising the system of quota exchanges with other member states, which traditionally enabled the United Kingdom to obtain additional quantities of fish in the Irish sea—will be carried into effect? Has that promise been buried? If so, it is regrettable, because it was a firm promise, and the Government should give an undertaking this evening to honour it.

I hope that, when the Minister goes off later this week to argue the case for the United Kingdom, he will persuade the Irish Minister to co-operate with Her Majesty's Government this year, so that the maximum number of available fish can be harvested from the Irish sea by those who earn their livelihoods there. As the Government of the Irish Republic failed to support Her Majesty's Government last year when we were trying to defend the Irish box, they owe us one. The problem that my hon. Friends and I face this evening is how we can best strengthen the Government's hand in their negotiations later this week.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): I always find it sad when a Minister with a fine mind deploys his cerebral skills and undoubted rhetorical talents in an intellectually unsustainable argument. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland fulfilled that unenviable task with great courtesy, and I listened with rapt attention to what he said.

It may help the House if I subject the amendment tabled in my name and that of my hon. Friends to textual analysis. It > "requires Her Majesty's Government to issue at the forthcoming Inter-Governmental Conference a statement of its intention to declare an exclusive fishing zone out to 200 miles or to the median line and of its decision in principle to withdraw from the Common Fisheries Policy to be endorsed by the British people at the next general election."

The intention behind the use of the verb "requires" is to assert the primacy of this Parliament. This Parliament must be sovereign if we are to recover the proper relationship between our country and the European Union. We must utilise any opportunities for genuine dialogue with our Community partners to our advantage.

The intergovernmental conference, which begins on 29 March, is a classic case in point. It is an opportunity not to be missed. Many people will allege that fishing is not on the agenda, but I am sure that the conference, which is likely to continue for several months, will have some "any other business", and that, in the course of the proceedings, we can make it known that the United Kingdom Government intend to declare an exclusive fishing zone up to 200 miles—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must be aware that his amendment has not been selected for debate. Therefore, while an allusion to his amendment is in order, a detailed analysis of what is written on the Order Paper is not.

Mr. Wilkinson: In that case, I shall seek to deploy arguments which are germane to the whole debate.

Our country must make it clear to our European Union partners what we intend to do, so that they may make appropriate representations to us to secure the necessary bilateral fishing agreements in traditional fishing areas within our waters.

The Icelanders and Norwegians have found that a 200-mile limit is essential to safeguard their fishing interests. At the time of the cod war, I went to Iceland with the North Atlantic Assembly military tour. I was struck by the fact that relations between peoples were not adversely affected, as both sides recognised that vital interests were at stake.

With the benefit of hindsight, no one can reasonably suggest that what the Icelanders bravely did was wrong. I believe that they were right. Others will say that the Canadian example—Canada has a 200-mile limit—proves that a 200-mile limit does not necessarily secure the conservation of stocks. That is true, but if, having asserted a 200-mile limit, we fail to conserve, the fault will be entirely ours. We shall pursue a conservation policy that is manifestly in Britain's interests, so it should have the support of fishing communities, because they will understand that they benefit.

Mr. Marlow: May I draw my hon. Friend's attention to a note that I have received, prepared by the Library for my Whip? This sentence is headed:

> "The Argument against the CFP", and the statement made in the note is:

> "The problem is, rather, that it has a poor record on conserving fish."

That is the Library's objective view.

Mr. Wilkinson: It is also the objective view of my extremely honest right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, who expressed it loud and clear in his opening remarks. That is why we say quite candidly that the common fisheries policy is a busted flush, and we should be no further part of it.

However, if we are to take such an important step, we must inform our Community partners, and we need the support of the British electorate. In the process of European construction, the last people to be consulted, and the last people who are carried along with the policy, are the voters, which is why the issue should be put to them in the Conservative party manifesto. They will then know that, if they vote Conservative, we shall pull out, we shall have a 200-mile limit, and British fishing communities will be protected.

That is not Labour party policy, which rests on reform of the CFP, a hopeless undertaking. The Liberal Democrat party's policy will do exactly the same. As my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) said, we need to look to 2002, to the renegotiation of the common fisheries policy and the enlargement of the Community. When Poland and the Baltic states join, their fishermen will, by treaty, be entitled to access to the common resource of our fisheries. This will cause further depredation of stock. It will lead to diminished quotas for our fishermen, and less chance of a sustainable livelihood for them.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland averred that it would be impossible for us to withdraw, and that we were bound by treaty to stay in. I challenge that argument. If the British electorate have clearly demonstrated that they wish our country to withdraw from the CFP, our sovereign Parliament should instruct our Government so to do.

If there were retaliation, what form would it take? It might take the form of action in the area of trade or other areas of mutual interest, but what would be our counter-retaliation? Perhaps it would be not to pay so much money to the European Union. We are the second biggest net contributor, and much of our net contribution goes to subsidising Spanish fishermen and others who are putting British fishermen out of work. We must confront the challenge head on.

Hon. and right hon. Members will have noticed British fishermen going to sea with the Canadian flag at the masthead. Something is seriously wrong if British fishermen go to sea with a foreign flag flying from the masts of their vessels. It demonstrates a degree of alienation, at the least, which I find horrifying.

Such displays have their good side. In my office, I have a Canadian flag proudly displayed, which was presented to me and some hon. Friends by our counterparts in the Canadian Parliament for the support we gave them when their Government challenged the European Union about fishing rights off the Newfoundland banks. I shall not go into the legalities of who was right and who was wrong; all I know is that the British people were wholeheartedly behind our Canadian friends. To be candid, they were affronted that we appeared initially to take the side of the Spaniards.

On matters of this kind, emotions are important. We need to take account of the heartfelt feelings of our constituents and the fishing communities, and do what we know in our hearts to be right.

We are a maritime nation. It is appropriate that we should be responsible for the conservation of our own stocks. We should have an exclusive fishing zone out to 200 miles. We should inform our Community partners that that is what we intend to do, and we should seek the endorsement of the British people for the policy. If we do that, we shall gain the political initiative, and be rewarded for it.

Mr. Nick Ainger (Pembroke): I shall be brief, because I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) wants to start his speech at 6.30.

Those of us who represent fishing constituencies know that the industry is in crisis. Unfortunately, some of the contributions by hon. Members who do not represent fishing constituencies did not present practical solutions to the immediate, short-term and medium-term problems that confront the industry.

The withdrawal from the common fisheries policy and the establishment of a 200-mile limit will not solve the problems of people living in my constituency or many other fishing constituencies in the next few years, because it cannot be achieved.

We need to do what the Government have failed to do, at least during my time in the present Parliament, since April 1992—tackle the serious problem of effort versus stocks. It began with the Sea Fish (Conservation) Act 1992, which tried to bring in the days-at-sea limitation, to limit effort that way, which was finally thrown out, not too long ago, by the European Court. The Government failed to accept what all the Opposition parties and the industry were saying at the time—that the only solution was a decommissioning programme that worked, which would reduce effort and compensate fishermen who decided to leave the industry.

The hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Allason) said that the French and Spanish had been able to invest in their industry, in their equipment and in their boats. The reason for that is that they have been meeting their multi-annual guidance programmes and have been able to qualify for grant aid, which the Government have failed to do in each of the multi-annual guidance programmes. Therefore, British fishermen and the British industry have been unable to benefit from grant aid, and to upgrade and improve their equipment.

One reason why the quota-hoppers and flagships have been able to come in and pick up British licences is that British fishermen have not had the wherewithal and the support from the Government and the financial institutions to enable them to invest in new plant and equipment. We end up in the crazy position where we artificially try to control the amount of fish that is caught, rather than tackling the effort problem. We end up with the farce that the TACs and the quotas have become. We have that huge roller-coaster—the term that the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations used—of quotas and TACs.

Last year, the TAC for western hake was reduced by about 45 per cent., and it was understood and hoped that that would solve the problem in relation to that stock. Now we find that the proposal for next year is, not the status quo, not an increase, but yet another cut, of about 29 per cent. How can any industry that depends on one product, plan and invest in such circumstances? We have substantial evidence from the fishermen on landings of cod in the Irish Sea, where, apparently, there is an abundance of cod and of haddock, yet there is no change in the TAC.

I hope that the Minister will consider the issue relating to the Irish sea, in relation to both the failure on occasions of the Irish Republic fishermen to meet their TACs, and the fact that English, Welsh and Northern Irish fishermen are constantly up against the ceiling of the TAC that has been set.

Unless we tackle the problem of the other effort, we shall repeatedly have this debate, as we do every year, just before the Minister goes off to Europe to try to argue a case that we all know will fail. Unless we tackle that problem, we shall have the same debate yet again, and the arguments will be made yet again, the following year.

One reason why we have that serious problem in relation to conservation is that we constantly speak about total allowable catches when they are not that, as the Minister knows; they are total allowable landings. There is a massive difference between what is taken out of the sea and what is landed in the ports. I have been told that discards may be at least 40 per cent. of TAC; 40 per cent. that will have no benefit to the market or to the fishermen, fish that are dead and returned to the sea. Unless that issue is tackled, I am afraid that TACs will never work.

We need to tackle the problem of the flagships. I accept that many attempts have been made by the Government to consider that, but I seek from the Minister of State an assurance that the fishermen of Wales and of south-west England will not suffer any reduction in their quota as a result of the 40 Spanish vessels coming into that part of the Irish box that they will be able to enter from 1 January 1996.

We want an assurance that no British fisherman, whether Welsh or English, will suffer reductions in the quota for any species as a result of that measure. The Minister was asked to give that assurance the last time we debated the issue, but I am afraid that the answer we received was, to say the least, non-committal. The matter is vital for the south-west and the Welsh fishing ports.

I hope—I fear that it is a hollow hope—that the next time we have a debate, we shall be able to say that fishing effort has been reduced sensibly in co-operation with the industry. I hope that we shall at last be able to say that we are starting to match our conservation measures with effort and stocks. I hope that there will be a partnership between Government, Europe, industry and the scientists. It may be a forlorn hope, but unless we start tackling the problem soon, our industry is doomed.

6.30 pm

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): This has been an important debate and there have been many useful contributions. I agree with the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Ross) that it is an annual debate for which we should have more time. He will appreciate that the business timetable is in the Government's hands. But when we are in government he can be assured that we will listen sympathetically to his representations.

The Secretary of State for Scotland mentioned the 1992 manifesto: in 1992 the Labour party made suggestions for amending the common fisheries policy, working with the fishing community on conservation measures and campaigning throughout the fishing constituencies. The moves were covered in the fishing press. The Government are only now—three years later—considering many of those ideas in the review committee. We do not need lessons from the Government about what we have been doing.

In some ways today's debate is a re-run of previous debates. In the past, when the Government felt that they were under pressure, they suddenly came up with more money for the decommissioning scheme, which was welcome at the time. Now, when they are under pressure, we suddenly find that the harbour grant scheme has been reinstated—it is a more modest contribution than the decommissioning scheme, but it is welcome for all that. We shall not be churlish about it.

Much attention has been focused on the debate for many reasons. There is no doubt that the debate provides an opportunity to discuss European Union policy as it affects our country. It is completely legitimate to question the mechanics of the European Union, particularly how it applies in terms of the common fisheries policy—many hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), have done so. But we must not forget the importance of the debate to the British fishing industry, and I shall touch on some of the serious concerns.

I shall first discuss the quotas set for individual species which the Minister will have to discuss at the Fisheries Council. Concern has been voiced in tonight's debate about the way in which the quotas seem to fluctuate wildly from year to year. That not only makes it difficult for the fishing industry in terms of applying effort and using opportunities, it does not help the credibility of science. I accept that there are difficulties in calculating fish stocks at sea. It seems strange that some stocks have increased dramatically over recent years, while others have been dramatically cut. It does not help when the Government make cuts in sectors of vital fisheries research, such as they have done recently on research into the impact of the industrial fishing of sand eels in Shetland. The Government also made research and development cuts across the board in the Budget, including cuts in fisheries research.

The Minister will be discussing species quotas. We certainly welcome the fact that there will be an 8 per cent. increase in the cod quota, but it is thought within the industry that the increase could be greater given the evidence of large numbers of cod presently in the North sea. It is strange that there is to be no increase for channel cod although it is accepted that the stocks of channel cod and North sea cod are linked to some extent.

A big issue for our fleets involves North sea sole and plaice. There is great concern about the 29 per cent. cut in that quota, which will hit our eastern, Northern Ireland, south-western and Irish sea fleets. The problem of swaps with Holland has been mentioned. If no swaps are to take place, I hope that the Minister will look at the total allowable catch for the western waters for those fish that we would normally obtain from a swap with the Dutch. My hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke (Mr. Ainger) made a clear case for western hake for his local fishing fleet. It would be helpful if the Minister would say whether such a swap would take place at the current projected total of 78,000 tonnes for North sea plaice or whether the total would have to be increased for the swap to go ahead.

There is a severe cut of 22 per cent. in the whiting quota. It seems strange that in recent years it has been argued that the quota should be increased because whiting are predatory fish and affect the white fish stocks. But the present cut is so large that it could invoke the Hague preference. I hope that in his negotiations the Minister will ensure that the quota limits are set at a level that does not do so because of the problems involved in the Hague preference. That preference provides benefits for this country north of Bridlington, but also applies to the Republic of Ireland and therefore has implications for our Northern Ireland fleet and the fleet that fishes in area VII. The Irish Republic is trying to invoke the Hague preference on Irish sea cod and haddock, which has implications for our area VII fleet.

Throughout the debate we have discussed the common fisheries policy; we cannot talk about quotas and fisheries management without discussing how the common fisheries policy operates. The subject cannot be avoided as it is the framework for the fisheries management scheme. Our amendment recognises that there are severe problems with the CFP and that we need a radical approach to reform.

Much attention has focused on whether there will be a rebellion tonight and the reason for it in terms of the political agenda, particularly for those with Eurosceptic views. There is no doubt that the policy of voting against the Government on various European issues has been successful for the Eurosceptics. The debate has provoked the Foreign Secretary into taking to the airways to appeal to the dissidents. The Prime Minister has written articles in The Daily Telegraph that have been slanted towards the dissidents. Tonight, a former Prime Minister and the current Secretary of State for Scotland have spoken in the debate. There is no doubt that the Eurosceptics' tactics have been successful and are moving the Government towards their agenda, whether for good or ill.

The debate, however, is about the dire state of our fishing industry. To be fair, those who have spoken have had a genuine interest in the subject—they include hon. Members from Northern Ireland, from the nationalist and Liberal Democrat parties, and hon. Members from both sides of the House who represent fishing constituencies. Even those with Eurosceptic views have taken an interest in the problems of our fishing fleet. The hon. Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) feels passionately about the subject and knows the effect of the policy on his local fishermen.

Problems with the common fisheries policy include those involving the Western waters and Spanish accession; the fact that Spanish and Portuguese vessels are to be allowed in from 1 January, six years ahead of schedule. There are also problems involving control measures on our south-western and Northern Ireland fleet; problems of bureaucracy; the flagships issue; the need to qualify properly the principle of a common fisheries resource—a key issue; problems of meeting the multi-annual guidance programme and effort control; problems of having an ageing fleet compared with those of other countries; enforcement problems, particularly with other countries; problems of implementing a conservation scheme that is tailored to our waters; and the problem of discards. There is a need for associated socio-economic measures and a need to consider the operation of the decommissioning scheme. Increasing pressure is being placed on many of the white fish in the North sea which fall within the two to three-year-old age group, which means that the potential of the larger species is never realised.

The Labour party calls for reform of the CAP and recognises that we must seek co-operation to achieve that; no one country can achieve it alone. We firmly believe that, even within the framework of the CAP, we can achieve greater national autonomy. We also believe that there is scope for greater involvement of fishermen in the management of stocks through their associations and producer organisations. There are structural conservation packages, many of which were put forward by organisations such as the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations and the Scottish Fishermen's Federation to deal with the practical problems of conservation. We need to gather allies and support for those packages and we must talk to the Commission. The Labour party has already begun that process.

Conservative Members must ask why other fishing countries such as Norway and Spain are so successful at negotiating good deals for their fishery sectors. The answer must be the pressure that is applied to their Governments in their respective Parliaments. A vote tonight for Labour's amendment would send a clear signal to the European Commission that neither the British Parliament nor the British fishing industry are satisfied with the present common fisheries policy or the current state of the industry. That is a perfectly respectable position for any Member of Parliament to take on the issue.

In that respect, a vote for our amendment is vital as a demonstration of the House's support for our fishing communities. Members of Parliament who represent fishing communities know that their fishermen want and expect them to support the amendment. For far too long, the British fishing industry has been isolated in terms of the support that it believes it should receive from Government. Tonight we have an opportunity to rectify the matter.

Mr. Gallie: Earlier this afternoon I asked the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) whether he had considered inserting some reference to total allowable catches in his amendment. I cannot understand why that has not been included in the amendment. In attempting to persuade Conservative Members, perhaps the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe could refer to that very important issue.

Mr. Morley: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman was present for the beginning of my speech, but I discussed in detail the quotas issue and the problems that the industry faces in that regard. I outlined how those problems could be dealt with. The quotas issue is open for negotiation. The Minister has some scope in that area and we hope that he will move the negotiations in the directions that I have outlined in some detail.

Members of Parliament who want to see reform of the common fisheries policy and European institutions—they are our objectives, although we may disagree about the detail—represent a strand of opinion in this country that expects them to support the amendment. The vote tonight should not be seen simply as a vote for a Labour amendment, an Opposition amendment or even a particular Government position. It should be seen as a statement of intent to the European Commission that change is needed. We must adopt a clear policy position that will reinforce the Government's position in the negotiations in Europe. Above all, it is a vote for an amendment which promotes the British fishing industry. In that respect, it is worthy of the support of all hon. Members.

[Mr. Morley]

6.42 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Tony Baldry): As the United Kingdom Fisheries Minister, I have only one ambition: to represent the best interests of the United Kingdom fishing industry. My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson), my noble Friend Baroness Denton of Wakefield and I shall attend the Fisheries Council meeting this week. I doubt whether any other member state will have in attendance so many Ministers who are committed to defending and promoting the interests of their industry.

Hon. Members must recognise that it is not foreigners that we should fear, but the straightforward fact that at present too many fishing vessels are chasing too few fish. There is no escaping the fact that the failure to conserve fish stocks poses the greatest threat to the fishing industry. We must have regard to the scientific evidence which suggests that a considerable number of our most important fish stocks could collapse within a matter of years without tough conservation measures. Some 60 per cent. of fish stocks are already below minimum biological levels.

I must ensure not only that our fishing industry has the maximum catch next year but that there are sustainable levels of fish in the seas for our fishermen to catch the year after next and in every year as we move into the next century. Co-operation with our European partners is essential in view of the overcapacity of fishing fleets and the fact that fish do not respect national boundaries. We fish in the waters of other countries and they fish in ours, so it is essential that there is collaboration and co-operation throughout Europe.

A number of hon. Members raised questions about specific fish stocks. I suspect that they have raised those questions at the behest of fishing organisations such as the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisation and the Scottish Fishermen's Federation. My ministerial colleagues and regularly I meet those two organisations. We have lengthy detailed discussions with them.

I make it clear to the House that their priorities are my priorities; their concerns and goals in the Fisheries Council are mine also. The detail that they give me about individual fish stocks is the detail that I hope to take forward and argue for in Brussels this week. In some instances, that will mean moderating the reduction in quotas that the Commission has suggested, and in other instances the quotas may be increased. I shall go to Brussels—I hope in co-operation and collaboration with the industry—to seek to address what the industry sees as its most important priorities.

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): Will my hon. Friend confirm the remarks that he made by way of intervention to my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) in relation to marketing grants? He said that grants will be available to those at Fleetwood who have already applied for them and that they will be available to people in other ports who may apply for them in the future.

Mr. Baldry: As I told the House earlier, since my appointment as Fisheries Minister in July I have travelled around the country from Newlyn to Newcastle and from Hastings to Hull meeting industry representatives and with hon. Members who take a close interest in the fishing industries in their constituencies. I have been very impressed by the arguments advanced by my hon. Friends the Members for Wyre (Mr. Mans), for St. Ives (Mr. Harris), for Falmouth and Camborne (Mr. Coe), for South Hams (Mr. Steen), for Cornwall, South-East (Mr. Hicks) and others. They have argued strongly that at a time when quotas are being reduced—with good reason—we must continue to support the industry through harbour grants and marketing and processing grants. I understand their concerns and we have looked carefully for new funds for a number of grants schemes. I am pleased to announce that the national harbour grants scheme and the European Union structural measures for port facilities and marketing and processing will apply.

Mr. Salmond rose—

Mr. Baldry: I can anticipate the hon. Gentleman's intervention: they will apply throughout the United Kingdom.

Mr. Salmond: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Baldry: I do not need to give way as I have confirmed that the grants will apply throughout the United Kingdom.

Returning to the quotas issue, I shall be arguing in the Council for quotas to be set at realistic levels that will do the least possible damage to the industry's prospects next year. I understand the argument that a number of hon. Members have made: of course we cannot expect the industry to cope with wildly varying quotas year upon year. After all, people have invested in their vessels and in their future; they cannot be expected to deal with wildly fluctuating quotas.

We should not try to remedy the damage caused by overfishing by cutting particular fish stocks severely in any one year. If stocks must be protected by reducing the fishing effort, I hope that that can be achieved over a period of years rather than by introducing severe yearly cuts. Badly depleted stocks must be rebuilt if we are to maintain a viable industry in the long term.

Mr. Gallie: A year or two ago there was a quota of 16,000 tonnes for prawns on the west coast of Scotland. The quota has been reduced in recent years, but the quality and the volume of the prawn catch has increased. Some have suggested that there are many prawns to be taken, although scientific evidence seems to refute that claim. Will my hon. Friend re-examine that issue, as my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson) has already done this year?

Mr. Baldry: My hon. Friend makes a good point. He will know that, because of the wishes of the Scottish fishing industry, we revisited that issue this year and achieved an increase in the quota for prawns. I hope that that increase will be reflected in the negotiations later this week.

Mr. Harris: I am grateful for the way in which my hon. Friend responded to the points that I and other Members have raised and assured the House that he would press for the priorities put forward by the industry. Can he give the House any information on another matter of concern to the industry on which representations have been made? Is there any progress on the long-standing claims for compensation from Spain to fishermen from the south-west for the damage caused to their nets in the tuna war?

Mr. Baldry: In an earlier debate in the House, I promised to try to resolve the issue by Christmas. I am glad to inform the House that the Spanish Minister responsible for fishing has confirmed that United Kingdom fishermen will be offered compensation of £100,000 to be paid by the end of this year or early next year, so I hope that the House will feel that I have fulfilled my promise.

Mr. Salmond: May we return to tonight's inducement? If the Minister believed that the financial instrument for fisheries grant and the harbour grant scheme were so important, why did he agree three weeks ago to their cancellation?

Mr. Baldry: I never cease to be amazed at how ungrateful some Members can be. Here I am, the week before Christmas, restoring marketing, processing and harbour grants, and such an ingrate individual quibbles about it. The only person who is more ingrate than the hon. Gentleman is the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), who comes to the House complaining that not enough is done for fishing ports [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman never listens. I know of no more ungrateful Member than him. He complains to the House that not enough is spent on fishing ports when Grimsby is awash with money that the Government have invested in the port. Nearly £969,000 in Government fisheries grants will have been made available to Grimsby in two and a half years. That is the largest such allocation to any port in the United Kingdom. Clearly, the hon. Gentleman cannot recognise that.

Later this week I shall seek to ensure the best possible quotas and the best possible deal for the United Kingdom fishing industry, but consistent with the scientific advice which demonstrates that some of our fish stocks, such as North sea herring and mackerel, are in serious danger of collapse, which would be disastrous for the fishing industry, the processing industry and the consumer.

Mr. Allason: When my hon. Friend goes to the Fisheries Council on Thursday, will he raise the issue of quota hoppers and the abuse of the flags that is so obvious in the British registry?

Mr. Baldry: I certainly will not forget that. My hon. Friend quite rightly reminds the House of the problem of quota hoppers. We all share that concern. The Factortame judgment has nothing to do with the common fisheries policy—it is based on that principle of European law which allows the free association of individuals in different member states—but it is a matter of real and legitimate concern.

My hon. Friend the Member for Torbay, who takes a close interest in promoting the interests of the fishing industry in the south-west, rightly continues to draw the issue to the attention of Ministers. He asked me to consult lawyers as to whether anything could be done about that judgment. I shall gladly draw together the lawyers in the fishing industry.

As I went round the ports of the United Kingdom, I issued a simple challenge. If any fishing industry representative has any sensible suggestions on how we can get around the Factortame judgment, I shall gladly take them on board and willingly support my hon. Friend's suggestion that we take yet a further look at the issue.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): I thank my hon. Friend most warmly for his visits to my constituency and the port of Brixham, where he has always been very welcome. Is it the Government's policy to try to reform the common fisheries policy?

Mr. Baldry: Yes. All hon. Members recognise that the common fisheries policy has a number of defects. However, we shall not support the totally meaningless garbage put forward in the Labour amendment. When the Opposition Front Bench spokesman was asked to explain what it meant, he was clearly incapable of giving any such explanation. No one in the House is satisfied with the existing common fisheries policy; it clearly needs to be reformed.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): Does the Minister recognise that many good Conservatives here tonight do not wish to give any comfort to the Labour party, but are deeply worried about the state of the fishing industry? Can the Minister say anything more about the robust stance that he will take at the Fisheries Council and British action that might be taken after the Council so that we stand up for British fishermen, not Spanish ones?

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend can rest assured that my primary duty to the House is to represent and stand up for the interests of the British fishing industry. If at any time any Member can point to an occasion when I failed to stand up for the British fishing industry, I shall gladly vacate this place.

Mr. Tyler: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Baldry: I should make some progress. I am determined that there should be an on-going dialogue between the fishing industry and scientists on the specific issue of quotas and I recognise there are real concerns that the industry is not being heard.

It is important that the fishing industry becomes more involved in what we are doing. Many in the fishing industry see the year-on-year debate on quotas as a somewhat blunt instrument for ensuring control of the fishing effort and believe that more can be done by way of technical conservation measures. For that reason, I am setting up a fisheries conservation group that will bring together Government scientists and other academics with representatives of the industry to examine issues on which there are concerns, such as industrial fishing and the level of discards and to find out what more can be achieved by improving fishing gear.

Not only do I intend that we should do that here in the United Kingdom, but one of my other objectives at the Fisheries Council meeting later this week is to ensure a clear commitment to technical conservation measures in respect of fishing gear. Progress also has to be made towards addressing widespread concerns about industrial fishing, discards and by-catching.

I assure hon. Members representing Northern Ireland constituencies that I shall be pressing the Fisheries Council for increases in the quotas proposed for the Irish sea. I fully appreciate the concerns of the Northern Irish industry about the Hague preference and of course we shall continue to seek to reduce the disadvantages to Northern Ireland resulting from the Hague preference, for example by carrying out international quota swaps.

The hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Ross) asked whether the quota is still Government policy. It is and will continue to be Government policy. Members have been concerned that there should be equal and strict enforcement of EC fishery measures throughout the Community and we determined to ensure that.

Two concerns have run through this evening's debate. One is the common fisheries policy, where the Government need reforms. It would be disingenuous, however, to suggest that we could leave the common fisheries policy. We should concentrate instead on reforming it in ways that would benefit the industry.

I find the Opposition amendment disingenuous in the extreme. Opposition Members play on the worst aspects of xenophobia. They criticise the Spanish, but forget that not a single Labour voice was raised against the accession of Spain or Portugal to the European Union. They criticised the Government for the deal that was achieved and clearly failed to read the Spanish treaty of accession, which stated that 300 vessels may be authorised to fish in western waters from the date of accession until 31 December this year. The result of the agreement that we achieved in December 1994 is that the number of Spanish vessels with access to the Irish box from 1 January will be not 300 but 40. That is a considerable deal on behalf of the United Kingdom fishing industry.

We do not need the Labour party to give us lessons on representing British interests. Anyone who is concerned about British interests should have regard to what the Labour party and other socialist parties signed up to this week in Madrid—a significant extension of qualified majority voting and restrictions on how long people can work. If those policies were implemented, we would be unable to represent best fishing interests.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Douglas Hogg): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. My right hon. and hon. Friends and I have listened carefully to the opinions that have been expressed, often with great vigour, in the debate. The Government will give due weight to what has been said. My hon. Friend the Minister of State will represent the United Kingdom at the Fisheries Council beginning on 21 December. He will, as always, vigorously represent the interests of the United Kingdom and its fishermen. In particular, he will fight for effective conservation of fish stocks, a fair allocation of fishing opportunities, and rigorous enforcement of the controls that are in place.

Dr. Strang: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. That is just not good enough. The House of Commons has taken an historic decision. It has passed a motion rejecting—[Interruption.] It has failed. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. I will not allow further debate on this matter. If the hon. Gentleman has a point of order, I must of course hear it.

Dr. Strang: The Government have been defeated. That is the important point. It is all very well for the right hon. and learned Gentleman to say that Ministers will pay due attention. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House listened to the Minister and what he said was not precisely a point of order. Hon. Members will be tolerant and will listen to the hon. Gentleman for a moment.

Dr. Strang: The House has rejected the Government's position on fisheries policy. The right hon. and learned Gentleman did not take part in the debate and he cannot just jump up to the Dispatch Box and tell us that the Government will pay due attention. They have to address the issues in the debate, and they relate to the additional access of Spanish fishing vessels to our western waters. There has been a repudiation of the Government's policy and the Government are answerable to the House. They have lost the confidence of the House in relation to representing our interests in the European Union in fisheries and also in relation to their whole approach to fisheries policy. It is not good enough for the right hon. and learned Gentleman to talk about what will happen in the Fisheries Council.

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman and the Minister are experienced parliamentarians. Proper points of order are not being put to me and I cannot allow the debate to continue in this way. I propose to move to the next item of business.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Is it a genuine point of order?

Mr. Beith: It is. I hope that you will confirm that a Government motion setting out the Government's negotiating position has been defeated and that when a Minister goes to Brussels to take part in negotiations he cannot represent the position that is set out in that motion as being the position that was approved by the House. He will have to convey to the meeting the fact that the House rejects the Government's position and wants a stronger stand, and he will have to make clear to the meeting that he has lost the confidence of the House, as have his Government.

Mr. Salmond: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Should not we ask for a Government statement tomorrow? The Government have failed to carry their position on a vital industry. The Minister told us that that does not matter and that the Government will carry on as before. Does that not represent contempt for the House in the same way as contempt for the fishing communities has been the Government's undoing?

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. The House also rejected the Labour-Liberal amendment.

Madam Speaker: Order. The debate has taken place and the House has made its views known in a Division. It is now up to the Government to determine their position. I now propose to move to other business. [Interruption.] Will hon. Members who are leaving the Chamber please do so quietly.

ROYAL ASSENT

Madam Speaker: I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified Her Royal Assent to the following Acts:

Consolidated Fund (No.2) Act 1995

Church of Scotland (Property and Endowment) Amendment Order Confirmation Act 1995

Scottish Business

7.35 pm

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): I beg to move,

That—

(1) Standing Order No. 94A (Scottish Grand Committee (composition and business)) be amended, as follows:

line 17, after 'consideration', insert 'or further consideration';

line 30, leave out from 'committee,' to 'Standing' in line 32 and insert 'made under paragraph (6) of';

line 33, at the end, add—

'(3) Any Minister of the Crown, being a Member of the House, though not a member of the committee, may take part in the deliberations of the committee and may make a motion, but shall not vote or be counted in the quorum.';

(2) Standing Order No. 94C (Scottish Grand Committee (short debates)) be amended, as follows:

line 8, leave out from 'to' to the end of line 9 and insert 'Scotland';

line 19, leave out from 'No' to 'replying' in line 20 and insert 'Member except the Minister of the Crown';

line 24, leave out 'minister or law officer' and insert 'Minister of the Crown';

line 25, leave out 'members of the committee' and insert 'Members';

line 27, leave out 'member of the committee' and insert 'Member';

(3) Standing Order No. 94D (Scottish Grand Committee (ministerial statements)) be amended, as follows:

line 2, leave out 'Scottish Office minister or a Scottish law officer' and insert 'Minister of the Crown';

line 3, leave out 'member of the committee' and insert 'Member of the House';

line 10, leave out 'minister or law officer, as the case may be,' and insert 'Minister of the Crown';

line 12, after 'responsibilities', insert 'so far as they relate to Scotland, which, in the case of a Scottish law officer, shall be';

line 13, leave out 'thirteenth' and insert 'relevant';

line 17, after 'conclusion', insert 'either at an hour appointed by an order of the committee, for which a motion may be made without notice by a member of the government immediately before the commencement of such proceedings, on which motion the question shall be put forthwith, or, if no such motion is made,';

line 31, leave out 'minister or law officer' and insert 'Minister of the Crown';

line 32, leave out 'member of the committee' and insert 'Member of the House';

line 34, leave out 'such a minister or law officer';

(4) Standing Order No. 94E (Scottish Grand Committee (bills in relation to their principle)) be amended in line 52, at the end, by adding the following paragraphs:

'(7) At the conclusion of proceedings on consideration on report of a bill in respect of which a report has been made under paragraph (3) above, or on the order being read for the third reading of such a bill, a motion may be made by a member of the government (or in the case of a private Member's bill, by the Member in charge of the bill), "That the Bill be referred again to the Scottish Grand Committee"; and the question thereon shall be put forthwith and may be decided at any hour, though opposed:

Provided that such a motion may be made by a private Member only with the leave of the House.

(8) A bill so referred again to the Scottish Grand Committee shall be considered on a motion, "That the Committee has further considered the bill in relation to its principle"; and, when the committee has considered that question for a total of one and a half hours (whether on one or more than one day), the chairman shall put the question necessary to dispose of the motion, and shall then report accordingly to the House (or shall report that the committee has come to no resolution), without any further question being put thereon:

Provided that a member of the government may, immediately before the motion "That the Committee has further considered the bill in relation to its principle" is made, make without notice a motion to extend the time-limit specified in this paragraph; and the question on such motion shall be put forthwith.

(9) A bill in respect of which a report has been made under paragraph (8) above shall be ordered to be read the third time on a future day.

(10) When a motion shall have been made for the third reading of a bill to which paragraph (9) above applies, the question thereon shall be put forthwith and may be decided at any hour, though opposed.';

(5) Standing Order No. 94H (Scottish Grand Committee (sittings)) be amended, as follows:

line 43, after 'proceedings', insert '(other than on a motion made under paragraph (6) below)';

line 55, after 'proceedings', insert 'or on the completion of the business appointed for consideration at that sitting, whichever is the earlier,';

(6) Standing Order No. 87 (Attendance of law officers and ministers in standing committees) be amended, in line 7, after 'than', by inserting 'a motion in the Scottish Grand Committee under Standing Order No. 94A (Scottish Grand Committee (composition and business)) or'; and line 18, leave out 'morning sittings' and insert 'sittings at which oral evidence may be given';

line 19, after 'Scotland', insert 'in which case those sittings need not be held in the morning'.

The motion gives effect to two of the proposals that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland announced in the House on the eve of St. Andrew's day for strengthening the role of the Scottish Grand Committee in considering Scottish legislation and in calling Ministers to account. There is little that I need to add to the full explanation that my right hon. Friend gave on that occasion. I shall deal first with the two principal amendments to the Standing Orders.

The new paragraph that is to be added to Standing Order No. 94A will allow any Minister, and not just Ministers representing Scottish constituencies, to attend meetings of the Scottish Grand Committee in Scotland as well as at Westminster, to take part in the Committee's proceedings and move motions but not to vote or to be counted in the quorum. Consequential amendments will enable the Committee to hear ministerial statements and transact other business relating to the Scottish aspects of the work of other Departments as well as the Scottish Office.

As my right hon. Friend said, both the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer intend to take part in the Committee's debates in Scotland next year, and I am sure that other Ministers who have responsibility for significant areas of policy will be keen to follow suit.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I have no objection to Ministers attending meetings of the Scottish Grand Committee, which is taking on some of the appurtenances of a travelling circus. When visiting other cities and towns, Back Benchers should have access to the normal office facilities that are readily available in this place and in Edinburgh. The record so far is not good and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman and Ministers in the Scottish Office will take that on board. In terms of access to telephones and other facilities, that complaint needs to be examined by the Leader of the House and his colleagues.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. I remind hon. Members that this is a one-and-a-half-hour debate and that long interventions do not help.

Mr. Newton: Despite your wise advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to say that the hon. Gentleman knows me well enough to know that that is the sort of issue that I always undertake to consider, and I know that my right hon. Friends will also consider it. We have imposed quite a demanding task on the House authorities who have to arrange these meetings and the facilities that are required. To that extent, I am sure that they are feeling their way, but no one would want to dismiss out of hand the hon. Gentleman's point, especially about telephone access. It is obviously difficult to see how full-scale office facilities can be organised on quite the basis that he suggested.

The new paragraph to be added to Standing Order No. 94E will allow the Scottish Grand Committee to debate the principle of a Scottish Bill at Third Reading as well as at Second Reading. The procedure to be followed is broadly similar to that for Second Reading, with which the Committee is familiar. What is envisaged is that, after its Report stage, a Bill will be referred again to the Committee for a debate of up to one and a half hours, which, again, may take place in Scotland. A longer debate can be arranged if that is thought desirable. The Question on Third Reading would then be decided by the House without further debate, as a "forthwith".

The Government are taking the opportunity afforded by this debate to propose three other minor and sensible amendments to the Standing Orders. Standing Order No. 94D allows a maximum of 45 minutes for a ministerial statement that is made to facilitate the questioning of a Minister about some aspect of his responsibilities. We are proposing to provide additional flexibility by giving the Committee power to fix a different time limit if the circumstances of a Committee sitting make that appropriate. That could, for example, allow the Lord Advocate, or my noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland who is responsible for agriculture, forestry and the environment, to make a short statement and be questioned for, say, 15 minutes immediately after the normal Question Time. That would usefully extend the "flexibility", to use that word again, of the ways in which the Committee can operate.

We propose to amend Standing Order No. 94H to make it clear that the half-hour Adjournment debate, which normally starts at 1 o'clock, can begin earlier than that if the other business to be taken at that sitting has already been completed. [Interruption.] I am not pretending that these proposals are earth shattering—they are tidying-up proposals. In that case, the Adjournment debate will not be interrupted at 1 o'clock and will be concluded 30 minutes after it has begun. That reflects the clear intention of the Standing Order and is, I think in everyone's view, obviously sensible.

Finally, we propose to amend Standing Order No. 91 on Special Standing Committees, which provides for three morning sittings for taking oral evidence, so that a Scottish Special Standing Committee that is taking evidence in Scotland is not restricted to holding morning sittings only. That allows the Special Standing Committee to make more efficient use of its time by, for example, meeting in the morning and the afternoon of the same day. The Special Standing Committee that considered last Session's Children (Scotland) Bill was given that flexibility on an ad hoc basis and found it useful. We are now trying to incorporate that in the Standing Order.

The remaining amendments are consequential. The whole package is overwhelmingly sensible. I know that it has been widely welcomed in Scotland and I commend it to the House.

7.42 pm

Mrs. Ann Taylor (Dewsbury): As my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) has just said, the procedural motions that the Leader of the House has moved are as welcome as the Government's fisheries policies, which have just been defeated. The Leader of the House drew the short straw this evening because, far from having the support that he suggested, the procedural changes please, I think, no one. Certainly, they do not satisfy the official Opposition or find favour with the minority parties.

I am not sure about the Government's Back Benchers, but the people of Scotland are not impressed by the changes. In many ways, that is not surprising, given the way in which those changes have come about. The way in which they saw the light of day and were launched is completely contrary to the way in which the Leader of the House believes that we should proceed when we consider constitutional changes. Clearly, he adopts a different style from that of the Secretary of State for Scotland, because the Leader of the House likes to consult, to discuss issues and to find a common basis for a way forward. That has simply not been the case in relation to these changes.

The reason for that is clear: the procedural changes are a product of panic on the part of Ministers. The reason for that is also clear. For 16 years, Conservative Ministers have derided Opposition Members for saying that constitutional change was needed in relation to Scotland. Ministers have been telling us that all was well and that the present arrangements were satisfactory. At the last election, we all, I think, remember the Prime Minister and others issuing alarmist warnings about the consequences of devolution and telling us how good the constitutional position was then—and now—yet we are now going to have some change.

As everyone knows, in November, the Prime Minister gave what was considered to be an important, exclusive interview to The Independent. That was another of those occasions where we had to wonder who had been in government for the past 16 years. These days, it is increasingly a feature of Ministers that, when a problem arises, they say that something should be done: recently, we have been told that something should be done about crime, knives and education standards. They say that something should be done about a problem as if they were in opposition, and have suddenly discovered the problem and a rod with which to beat the Government. They talk like that rather than like Ministers who have been in government for 16 years, because they want the public to forget that they have run out of excuses. That is the style at present and that was the Prime Minister's style when he gave that interview reported in The Independent.

Suddenly, the Prime Minister seemed to have discovered a problem in relation to the Scots. In the article, he said:

> "People in Scotland, who often feel cut off from parliamentary debate in London want better access to government."

That does not quite sound like what he was saying at the last election. He went on:

> "the Scots feel that Westminster is a long way off".

His comments in that interview were made not because he had discovered a new problem but because, at last, he was acknowledging a problem that everyone, apart from Ministers, knew existed and that he had denied existed, even during the last election.

That about-turn by the Prime Minister in acknowledging that the problem exists might be welcomed if he had shown any understanding of what the democratic deficit amounts to. Unfortunately, if one continues reading the article in The Independent, one begins to wonder if he understands anything at all about that problem. He claims in the interview:

> "We"—

the Government—

> "have made quite significant moves on Scotland . . . I have changed the basis on which the honours list is determined".

If that is a signal of what fundamental, significant change means to the Prime Minister, it illustrates simply how far his education is lacking with regard to the problems that Scottish people face.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Forsyth): Does the hon. Lady agree with the proposition that a majority in the Scottish Grand Committee should determine legislation in it, and would she extend that proposition to the English Grand Committee, for which, as will be familiar to her, there are provisions in Standing Orders?

Mrs. Taylor: There is no future in the Government's proposal because it does not deal with basic needs. The solution to what the Secretary of State wants and to the problem that exists is to have a properly devolved Scottish Parliament. We make no bones, and have been utterly consistent, about that. We said it at the last election and we will say it at the next one.

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): Is the hon. Lady saying that if there were an incoming Labour Government, they would immediately reverse the proposals now before the House?

Mrs. Taylor: If there were an incoming Labour Government, which there will be, we shall have a Scottish Parliament—and I am glad to have the chance to repeat that statement from the Dispatch Box. Instead, we have before us some half-baked suggestions by Ministers who have been trying to cobble together at the last minute a smokescreen to suggest that they are actually doing something. But the Government are not fooling anyone.

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): The hon. Lady referred to comments supposedly made by the Prime Minister before the general election, but, at that time, was she herself not saying that there would be a Labour Government after that election?

Mrs. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman speaks as a member of a party that stands at something like 13 per cent. in the opinion polls in Scotland, and that did about as well as that in the most recent local elections there. I do not think that we should take too many lectures about what is likely to happen from people with that amount of support in Scotland. Moreover, I quoted not what the Prime Minister allegedly said but from his interview in The Independent. If the hon. Gentleman has not seen the article, I shall be happy to send him a copy later.

Against that background—the panic action and the sudden acceptance of a problem, the about-turn by the Prime Minister—a statement was made to the House on 29 November. It was strong on hype but weak on substance. We were told beforehand that the statement would be very significant, and would be what the Scottish people wanted, but when it came to the point it all fell flat. The fact that this evening the Leader of the House has been able to summarise in so few words the changes being introduced shows that there is not much substance in them.

As the Leader of the House explained, any House of Commons Minister will be allowed to go to the Scottish Grand Committee—the "awayday feature", as my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) called it. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will be able to clarify two matters arising from that fact.

First, I understand that the Government Scottish Whip has not invariably been a Scottish Member. In that case, would such a Whip be allowed on the Floor of the Committee? Secondly, and more important, the right hon. Gentleman says that Ministers "may" attend the Scottish Grand Committee, but who will decide whether they do attend? Will the Committee have the power to summon a Minister and insist that he appear before it, or can the Minister decide to delegate the appearance to a junior? For example, if a deregulation issue is on the agenda, will the Deputy Prime Minister attend, or will he say that someone else will attend in his stead?

There are more outstanding questions. The Leader of the House has mentioned only non-controversial Bills; he has not covered controversial legislation. The Government are not creating something dramatically different but simply extending the talking-shop facility of the Scottish Grand Committee. They are not by any means opening the way for Scottish people to have more control over the decisions now made by Scottish Office Ministers.

I am sure that the Leader of the House is not really comfortable with the proposals that he has had to make, any more than he is happy with the way in which those decisions were reached. I should have thought that he might be worried about the precedent of introducing procedural change into the House without consultation. It certainly goes against the grain of all that he has told us on other issues.

If the Government were serious about tackling the problems with which the procedural motions are supposed to deal, Ministers should have been considering the remarkable achievement of the Scottish Constitutional Convention, which achieved a consensus on a way forward, and which involved different political parties, elected members from Westminster and from local authorities, and people from outside politics. Surely that is the way forward, and Ministers should have thought about it before trying to bounce ideas on to the House.

The approach of the Scottish Constitutional Convention provides a good example of the necessary pre-legislative consultation that I think we should all be considering if we want to improve the quality of legislation in general. If the Government were serious about recognising the constitutional problems that Scotland and the rest of Britain face, Ministers would have followed the line laid out by the constitutional convention, and would not have bounced their half-baked ideas on to this Parliament or the Scottish people.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I suppose that we expected a pretty churlish response from the Opposition spokesmen to this important evolution of the procedures of the House, involving the Scottish Grand Committee. The hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) could not even bring herself to welcome something that is already getting a mounting press in Scotland. Representatives of the press and the other media are now coming to the meetings, and are beginning to understand that what the Secretary of State has proposed is really a major step forward in bringing Government to the people of Scotland.

The media are also beginning to understand that the panic is in the ranks of the Opposition—the panic that we have got it right. The Lady mentioned the Scottish Constitutional Convention, but that is made up of only two parties, and it seemed to spend most of the weeks in which it met squabbling. It has never answered the questions that really matter. That is why the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) is becoming more tetchy and rattled week by week, as his plans for an Assembly are being rumbled.

The hon. Gentleman will not receive any confidence from the Scottish people until he is prepared to stand at the Dispatch Box, or anywhere else, and answer the West Lothian question: how many Members of Parliament would the Labour party have in Scotland, and how would they arrange voting on measures for which not the Scottish Assembly but the Westminster Parliament is responsible? In recent weeks the hon. Gentleman has made no effort to answer the question that has been asked not only by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State but by many other members of the Conservative party in Scotland. He must wake up—

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Hector Monro: The hon. Gentleman must answer the question.

Mr. Robertson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Hector Monro: I shall give way only if the hon. Gentleman promises to answer the question. Will he do so? I see that he will not, so I shall not give way. That is too bad. He may have the chance to speak later, when he winds up for the Opposition.

Really good ideas are coming forward, with the Scottish Grand Committee meeting in Scotland and carrying out many useful tasks, so that the people can see us and can meet Ministers, including English Ministers, who come to address the Committee.

I shall ask my right hon. Friend the Minister one or two practical questions that he may be prepared to think about. He is right to say that the House authorities have moved heaven and earth to ease any difficulties, whether we meet in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, Inverness or anywhere else—which I am glad to do. I know that the usual channels have used their best endeavours to ensure that there is light voting on days when the Committee meets far from the central belt. If we meet in Inverness—as we shall, and I shall be glad to do so—Back Benchers, and indeed Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen, may have to go there on Sunday night. We cannot guarantee to be on parade at 10.30 on Monday morning unless we do that, especially in winter when the weather in Scotland can be bad.

I should therefore like my right hon. Friend to consider integrating the work of the House of Commons more closely with that of the Scottish Grand Committee so that, if possible, we meet on a Monday on which there is light business in Westminster so that we can return with our motor cars or whatever to our home bases and start out again. This is an important practical point which we must try to work at if we are to improve the logistics of meeting in various venues in Scotland, which I believe is an excellent idea. Another minor but important point is that we should be able to simplify our travelling, hotel and incidental expenses, for which we currently have to apply to different parts of the House of Commons for completion.

I have been a member of the Scottish Grand Committee for many years, including the days when we had to make up the numbers to have a majority. The steps we have now taken to deal with non-controversial legislation are quite excellent. More importantly, we shall be able to get more business through the House via the Scottish Grand Committee than if we had to go through the full procedure of Second Reading on the Floor of the House, Standing Committee, and so on. All in all, Scotland can look forward to additional constructive legislation, particularly legislation relating to some of the Law Commission reports which often have to be put aside because there is no time to debate them in the House of Commons.

I believe that we are right to bring forward these amendments to the Standing Orders, and I warmly support them. I would ask my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to consider the practical ways in which he can assist Members of Parliament to attend the Scottish Grand Committee with greater facility than is possible at present.

8.8 pm

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): My hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) made an important point about the facilities—or lack of them—that we shall have when we move around the country. The lack of facilities is not the fault of the local authorities, each and every one of which has given excellent hospitality. It is not always easy for a local authority or a town hall to rearrange its facilities to suit 72 Members of Parliament and other staff.

Lord Provost Thomas Dingwall should be congratulated, as every officer at the city chambers gave us every facility. The Lord Provost laid on lunch at his expense, not only for hon. Members but for all the back-up staff, including the Hansard staff and the badge messengers. That was appreciated. Nonetheless, if we have to travel the length and breadth of the country—I have no objection to that—it must be recognised that we also have to look after our constituents. The phone often rings on a Sunday night and hon. Members are asked to chase up urgent matters on the Monday, and I had that experience before I went to Edinburgh. In those circumstances, an hon. Member must be able to get to a phone or a fax while he is at the Scottish Grand Committee if he is to assist in an immigration problem or to help during an eviction.

Dr. Godman: The council officials—including the Lord Provost—were very kind and hospitable, but precisely the problem that my hon. Friend is now outlining prompted my complaint. I, too, was dealing with an urgent constituency matter and I had to wait eight minutes for a Scottish Office official to finish using the telephone.

Mr. Martin: My hon. Friend again makes an important point. If Scottish Members are to be tied up in the Committee until 1.30 pm on a Monday, we must have the back-up facilities to allow us to get on with the work that our constituents expect us to do. Parking facilities are also important, and I hope that the Leader of the House will consider these matters.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor), the shadow Leader of the House, raised a very important point. The amendment to the Standing Orders states:

> "Any Minister of the Crown, being a Member of the House, though not a member of the committee, may take part in the deliberations of the committee and may make a motion, but shall not vote or be counted in the quorum."

I am not trying to put obstacles in the way of the Leader of the House, but the House is saying that we, as Scottish Members, have the Grand Committee exclusively for us. However, the amendment states that the Conservative Whip will be allowed to sit in the body of the hall. I do not think that that should be the case. I take the view that, as there are a few Scottish Tory Back-Bench Members left, they should pick their Whip for the Grand Committee.

We have a Member from the Scottish National party in the Chamber now, and I have stated my views about nationalism. I despise the terms English and Scottish and, while I am proud of my culture, I hope that I would never express that in a way that discriminates against people. I do not want to have a go at English Members of Parliament, but my complaint does not relate to a person's nationality.

Members representing Scottish seats should be in the Scottish Grand Committee, while Members representing English, Welsh or Irish seats should not. I do not think that the Conservative Whip should be within the body of the hall because his job is different from that of a Government Minister. The Whip's job is to rustle up votes and to tell people to stop speaking.

Mr. Michael Forsyth indicated dissent.

Mr. Martin: The Secretary of State shakes his head, and suggests that that is not the Whip's purpose. It does not matter whether the Secretary of State has good intentions and I accept that in this case his intentions are good as he wants to improve the facility. But once we put the matter into black and white, someone will be able to come along later and see it as an abuse.

What happens when we leave the House and some other people take our places? If there are no Tory Back-Bench Members left in Scotland at that time, somebody may suggest that half a dozen Tory Whips—who will have nothing else to do with their time—should join the Committee debates, make speeches and put down motions. I know that the intention of the amendment is to get Ministers of the Crown to come along to the Committee and make statements so that we can scrutinise the work that they are doing. But the amendment is open to abuse. I mean no disrespect to the present Whip, but he does not represent a Scottish seat and I would hope that the amendment will not allow him into the body of the hall.

The Leader of the House should consider the provision which allows a Minister of the Crown who is not a Minister of this House but of the other place to make statements. I must ask that once those Ministers and Ministers of the Crown who are not members of the Scottish Grand Committee have finished their business in the Committee, they should take no further part in the proceedings. A Minister can come along and take part in the proceedings of the Committee, but we know that Ministers normally say or do nothing other than deal with the matter for which they are responsible. May we have an assurance that once a Minister has finished that part of his business—for example, ministerial questions—he will take no further part in the proceedings of the Grand Committee?

8.9 pm

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): It is a privilege to follow the hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin), whose leading and valued role as Chairman of the Scottish Grand Committee is, in the main, much appreciated.

In welcoming these changes to our Standing Orders, I draw attention to comments that I and other Scottish Conservative and Unionist candidates made at the time of the last general election, when we suggested that a new Conservative Government should increase the importance and activities of the Grand Committee. Furthermore, the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) might like to know that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave us a commitment to that effect at the time. He had clearly looked ahead even before the general election.

We also considered the role of the Scottish Affairs Select Committee; I and other colleagues offered a commitment to its reinstatement—and that is what has taken place since 1992. Under the able chairmanship of the hon. Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. McKelvey) it has played a valuable role in the affairs of Scotland, as evidenced by some of the excellent reports it has drawn up on drugs, enterprise companies and other subjects.

I welcome the fact, too, that the Committee will move around the country. It is important to let people throughout Scotland witness the Government's activities. I have noted that meetings held in Edinburgh and Glasgow are usually quite well attended, but I was disappointed to find that Labour Members did not turn up in large numbers in Aberdeen. It seems to me that Labour Members tend to concentrate on central belt issues instead of recognising Scotland's wider needs. If we stick with the policy of moving around, perhaps we shall eventually get the point through to them.

I agree with the hon. Members for Springburn and for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) about facilities. We really must have telephones and faxes at the various venues.

The amendments to Standing Orders refer also to the Grand Committee dealing with Bills. Last year, Second Reading of the Children (Scotland) Bill was taken in the Committee, whereupon a Special Standing Committee was set up to examine the details. These proposals follow on from that and open the door to further progress; Third Readings will be taken in the Scottish Grand Committee—that will be most welcome to all hon. Members.

On 29 November the Secretary of State said that a timetable of our sittings would be established, and one has since been drawn up for eight meetings to consider Government business. I understand that a timetable for four Opposition motions is being prepared as well. That, too, is welcome. It is important to set dates in advance so as to allow hon. Members to make arrangements around them. I can see no reference in the motions to this aspect of the matter, however. Perhaps the Minister will give it some consideration in winding up the debate.

The Special Standing Committee procedure is to be used again for the Licensing (Amendment) (Scotland) Bill. That is most welcome. The Committee is due to come to Ayr not long hence to discuss raves and drug misuse.

Above all, I welcome the intention to invite United Kingdom Ministers whose departmental remits include responsibilities for Scottish affairs. I agree with the hon. Member for Springburn that such Ministers should have no voting rights in the Grand Committee, as is well established under our rules, but it will be beneficial to invite Ministers from the Department of Transport, the Department of Social Security and—given that so many people work for the defence industry in Scotland—from the Ministry of Defence. That will boost Scottish involvement in our national affairs. It will be particularly pleasing to see the Prime Minister in the Committee. That will be a reminder that he is Prime Minister not just of the United Kingdom but of each of its nation states.

On a more generous note, perhaps we should recognise that the Leader of the Opposition might have an important part to play. We should open up the doors to him on future occasions if he can come in his role as Leader of the Opposition—a role I hope he will continue to play for many years to come.

Mr. Newton: Does my hon. Friend envisage, in the world picture that he is painting, that the Leader of the Opposition would have to answer some questions?

Mr. Gallie: No, but it would only be fair to allow him to ask questions. I believe that the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) is rather uninformed about Scottish matters, and it would do him the world of good to spend some time in the Scottish Grand Committee. I understand, in fact, that the right hon. Gentleman recently attended a dinner—Opposition Members might have called it an elitist dinner—addressed also by the hon. Member for

Hamilton (Mr. Robertson). The right hon. Member for Sedgefield made a speech at the dinner; its major sponsors, Global Video, placed an advertisement in the programme containing the words:

"Wouldn't you rather be at home watching a video?"

Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will take that message to heart when he considers some of the Opposition's madcap ideas for imposing a tax-raising Assembly on Scotland. The people of Scotland certainly do not want a tartan tax. The idea is being pushed by the hon. Member for Hamilton, but the right hon. Member for Sedgefield should travel up to Scotland a bit more to learn that the Scottish people do not want the option that he is attempting to force on them.

8.17 pm

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I was interested to hear the views of the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie), but I really do hope that we will not start head counting at Monday morning meetings of the Scottish Grand Committee. That might bring the whole process into some disrepute. To that extent I disagreed with the hon. Gentleman, and I disagreed with all his other suggestions as well.

I welcome these changes—as far as they go. It is certainly an improvement to be given notice of the dates for well into the new year. This has always been a difficulty for the minority parties. Discussions are held through the usual channels, but latterly they have become rather clogged up. I am pleased that the Secretary of State has cut through all that. He has set a timetable up to the summer, which everyone will welcome. Of course there are difficulties in travelling, but as long as the logistics can be sorted out there will be benefits. The Committee's deliberations will be taken to different parts of Scotland, which I welcome. The changes will give us more time and opportunity to consider some of the questions that are to the fore of public life north of the border.

The Leader of the House is a reasonable and enlightened man.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I was just saying the same about the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Kirkwood: That is the end of both our careers.

The Leader of the House has not been in charge of the Government's programme throughout their term of office but, after 16 years, to introduce these changes as the answer to the constitutional deficit north of the border is inadequate. To describe them as inadequate is an understatement of some proportion. They do not measure up to what needs to be done.

If there is one thing that illustrates my point better than any other, it is the way in which the Government treat the different but very real problems of the Province of Northern Ireland. There is no suggestion that they will tinker with Standing Orders or that a Grand Committee will meet in Enniskillen, Derry or other parts of Northern Ireland. That is in stark contrast to the way in which they are coping with the situation in Scotland.

Mr. George Robertson: Standing Order No. 99 states that there should be a Northern Ireland Grand Committee. It has two subsections. However, the Government's response to the situation in Northern Ireland, as the hon. Gentleman rightly says, is not to beef up that Committee up with another five pages of amendments and the possibility of UK or Scottish Ministers going over there but to create a legislative assembly for Northern Ireland with 90 members and full legislative powers. People understand that distinction and the contrast and hypocrisy in the Government's position.

Mr. Kirkwood: I hope that whoever will reply to the debate will address that point.

Mr. Michael Forsyth indicated assent.

Mr. Kirkwood: I am pleased that the Secretary of State will deal with that point, which is in many people's minds and deserves an answer.

Are these changes all that we will get? Is this the beginning of a continuing process? If it is, my hon. Friends and I are interested in engaging in it; but if this is all that we are to get for all time, it is completely inadequate and does not begin to measure up to the possibilities for constitutional reform north of the border.

There are other questions about the detail of the changes that need to be addressed. Will this end the difficult process, which we have experienced more and more in recent years, of small Scottish sections being added to principally English Bills? As a legal practitioner in a previous incarnation, I know that the situation was becoming impossible even before 1983 when I was elected. It has worsened since. Will the Secretary of State comment on that matter of continuing concern? Will the changes provide more time for effective scrutiny and deal with the important question asked by the right hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), who hoped, as I do, that the proposals of the Scottish Law Commission will get a better hearing under this process than previously? If that proves to be so, it will be a significant advantage.

It is not clear who will control the access of UK and English Ministers, Prime Ministers and Chancellors who will come to give us the benefit of their views. Will that be entirely under the control of the Government or will we be able to negotiate it through the usual channels? Will the Committee be able to vote to require or request—or, indeed, reject—the attendance of a UK Minister? The process and the arrangements that will have to be made for that are not clear.

I welcome the fact that we will be able to return to questions of principle on Third Reading of Bills. Does that mean that we will be able to discuss things that are not in the Bill, as amended, at that stage? At present, we would not be in order if we discussed something that was not in the Bill on Third Reading. If we will now be able to discuss matters of principle, that gives us the opportunity to consider things that are not in the Bill, as amended, on Third Reading in a way that we cannot at the moment. I would value some advice on that.

Mr. Newton: It may help if I say a brief, off-the-cuff word about that. As always, it is up to the occupant of the Chair to decide what is in or out of order in a speech. That is the basic point. I would not envisage anything being in order in a Third Reading debate in the Scottish Grand Committee that would be out of order in such a debate in the House. I guess that a passing reference to regretting that something was not in the Bill might be in order but that an attempt to have an elaborate discussion on it would not be. Those are the normal rules of the House.

Mr. Kirkwood: I hope that the Leader of the House will give that further and better consideration. If the suggestion enshrined in the proposals is to mean anything and we are to have discussion in principle of the contents of the Bill on Third Reading, I do not understand how the situation that he has described could obtain.

Mr. Newton: I do not wish to make a huge issue of this, but we are talking about a Third Reading debate and the opportunity to have it in the Scottish Grand Committee rather than on the Floor of the House. Apart from that, it is no different.

Mr. Kirkwood: The Third Reading of the Children (Scotland) Bill, for example, took 20 minutes. If we are to take proper advantage of the new procedure we should be able to discuss things in principle on Third Reading. Obviously, this is a matter for the occupant of the Chair in any particular circumstance, but I believe that it is out of order to discuss things that are not in the Bill, as amended, on Third Reading. If we are to discuss things in principle, we should be able to do precisely that. There is confusion about that in my mind, if in no one else's. Perhaps the Leader of the House could give the matter further consideration.

The initiative, if that is not an overstatement of the amendments to Standing Orders, is a recognition by the Government that things need to change north of the border. If the Secretary of State is saying that the proposals are a first step to trying to do things better—to improve the quality of Scottish legislation, to provide more time, to have more effective scrutiny, better public access and more publicity for what we are doing north of the border—then we are signed up for it and we support it. If he does not take the initiative forward and it is not the start of a process of change, then what is before us tonight is not, by itself, worth having.

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) made some general points with which he would not expect me to agree, but he has asked some interesting questions about how the proposed procedures would work.

This is a short and largely technical debate. I take the view already expressed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) and my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie) that these are sensible, practical changes. They are changes within the framework of the Union.

I say to the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) that to defend the Union—at the last general election, or, for that matter, at previous ones—is not to say that the Union is cast permanently in stone in respect of its institutions. That is an absurd position to take.

Conservative Governments introduced the Scottish Office and the office of the Secretary of State for Scotland. At some stage, the hon. Member for Dewsbury or her colleagues must answer the key question about their attitude to the proposals: what could a Labour Government do with their Scottish Parliament that they could not do with these proposals, given a Labour majority in this House, except increase taxes in Scotland? Under Labour's proposals, the advantage of directly questioning major Ministers such as the Prime Minister, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of State for Defence would be lost.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): The hon. Gentleman's argument has often been deployed by the Secretary of State in defence of these proposals. The hon. Gentleman seems to accept that the proposals are inadequate under a Conservative Government because, although the Committee may vote in one way, the House can overturn that vote. Curiously, he seems to argue that the proposals can work only if we have a Labour Government. Is that the best argument that a Conservative Back Bencher can advance in support of these proposals?

Mr. Stewart: I am not arguing that for a moment. Assuming that a Labour Government would want to introduce a Scottish Parliament, I asked the hon. Member for Dewsbury what a Labour Government would do in the several years between an election and introducing a Scottish Parliament, but I received no answer whatever. The proposals are entirely workable under a Conservative or Labour Government, but what would a Labour Government achieve with a Scottish Parliament that they could not achieve with these proposals if they had a majority in this House? At some stage, Opposition Front Benchers must answer that question.

I emphasise the importance of extra question periods, which would have an inherently greater advantage than set-piece debates. Set-piece debates tend to be predictable—

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): This is one of them.

Mr. Stewart: Except when I am speaking, but I shall not go down that path. Moreover, they do not provide much opportunity for Back Benchers because such a high proportion of time is inevitably taken up by the two Front Bench spokesmen at the beginning and end of such debates. The key feature of the new proposals is the increase in the proportion of time devoted to questions.

Will my right hon. Friend answer three points of detail? First, do the proposals increase Scottish Members' opportunities to enact private Members' Bills, which, on the Floor of the House, could be stopped for reasons unrelated to the merits of the Bill? I hope that he can reassure all Back Benchers that he will consider that matter positively.

Secondly, may I support the point about facilities made by the hon. Members for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) and for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman). If the proposals are to work, it must be accepted that facilities such as telephones and fax machines are not for the personal convenience of Members but because our constituents, who might normally expect to find us in our constituencies on a Monday morning, may want to be in touch with us urgently about the kind of important issue to which the hon. Member for Springburn referred.

Thirdly, on the timing of Committee meetings, my right hon. Friend should not regard 10.30 am as a sacrosanct starting time as the Committee now travels to different parts of Scotland. It would be sensible to have a different starting time depending on precisely where the Committee meets.

Dr. Godman: Another problem that the Leader of the House has not examined is that, when we attend meetings of the Scottish Grand Committee in Scotland, we cannot be here when Ministers make important statements. That happened on Monday, when a number of us wanted to be here to ask questions of the Prime Minister about the Madrid debacle. We were denied that opportunity because we were in Glasgow.

Mr. Stewart: That is undoubtedly a potential problem. It is less of a problem if the Committee meets in Glasgow, which has a regular air service, but if we meet in other areas of Scotland where the air service is less frequent, those problems can arise and the authorities should deal with them in a practical way.

I welcome these sensible and practical proposals. However, the debate has revealed that a number of detailed questions from hon. Members on both sides of the House need to be answered to ensure that the proposals are made as practicable and workable as possible.

8.35 pm

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): I am grateful to note that the amendments to the Standing Orders have at least restored the confidence of the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), which I thought was rather strange. He then had the common sense to add "only a little".

I find them so sadly lacking in imagination and divergent thinking that I wonder whether they come from the pen of the Secretary of State for Scotland at all. He was the Minister who gave us "Reservicing Britain", which led to compulsory competitive tendering, and has caused great harm to local government services. He was also the Minister who gave us the poll tax. At least that was inspired—mad, but inspired—whereas these proposals are not at all inspired.

As I go round the line of route with some of my guests, I show them the Magna Carta and explain that, at that time, the people of the country—at least, the lords—had to be consulted by the king before he passed vital Acts of Parliament. I also point out that, although they were consulted, they could rarely persuade the king not to do his own will at bidding.

Those are the kind of Standing Orders that we have before us. The Government wheel Scottish Members around to the Scottish Grand Committee at various locations, where they are consulted, but then pay no attention to what they say. I have heard much criticism of members of local government for not consulting in that way. The Standing Orders are not intended to change the fundamental flaw in the United Kingdom's democratic system, which is that the majority of Scottish people reject the Government's policies, but they will be put through through either the present ritual in the Scottish Grand Committee or the extended ritual set down in the Standing Orders.

A former Prime Minister talked about his preference for "talk, talk" rather than "war, war". [HON. MEMBERS: "Jaw, jaw."] "Jaw, jaw" is a different phrase, but it has the same meaning: better to talk, therefore to avoid conflict. The Standing Orders will show the people of Scotland again and again the pointlessness of the Scottish Grand Committee and therefore underline the fact that they must go to war with the United Kingdom's constitutional arrangements if they are to achieve real progress and democracy for Scotland.

On that basis, I welcome the fact that the more people see the flaws in the Standing Orders and how the Scottish Grand Committee operates, even with the extended changes, the more they will see how pointless it is to have a Scottish Grand Committee in a United Kingdom Parliament that then uses the voting power of English Members to deny the views put forward by the majority of hon. Members representing Scotland.

All parties, apart from the Conservative party, will normally speak against the Government's position but, ultimately, the Government will bring the matter down to the House of Commons.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that a majority in the Scottish Grand Committee should determine legislation in Scotland? The hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) refused to answer the question; will the hon. Gentleman answer it?

Mr. Connarty: My argument is that any process of democratic arrangement should be one where the majority of the people, in a position where there is subsidiarity and devolved government, make the decision on those items that relate to the Scottish—[Interruption.] I do not believe that the Scottish Grand Committee is the right place to make that type of decision. We wish to see a Scottish devolved Parliament with the proper devolution of subsidiary powers—in the Scottish context, of those things that the Scottish people wish to be controlled by that Parliament.

There will be consultation, but we shall not have the right to persuade the Government to change their route. The argument made again and again is that the Committee may discuss non-controversial Bills—we have probably set out along that road—such as the health and safety at raves Act or the Licensing Scotland (Amendment) Bill. However, let us consider what the effect would be if a Bill were controversial.

We would be able to have a Second Reading debate in the Scottish Grand Committee. It would then be sent to a Scottish Standing Committee, with an inbuilt majority for the Government. If it went back to the later stage, as was explained to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire points of principle could not be raised again on Third Reading.

Obviously, the measure is a sham. It is a way of taking us to various venues, and I welcome any chance to debate with the Government at any time anywhere, but it will not prevent the Scottish people from concluding that the majority of the people of Scotland, through their representatives in the House, cannot influence the Government's decisions on what they would call controversial issues.

That is what is wrong with the measure. There is no acceptance in any of the Standing Orders that the majority of the Scottish people reject the Conservative Government's policies on what they call controversial matters. Controversial matters cannot be voted down; nor, at any Committee stage in a Scottish Standing Committee, can controversial amendments be passed on the basis of the majority of the Scottish people's wishes.

[Mr. Connarty]

We witnessed that, although we tried our best, during the passage of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, which has been cited as an Act that did everything. It had a Special Standing Committee, which took evidence, but when the Government did not wish to accept controversial amendments in Committee, they voted them down. Then they brought the Bill to the Floor of the House, and voted down any further amendments. When they did not like amendments that were passed in the House of Lords, they brought the Bill back again, and used their majority in the Chamber to vote down those amendments.

That is why I think it is important to realise that the Standing Orders will do one thing, and only one thing, for Scottish democracy. It will be exhibited again and again, through the use of those procedures, that the Secretary of State for Scotland is trying to sell the people of Scotland an insufficient change to the constitutional arrangements for Scotland within the United Kingdom. I welcome the measures on that basis. The more they expose the Government's flaws and lack of democracy, the more people will demand a Scottish devolved Parliament under the Labour Government after the general election.

8.42 pm

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): Madam Deputy Speaker, I feel like Banquo's ghost who has just arrived at the feast. Forgive me if I do not join in the very modest celebration that is going on.

The right hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) spoke about those measures representing evolution. It is evolution of a gey shilpit cratur. I noticed that the Leader of the House believed that the measures would be widely welcomed in Scotland, but he means that they will be widely ignored in Scotland. There is no big deal in any of that.

It is typical of the Westminster system that the debate was opened by two Members of Parliament representing English constituencies, and the measures have about that much relevance to Scotland. I have heard more in the Chamber offered to the south sea island of Tuvalu than I have heard offered to Scotland. At least Tuvalu will get independence; we only have the load of old rubbish presented to us tonight.

There is a proposition that England and Wales Ministers can come and attend the Scottish Grand Committee. It probably serves them right, but it may be important, because English Ministers have a habit of overruling the wishes of the Scottish Office. I have seen that all too often in agriculture and fishing—if I can mention fishing to the Minister, who will be rather sensitive about that subject.

I ask the Minister: what budgets have been given for those meetings of the Scottish Grand Committee in Scotland? Who will pay for the security of all those bigwigs who arrive on an awayday ticket to Scotland every so often? Will that be a burden on local authorities? Who will pay for that?

The changes are minor changes to the Scottish Grand Committee. If they had been made at any time in the past 30 years, no one would have noticed. To my mind, it is simply deckchair shuffling time on The Titanic, while the orchestra plays "Land of Hope and Glory", but I am happy to tell the Secretary of State that, as a ruse, it will not work.

The changes will allow the Prime Minister or other bigwigs to join the Scottish Grand Committee travelling circus, and that is no big deal for Scotland. They might persuade the Prime Minister or some of the other England and Wales Ministers to concentrate on Scottish affairs for a morning, and perhaps that would be some limited good.

In reality, the Scottish Grand Committee has no powers. It is simply a talking shop, based on a technicality. It can merely decide that it has or has not decided that it has decided that it has met, and it is about that much use to the whole of Scotland. It is no substitute for a Parliament, or for the real return of decision-making power to the Scottish people.

I will agree this far with what I heard in some of the speeches. When the Scottish people see exactly what worth and what good the Westminster system is to them, we shall obtain the result that is the only true future for our nation, which is true independence, when the Scottish people can decide their own future through their own democratically elected Parliament. The measures are trivial, betraying a trivial approach to Scotland's needs. They will pass, but they will not do.

All I can say is, if this is the union—

Mr. Sam Galbraith (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): We have got all night right now, laddie.

Mr. Welsh: Not really. It does not take long to reply to this load of old rubbish, which the hon. Gentleman accepts is good enough for his country, but I certainly do not and will not.

If this is the union at its sparkling best, I am indeed happy for the future of Scotland.

8.46 pm

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I promise that I shall be very brief.

Mr. Galbraith: Ten minutes: it is getting good and depressing here.

Dr. Godman: I begin by asking a question. [Interruption.] It is a serious question. Has Greenock been ruled out for the staging of a meeting of the Scottish Grand Committee? I should like the Trade and Industry Minister to be there, answering questions concerning the shipbuilding industry and other maritime industries. I should also like to hear from the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson), tonight about the placing of a certain contract for the construction of a fisheries research vessel, but that does not fall within the framework of the amendments.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): It should be a Scottish shipyard.

Dr. Godman: I am happy to know that Fergusons will build that ship. It is a Scottish fisheries research vessel, and it should be built in a premier yard in Scotland—Fergusons of Port Glasgow.

I also draw attention to the fact that, if we are to attend those frequent meetings of the Scottish Grand Committee in different towns and cities, that prevents us from coming to this place to hear important statements from the Dispatch Box. I for one wanted to be here yesterday to hear the Prime Minister speak, and I got here as quickly as I could, just in time for the tail end of that statement. That simply is not good enough for Scots Members.

I ask the Secretary of State, a serious question. Where there is a clash, would it be possible to consider a ministerial statement being made later in the day, or postponed until the following day?

The lack of facilities has been mentioned. In that regard, I offer my compliments to the councils of Edinburgh, Aberdeen and Glasgow for the fine hospitality that they extended to us. It was interesting to see my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) finally making it to the lord provost's chair. I do not believe that he ever sat in that chair when he was a councillor in Glasgow, although he deserved to sit in it. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]

I for one would welcome the opportunity to cross-examine our premier Law Officer on Lockerbie, and just what the heck is happening to the pursuit of the people alleged to have committed the murders on that terrible day in December 1988. We also need to challenge him on other issues, such as the operation of Acts of Parliament that seek to give greater protection to children when they give evidence in our courts of law. When Ministers attend meetings of the Scottish Grand Committee, they should come by invitation of the members of the Committee. Its meetings should not be used as a travelling press conference, as one was recently by the Secretary of State, when about 16 journalists were present to hear his less than informative speech on spending.

Speaking as a federalist, I believe that the only answer in the long run is to have a Scottish Parliament, a Welsh Parliament, an English Parliament and a Northern Ireland Parliament. The Scottish Grand Committee is a talking shop; it has taken on the characteristics of a travelling talking shop. Some of us will be lucky—or unlucky—and it will come to our constituencies; owing to the size of our majorities, some of us will, I suspect, be excluded from that privilege.

8.50 pm

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): It is appropriate for the Scottish team to have a few words at the end of the debate. I know that we are not allowed to mention the people in the Galleries this evening, but if I were allowed to do so, I would be able to say that on a rainy, wet night in London, the Strangers Gallery contained three people—exactly the same number as are present in the Press Gallery.

What does that say for the argument that the measure will bring Scottish affairs back to the nation? My hon. Friends the Members for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) and for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) say that they have been so captivated by our brief debate that they intend to make at least a couple of visits to the Scottish Grand Committee—in Stornoway, Ayr, Stirling, Eyemouth, Unst and who knows where. If the Scottish Whip gets his way, it may even go to Dalkeith.

I should make it clear for the purpose of certain hon. Members who do not seem to have noticed what is happening that we do not intend to vote against the provisions this evening. Any extra debates in Scotland are to be welcomed. The opportunity to cross-examine some Ministers north of the border may be useful. I can imagine no better way of reducing Tory party support in Scotland from 13 per cent. to single figures than to bring up the Secretary of State for Defence to go around and defend his policies.

We were told only a few weeks ago that the measure was the big rabbit that the Secretary of State was going to pull out of his hat to try to grab some headlines from the Scottish Constitutional Convention launch. The big white rabbit was to be the big white Prime Minister appearing in an unknown location in Scotland.

As people across Scotland have seen, the reality is an admission that the Government have got their policy on Scotland and the constitution wrong for 16 years. I know that behind the Secretary of State for Scotland are diehard Unionists who have held to that line for 16 years and who must be deeply worried about the way in which the argument has been thrown away; in its place, in the vacuum that the right hon. Gentleman has created, is a pathetic substitute for what the Scottish people want.

The Prime Minister admits that there is a fault and a flaw. The Prime Minister admits failure on the constitution; all we have is some pretty tawdry window dressing. The Secretary of State for Scotland comes to the Scottish Office in a blaze of glory; he discards the ideas of his predecessors, and tells us that he has the answer. But with exactly the same arrogant contempt for public opinion in Scotland, he tells the Scottish people that he has made up his mind, and that this is his choice, and his alone.

That will never be acceptable to the Scottish people, 87 per cent. of whom reject the Conservative party, leaving the party in splendid—and now mobile—isolation. The people of Scotland will not be fobbed off by a few Cabinet Ministers who choose to wander around Scotland, making a case that has, until now, persuaded nobody.

As the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) has said, the Scottish people are intelligent enough, and aware enough, to see the Government's argument in all its stark hypocrisy. In Northern Ireland and for Northern Ireland, the Government say in the framework document that what is required is not to beef up clause 99 of the Standing Orders of the House of Commons or to beef up the Northern Ireland Grand Committee, but a full-scale, legislative Assembly for Northern Ireland. Some 90 members are to be suggested for that legislative Assembly. [Interruption.] I am glad that the Secretary of State for Scotland is telling the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson) to shut up and stop his endless prattling. The Under-Secretary of State may gain some glory in his brief parliamentary career for making more sedentary interventions than anyone else.

Mr. Home Robertson: Is it my hon. Friend's understanding that the Northern Ireland Assembly is to be funded by an orange tax?

Mr. Robertson: I shall not rise to that bait.

On a serious point, the framework document makes it clear that the sources of funding for the Northern Ireland Assembly are open to negotiation. Nothing has been ruled out by Her Majesty's Government for Northern Ireland, although they have ruled out everything for Scotland.

[Mr. Robertson]

A party of government that is down to 13 per cent. in Scotland—to the bottom of the barrel—should act with a little humility. There may have come a time, even for this Secretary of State for Scotland—who foisted the poll tax on Scotland, whence it went to the rest of the country—to listen to the Scottish people who so decisively reject him. Instead of coming up with wheezes and public relations gimmicks that he is willing to parade in the streets of Scotland without any dignity, he should take heed of the work being done in the consensus-based forum of the Scottish Constitutional Convention.

We cannot vote for what the Scottish people want, because the Scottish Parliament is not on offer tonight, but in the next 15 months there will be an election and the Scottish people will be able to choose what they want. They will be able to vote for the Scottish Parliament for which they have asked for all these years; we shall deliver it, and Scotland will be the better for it.

8.57 pm

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Forsyth): The Scottish people will certainly not want to have anything to do with the tartan tax proposed by the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson)—just as the Leader of the Opposition wanted nothing to do with it. If the hon. Gentleman is correct that the proposals are such a bad idea, is it not significant that he and his colleagues will once again sit on their hands and decline to vote against them tonight? Labour Members decried the tax cuts in much the same way, but when it comes to the crunch they cannot vote against the proposals, because they knew that they are popular.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) at least had the good grace to recognise that this is an opportunity for us to perform our work in Scotland more effectively and to improve legislation for Scotland. This week's meeting of the Scottish Grand Committee in Glasgow was a marvellous example of how it is possible for hon. Members from different political parties to put their differences aside and discuss serious issues, such as drugs, and take forward the debate. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman could not recognise that.

The hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) talked about panic. If she wants panic, she should have seen her leader on his day trip to Scotland. He started the day by assuring us that there would be no tartan tax unless it were in the Labour manifesto—and he gave an assurance that it would not be. By the end of the day—after some fancy footwork on the part of the hon. Member for Hamilton—the Leader of the Opposition supported the hon. Gentleman in his call for a tartan tax. At least, I think that was the Leader of the Opposition's position. The Scottish people will have nothing to do with a tax-raising Parliament.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire asked me if this is the end. No, it is not. When I made my statement to the House, I said that I was open to positive suggestions. At least the hon. Gentleman has the intellectual honesty to acknowledge that the Constitutional Convention's proposals would mean the end of the office of Secretary of State and a reduction in the number of Scottish Members of Parliament. The hon. Gentleman is still living in cloud cuckoo land, where he thinks he can have his cake and eat it.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) welcomed the proposals, and I am grateful for his support. The hon. Members for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) and for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) emphasised the importance of proper facilities. I am relieved to learn that not everyone in the Labour party has sharp suits and mobile telephones—although I must admit that the hon. Member for Springburn has a sharp suit. But it is a serious point, as my right hon. Friend acknowledged.

The hon. Member for Springburn also referred to the presence of the Whip. Far be it from me to make a plea on behalf of the Whips, but the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) intervened during the Scottish Grand Committee hearing in Edinburgh to complain about his inability to talk to the usual channels. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Springburn remembers that, but perhaps he should have a word with his hon. Friend, who does not seem to have the right line from the Whips Office.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire welcomed the changes. He asked me whether there would be more opportunities to deal with Scottish legislation in the Grand Committee. I hope there will, and that measures that would otherwise have to wait their turn as private Members' business can be considered in the Grand Committee. That would demand some restraint, and co-operation through the usual channels, but there is a real chance that we could achieve that goal. The hon. Gentleman has recognised that opportunity, and I welcome his support.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about Ministers from Departments other than the Scottish Office appearing before the Scottish Grand Committee. It is obviously for the Government to decide who should answer particular debates. However, the nature of the subjects chosen for debate should select which Minister will respond.

For example, my hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for railways and roads appeared before the Scottish Grand Committee during its consideration of the Fort William sleeper service. That is an obvious example of a Minister from the relevant Department appearing before the Committee. I am sure that Department of Transport officials found it very useful briefing the Minister for that debate.

I welcome the support of my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart). He asked a key question which the hon. Member for Hamilton has not yet answered: if we are able to take legislation through the Grand Committee and hold members of the Executive to account in Scotland, what could a Scottish Parliament with a majority of Labour Members do under a Labour Government that could not be done in the Scottish Grand Committee?

Mrs. Ann Taylor: It could make decisions.

Mr. Forsyth: I appreciate that any Labour Government would find making decisions very difficult. However, a Scottish Grand Committee with a Labour majority under a Labour Government would be able to do everything that a Scottish Parliament could do, except one thing: raise a tartan tax, and make the Scots pay more income tax than the English. A Scottish Parliament would not be able to hold the Prime Minister and Ministers to account in the way that the Scottish Grand Committee can.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood is absolutely correct to make that point, and to draw attention to the fact that hon. Members will be able to ask more questions in the Committee. I take his point about times, and that matter will be settled through the usual channels. I appreciate his comments about private Members' business, but I ask him to take on board the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire. I think that we will have a real chance to take through uncontroversial measures, which would not otherwise not be available to us, as Government measures.

The hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Connarty) talked about my unpopular policies in Scotland. They were so unpopular that I twice defeated the hon. Gentleman at the ballot box in Stirling before he ran off to Falkirk.

The hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) brought the pantomime scene to our proceedings a little early, by giving us the analogy of the Titanic. If he was comparing our position to that, he must have been the iceberg. I can only assume that there is a lot more below the surface than was apparent from his contribution to the debate.

Mr. Welsh: I remind the Minister that I also used the analogy of Banquo's ghost, who led to the denouement of the play by reminding the criminals of their crime.

Mr. Forsyth: I am delighted that, after all his rude comments about the English, the hon. Gentleman still acknowledges the importance of Shakespeare as a good English poet and playwright.

The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow asked whether the Scottish Grand Committee would be able to come to Greenock. Obviously, it is a matter for the House authorities to consider possible venues, but I understand that the Opposition have suggested Ayr. As there may be a particular problem with the date in Ayr, if the hon. Gentleman has a word with his hon. Friend, that might be a possibility. As to the choice of subjects, the Opposition have their allotted days.

The measure is a positive step forward. It gives Scottish Members the opportunity to demonstrate to their electors their commitment to good government in Scotland. It provides an opportunity for the Opposition to hold the Government to account for their policies—I shall not place too much emphasis on that. Although the Opposition have a ragbag of confused people proposing a tartan tax on the people of Scotland, they clearly have to sort out their own act before holding the Government to account. The proposals represent an opportunity, and I commend them to the House.

It being one and a half hours after the motion was entered upon, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Order [14 December].

Question agreed to.

Resolved,

That—

(1) Standing Order No. 94A (Scottish Grand Committee (composition and business)) be amended, as follows:

line 17, after 'consideration', insert 'or further consideration';

line 30, leave out from 'committee,' to 'Standing' in line 32 and insert 'made under paragraph (6) of';

line 33, at the end, add—

'(3) Any Minister of the Crown, being a Member of the House, though not a member of the committee, may take part in the deliberations of the committee and may make a motion, but shall not vote or be counted in the quorum.';

(2) Standing Order No. 94C (Scottish Grand Committee (short debates)) be amended, as follows:

line 8, leave out from 'to' to the end of line 9 and insert 'Scotland';

line 19, leave out from 'No' to 'replying' in line 20 and insert 'Member except the Minister of the Crown';

line 24, leave out 'minister or law officer' and insert 'Minister of the Crown';

line 25, leave out 'members of the committee' and insert 'Members';

line 27, leave out 'member of the committee' and insert 'Member';

(3) Standing Order No. 94D (Scottish Grand Committee (ministerial statements)) be amended, as follows:

line 2, leave out 'Scottish Office minister or a Scottish law officer' and insert 'Minister of the Crown';

line 3, leave out 'member of the committee' and insert 'Member of the House';

line 10, leave out 'minister or law officer, as the case may be,' and insert 'Minister of the Crown';

line 12, after 'responsibilities', insert 'so far as they relate to Scotland, which, in the case of a Scottish law officer, shall be';

line 13, leave out 'thirteenth' and insert 'relevant';

line 17, after 'conclusion', insert 'either at an hour appointed by an order of the committee, for which a motion may be made without notice by a member of the government immediately before the commencement of such proceedings, on which motion the question shall be put forthwith, or, if no such motion is made,';

line 31, leave out 'minister or law officer' and insert 'Minister of the Crown';

line 32, leave out 'member of the committee' and insert 'Member of the House';

line 34, leave out 'such a minister or law officer';

(4) Standing Order No. 94E (Scottish Grand Committee (bills in relation to their principle)) be amended in line 52, at the end, by adding the following paragraphs:

'(7) At the conclusion of proceedings on consideration on report of a bill in respect of which a report has been made under paragraph (3) above, or on the order being read for the third reading of such a bill, a motion may be made by a member of the government (or in the case of a private Member's bill, by the Member in charge of the bill), "That the Bill be referred again to the Scottish Grand Committee"; and the question thereon shall be put forthwith and may be decided at any hour, though opposed:

Provided that such a motion may be made by a private Member only with the leave of the House.

(8) A bill so referred again to the Scottish Grand Committee shall be considered on a motion, "That the Committee has further considered the bill in relation to its principle"; and, when the committee has considered that question for a total of one and a half hours (whether on one or more than one day), the chairman shall put the question necessary to dispose of the motion, and shall then report accordingly to the House (or shall report that the committee has come to no resolution), without any further question being put thereon:

Provided that a member of the government may, immediately before the motion "That the Committee has further considered the bill in relation to its principle" is made, make without notice a motion to extend the time-limit specified in this paragraph; and the question on such motion shall be put forthwith.

(9) A bill in respect of which a report has been made under paragraph (8) above shall be ordered to be read the third time on a future day.

(10) When a motion shall have been made for the third reading of a bill to which paragraph (9) above applies, the question thereon shall be put forthwith and may be decided at any hour, though opposed.';

(5) Standing Order No. 94H (Scottish Grand Committee (sittings)) be amended, as follows:

line 55, after 'proceedings', insert 'or on the completion of the business appointed for consideration at that sitting, whichever is the earlier,';

(6) Standing Order No. 87 (Attendance of law officers and ministers in standing committees) be amended, in line 7, after 'than', by inserting 'a motion in the Scottish Grand Committee under Standing Order No. 94A (Scottish Grand Committee (composition and business)) or'; and

line 18, leave out 'morning sittings' and insert 'sittings at which oral evidence may be given';

line 19, after 'Scotland', insert 'in which case those sittings need not be held in the morning'.

HUMBER BRIDGE (DEBTS) BILL

Ordered,

That, if the Humber Bridge (Debts) Bill is committed to a Committee of the whole House, further proceedings on the Bill shall stand postponed; and that, as soon as the proceedings on any Resolution come to by the House on Humber Bridge (Debts) Bill [Money] have been concluded, this House will immediately resolve itself into a Committee on the Bill.—[Mr. Bates.]

PETITION

College Premises (Gloucester)

9.6 pm

Mr. Douglas French (Gloucester): I have the honour to present a petition with 3,450 signatures, the majority of which are those of people who live in the Oxstalls area in my constituency of Gloucester.

The petition seeks to save from sale, destruction and redevelopment the Oxstalls site, a purpose-built educational building which was a thriving part of higher education in Gloucester before the formation of the Cheltenham and Gloucester college of higher education and before the attempt by the college's governing body in Cheltenham to dispose of its premises in Gloucester altogether in order to spend the proceeds on its facilities in Cheltenham.

The petition states:

The humble Petition of the people of Gloucester sheweth

That Government intervention is necessary to prevent the sale of the college site at Oxstalls, Gloucester.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House require all necessary measures be speedily taken to ensure that the publicly funded college premises at Oxstalls, Gloucester are saved from demolition and reopened for the provision of vocational and technical courses, which otherwise are not available in this area, where unemployment has increased substantially.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Caribbean (Voluntary Resettlement)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Bates.]

9.8 pm

Mr. Bernie Grant (Tottenham): I am pleased that my Adjournment subject was chosen for this evening, Madam Deputy Speaker. This is a subject that has stirred quite a lot of debate among sections of the community, particularly among black and minority ethnic people. It is time that the House heard and understood what is being said. I welcome the opportunity of putting my case for resettlement of people in the Caribbean.

In principle, there is nothing new about the British Government providing financial assistance to people, including British citizens, who wish to resettle abroad. There have been various schemes for many years. For example, until 1988 the old supplementary benefits system provided the full cost of fares for applicants and their dependants who wished to resettle abroad. From August 1984, the scheme was restricted so that only British citizens were entitled to come within it. The maximum allowed per person was two years' worth of benefit.

According to information provided in a written answer, between 1972 and 1986 about 1,208 people were assisted under the supplementary benefits system, at a cost of £216,654.

Since 1988, when supplementary benefit was abolished and replaced by the social fund, no equivalent provision has been available. Since 1971, however, there has been limited provision available under the Immigration Act 1971. I refer to the scheme that has been run on behalf of the Government by International Social Services, which is located in Brixton. I wonder why the Government chose that location?

The scheme provides for those who are not British citizens to obtain the cost of fares for themselves and their families plus a small sum for the transportation of their effects. Between 1971 and 1975 about 2,545 people took advantage of the scheme, the overwhelming majority of them to return to the Caribbean region. The level of interest in the scheme, however, is far higher, with the number of initial inquiries reaching more than 900 in one particular year. I know from my constituency case work that many of those who inquire are turned down because they are British citizens. Clearly there is a gap in provision.

There are other schemes at a European level run by the International Organisation for Migration, the IOM. The IOM facilitates return to the country of origin. Its excellent programme for the return and reintegration of qualified African nationals began in 1983, and more than 1,250 people have been assisted, about half of them coming from the United Kingdom.

The project is now paid for by the European Union and thus, in part, by the British Government, who support the project. The IOM has a major centre that is located in London. Phase 3 of the project began in January 1995. It will assist a further 999 professionals to return to targeted jobs in targeted countries or regions. It will pay for their travel costs, the cost of professional equipment and various reintegration allowances.

Interestingly, the IOM also ran a programme last year to assist 40 professionals to return to Jamaica. Eleven places were filled by United Kingdom applicants. A larger scheme involving 50 places is likely to be run in 1996. It is hoped to expand the scheme to embrace the entire Caribbean in due course. I repeat that the Government fully support the scheme.

Today, the IOM's co-ordinator told me:

> "This programme has aroused a great deal of interest, and from our conversations with applicants we know that there are many who wish to return to Jamaica".

She continued:

> "We fully support your initiative"—

meaning my initiative—

> "in raising this issue, and we would be prepared to run a larger return programme if funding was available."

It is now time, I believe, for a thorough review of existing provision in this area and for a more realistic scheme to facilitate resettlement. It is my considered view that that would be in the interests of Britain, the Caribbean and most certainly of those who wish to resettle. There are, in other words, coinciding interests that would make such a scheme a logical development. I also believe that a suitable scheme could be developed at no additional cost to the public purse.

There is no doubt that there is increased interest in resettlement. People have already left for the Caribbean in considerable numbers; there is a sizeable drift of thousands of people back to the region. The Jamaican Government estimate that some 2,000 people returned from the UK to Jamaica in 1994. Barbados, Dominica, Antigua and Guyana are also popular destinations for returning residents. Organisations have been set up in Britain to assist those wishing to return, such as the Organisation of Returning Jamaicans and Associates, which is flourishing. It is interesting that the person who heads that organisation, Mark Le Ban, said to me only yesterday that its management committee is made up of Jamaican people aged between 30 and 45, so it is not only elderly people who wish to return.

Those who have already resettled—including those who were born in the region as well as those who were born in Britain—are the more prosperous, the retired or professionals with marketable skills, and entrepreneurs who can afford the travel and settlement costs involved. Many of us would dearly wish to resettle but do not have the means to do so. I have had a huge number of letters from such people from all over the country, including my constituents, who are desperately seeking help to return home. Many of the letters come from those in the caring professions, seeking my help for their clients in that regard. They include the elderly, many of whom came here in the 1950s and 1960s, at the specific request of the British Government, and never intended to remain here for long. However, the streets of Britain turned out not to be paved with gold and they were never in a position to return.

There are others who are chronically ill and never likely to work again in Britain who would prefer to return home to the Caribbean. Like the retired, they are frequently trapped by a benefit system that would cut them off from the benefits that they have earned if they were to go back. One of my constituents, for example, is now retired and longs to return to the Caribbean. If she did so, however, her state pension would be frozen at its current level and all benefits for her dependent disabled daughter would be curtailed, because they are payable only in Britain. Does anyone really give a hoot whether in such a case that young lady's benefit is paid in Britain or in the Caribbean?

The social security system is similarly inflexible so far as the long-term unemployed are concerned. I include here many single parents. These people know that they could advance themselves by returning to the Caribbean. However, they would find it hard to raise even the fare and would lose all benefits immediately if they left the United Kingdom. Given the high proportion of unemployed black workers who are long-term unemployed—some 60 per cent. as opposed to 44 per cent. in the white population—it makes little sense for the social security system to close off the option of return. It would not be so outrageous for such people, properly supervised, to be allowed benefit-equivalent sums for a few months to enable them to explore that option. Far higher sums are already spent on "make work" schemes here in Britain.

Another group frequently approaches me. It comprises people who are in work—often skilled or professional people—and who would like, at least for a time, to use their skills to assist in the development of countries with which they have a connection, such as those in the Caribbean, with a view to resettlement. There is currently no structure to channel the aspirations of that group, and there are many practical and financial obstacles.

As I have said, Caribbean and, possibly, other interested countries in the region would welcome a resettlement programme. For many years, the region has been the subject of a brain drain: its brightest and best sons and daughters have migrated, mostly to Britain, the United States or Canada. The absence of those groups has a destabilising effect on the countries concerned, and is now a major obstacle to economic development in the region.

Several Caribbean Governments—including Guyana, Jamaica and Barbados—are encouraging people to return by making special arrangements to assist returnees. They have set up units in their foreign Ministries to assist the smooth return of their citizens; they have also made tax changes that are favourable to returning residents, and issued calls for nationals to return to their countries. They know that there are major economic spin-offs resulting from resettlement.

As I have said, a suitable scheme to assist in resettlement could be developed if the will existed. Clearly, it would need to be the subject of detailed work, but it is possible to state the principles on which such a scheme would be organised. First, any scheme would of course be entirely voluntary: there can be no question of compulsion, or of rescinding anyone's British citizenship. Secondly, it must be a responsible scheme, properly managed on a case-by-case basis, to ensure that those who return do so with the best possible advice and support. Thirdly, the scheme must be adequate, ensuring that those who take advantage of it are properly provided for. I personally would not support any scheme that left people worse off than they are in the United Kingdom in terms of living standards, health care and housing in particular. Fourthly, the ultimate veto over eligibility to the scheme must rest with the designation countries themselves. In fact, they could well be given responsibility for administering the scheme. I have had discussions with most of the Governments involved, and they are willing to take that responsibility.

The scheme would have to be developed in full consultation with the black community here—particularly the Caribbean community—and with the designation countries. The advantages to Britain of such a scheme would be numerous. First, it is not generally in the interests of any country to have a substantial number of people in its midst who honestly do not want to be in that country. Secondly, even with the most generous scheme, there would be substantial financial advantages.

Those who approach me are all too often those who are most dependent on social benefits and health and welfare services—and, indeed, are most likely to be subsidised in various ways for their housing costs. They are also likely to be tenants of local authority housing. It would not take too much imagination to calculate a social-benefits equivalent sum for a given number of people each year that could be used as a basis for a budget for a resettlement scheme. Given the lower costs of living in the Caribbean—even after weekly benefit equivalent payments—substantial sums would be available for investment in housing, social care and health insurance. Many variations are possible.

The existing IOM scheme could well be developed substantially to cater for more of those in work who wish to return. If the costs of this part of the scheme came from the existing Overseas Development Administration budget, that would not be a bad thing: it would certainly be a more effective means of helping the countries concerned than the current practice of sending them highly paid consultants to perform key jobs there.

An enhanced resettlement programme would be in the interests of Britain, not least because it would be a recognition of the huge damage that Britain has inflicted on the Caribbean both now and in the past. Having created and exploited those countries through slavery and colonisation, Britain is abandoning them now that its economic interests lie elsewhere. Having stolen so much it would be more than fitting at this time in history for Britain to at least facilitate the return of those who wish to go back to those countries.

Some people have said that even to mention this matter is to cause damage to race relations in this country, and that to argue for a resettlement scheme is to give in to racism. I have even been accused of adopting the agenda of fascists and racists. Even the Secretary of State for the Home Department told me recently that he feared that an enhanced resettlement scheme would make black people feel unwelcome here. That is rich, coming from someone who has set back race relations by at least 20 years in the relatively short time that he has been in office. I am not convinced by these arguments. This is about creating positive choices for black people, about setting our own agenda for once, and about remembering where we came from.

Some black people will want to stay in Britain, and the fight for racial equality will continue. I shall continue to play my part in that struggle. It is true that some people want to leave because they are sick and tired of the racism that they face in this country. They are fed up with fighting racism, and I see no reason why they should be forced to do so. Others do not feel at home in Britain and some people despair of the predominant values and culture of this society and fear for their children growing up in such a climate. Others simply wish to return to live with their families and, of course, that feeling is more common nowadays because of the absurdity of current immigration rules which keep families apart. I hope that the Minister will address that point when he tries to sum up at the end of the debate.

Against the background of all that has been done to black people historically, the House has no right to deny those people a choice about their future. We know what is happening to black people at the moment. We know about the tragic events less than a week ago in Brixton where there was a tragic death, the second in six months, of a young black person at the hands of the police. I understand that that young man was cornered in a park. He had a knife and he threw it away. The police then descended on that young person and beat him very badly. That was witnessed by several people, and I understand that the Police Complaints Authority is investigating. That was a tragic event by any stretch of the imagination. It is similar to what happened to Rodney King, and I am sure that the Minister and some of the police officers who were around would say, "What happened to Rodney King was terrible". It is my understanding, and witnesses will eventually come forward to prove it, that that is precisely what happened to young Wayne Douglas in Brixton. What concerns a number of people is that the police refuse to learn from their mistakes in the past. They should automatically have suspended the officers concerned on full pay and had an immediate inquiry into the matter.

The media played a part in this notorious affair because they should have given some prominence to yet another death within six months at the hands of the same police force and through the use of side-handled batons. Those two young black males are the first people to die as a result of the introduction of the side-handled batons that were imported from the United States of America—the same batons that killed Rodney King.

We have heard no one mention anything about that at all. I asked the Home Secretary a question on the occasion of the first death. He gave me an answer to the effect that it cost too much to find out how many people had died as a result of the introduction of the side-handled batons law. We now know—and I will tell the House—that two young black men have died as a result of such batons. They are the first to die. That in itself should require some statement from the Home Secretary. Perhaps the Minister replying to this debate will deal with that point, but I doubt it as he is involved as part of the race card that the Government are playing in relation to all these matters.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): On that point, does my hon. Friend agree that one of the most deplorable aspects of events in Brixton is that, far from the mainstream media considering issues such as the deaths in custody or the use of side-handled batons, they have sought scapegoats such as Rudy Narayan, The Voice or the Caribbean Times newspapers? The mainstream press is criticising the ethnic press simply for printing the facts when the mainstream press would not. Would it not be more appropriate if those same papers exposed some of the issues that my hon. Friend has talked about in relation to police brutality?

Mr. Grant: I am indebted to my hon. Friend for that intervention because I had missed that point. I am glad that she reminded me of it. She is absolutely right. Far from looking for the culprits who caused this position to occur, the mainstream press has looked for a number of scapegoats, including Rudy Narayan, who represents no one except himself and who is not a voice that people in Brixton follow. Poor Rudy will probably end up in the courts and be charged for inciting riots when, if the truth were known, he could not incite himself to riot on any occasion. Such scapegoating, and the attempts of the Government and their cohorts to scapegoat people who are trying just to bring to the public's attention a serious situation in the black community, are deplorable.

As I was saying, the House has no right to deny people a choice about their future. Against the background of all that is happening and has been done to black people historically, the House owes it to them to allow them to exercise that choice. In raising this matter, I speak on behalf of many people in Britain. I hope that the Minister will carefully consider what I have said and agree at least to commission a study of how the current very limited resettlement arrangements could be suitably expanded.

I had a meeting with the Home Secretary and the Minister on this point. The Home Secretary felt that he could not support the scheme because, to put it in his words, if he were to do so, it might encourage elements to believe that black people were not welcome in this country. The Home Secretary went on to say that black people were welcome here, that they were worthy people and that they have had made a substantial contribution to Britain. That was the first time that I had heard that particular Home Secretary make such remarks. I am pleased and indebted that he found it necessary to make them. I wish that he would make them more often.

Ms Abbott: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Grant: Most certainly.

Ms Abbott rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. Before the hon. Lady launches off, may I remind her that she is addressing me and should face the Chair?

Ms Abbott: Of course, Madam Deputy Speaker. Does my hon. Friend agree that, welcome though it is to hear the Home Secretary say those positive things about race relations, they come ill from someone who is promoting the Asylum and Immigration Bill, which is profoundly racist and aims to criminalise, not just immigrants and asylum seekers, but black African people as a whole, especially in relation to its provisions for passport checks on employees? Someone, although not myself, might accuse him of hypocrisy in that regard.

Mr. Grant: Yes, again my hon. Friend is right on the mark—absolutely correct.

Only this morning the Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) and myself were all at the first sitting of the Standing Committee on the Asylum and Immigration Bill. Any independent observer, anyone who had not been nobbled by the Home Secretary and his people, would look at that Bill and see that the motivation behind it was clearly racist.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but the general burden of his Adjournment debate is about people leaving this country, not people coming to it. I think that he should return to that.

Mr. Grant: I am always willing to take guidance from you, Madam Deputy Speaker. But for some people, in order to leave the country they first have to come into it. I am concerned both with people coming in and with people going out; some people cannot do one without the other. However, I accept your general point, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I mention the Bill because it has a clear bearing on black and minority ethnic communities here. That is because the Home Secretary will require employers to ask people to provide documents to establish their right to be in this country—and we know from experience that the people who are asked for the documents will be black people.

That happens all the time. It happens when black people go to Europe. It even happens with groups of schoolchildren. The immigration officers in France, Germany and Belgium allow all the white children to go through, but they stop the black kids and ask them for special explanations about why they should be able to walk through like everyone else.

The Minister may pooh-pooh that idea, but if he does so, it shows that he is totally ignorant about the effects of his and the European Union's policies on black British citizens. If he adopts the attitude that that is a load of nonsense, and that everything is rosy in Britain, it simply exposes his personal racism in that connection. I will listen carefully to what he says, because a reasoned argument has been put forward, and I want him to address the points that have been raised.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that perhaps the hon. Gentleman did not mean to do so, but he rather gave the impression that he was accusing another hon. Member of racism, which would definitely be unparliamentary.

Mr. Grant: I withdraw any such remark, Madam Deputy Speaker. Of course the Minister is not a racist. He may act as though he were one, but I know that he is not. On that basis, I withdraw the remark.

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): I think that the whole House is following my hon. Friend's arguments carefully. Does he agree that, bearing in mind all the matters that have been raised during today's lobby on the Asylum and Immigration Bill, and also by himself in this important debate, even at this late stage the Government could refer the Bill to a Special Standing Committee, where all those points could be raised?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry, but this is going way beyond the subject of the Adjournment debate. I must ask the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz), the Front-Bench spokesman, not to lead his hon. Friend astray in that way.

Mr. Grant: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for getting us back on the rails.

We shall of course fight the Asylum and Immigration Bill thoroughly in Committee. If the Minister thinks that he is in for an easy ride he had better think again, because there will be substantial opposition both inside and outside the Committee. For the various reasons that I have outlined, there is a need for people to be given the option of returning to the Caribbean. I have also stated that the Caribbean Governments would welcome a scheme that encourages people to return. In fact, the president of Guyana recently told me that he wrote to the Prime Minister and asked him to let Guyana have Britain's unemployed skilled workers, because there was plenty of work for them in Guyana. I understand that the Prime Minister replied that because of the social security regulations, it would not be possible to do that.

I believe that imaginative schemes could be developed to give people hope and to assist young people, graduates and skilled and qualified workers who feel that there is a glass ceiling through which they cannot break. Those people could be given an opportunity of a life—or part of a life—in another area of the world. They could benefit that area, and also benefit themselves.

I have proved this evening that there are already two schemes running. The first is run by the Government, and contains within it the principle of return from this country to the Caribbean and to other countries of the world. The other scheme is run by the IOM, which has a centre here in Queen Anne's Gate in London, and is supported and financed by the Government. There are no reasons why the Government should not extend the existing schemes along the lines that I have suggested.

If the Minister dares to ask me why the British taxpayer should pay for this scheme, I will remind him that a Conservative Government in the 1950s and 1960s sent people to the Caribbean and used British taxpayers' money to recruit bus drivers, London Transport workers, nurses and others. The Minister of Labour at that time was Enoch Powell, who I am sure the Minister has heard of. The Government at that time paid for people to come here, and now some of those people wish to return. For various reasons, they might not have the means to do so. We are suggesting that the Government should use taxpayers' money to do that. Such a scheme would result in savings to the Treasury and, for no other reason, the Government should support it.

9.42 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Timothy Kirkhope): I very much regret the fact that the hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Grant) has again decided to raise the question of voluntary repatriation. I noted his speech this evening, and the contributions which came from the Opposition Front Bench from the hon. Members for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) and for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott).

The only saving grace of the debate is that it gives me an opportunity to restate the Government's total opposition to any scheme which actively encourages people who are lawfully settled here to return to their country of origin. Nobody who has a legal right to live in this country should be under any pressure to leave. The Government are not in the business of advocating that our own citizens emigrate to the country where their parents, grandparents or ancestors were born. I deeply resent the remarks of the hon. Member for Tottenham about my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, who has done so much work to improve race relations.

[Interruption.] Regardless of what the hon. Gentleman may say from a sedentary position, Britain has greatly improved race relations, and I am proud of that fact and want it to continue.

I am also saddened by the hon. Gentleman's determination to try to use tonight's debate to provide his own conclusions about the recent disturbances in Brixton before an inquiry has been completed. The Government condemn what they see as a violent minority who attack police officers and property and who attempt to besmirch the good name of the vast majority of the people of Brixton, who are decent, caring and law-abiding citizens and want to remain that way.

I firmly believe that any measure designed to encourage repatriation or emigration by members of the ethnic community would do untold damage to race relations. It is the persistent taunt of thugs and racists that black or Asian people should "go home". If the Government set up a scheme actively promoting repatriation or immigration of ethnic minorities as a good thing, that would be to endorse the racists' odious views. I do not believe that the House would want that.

The Government are committed to creating a fair and integrated society. We are working hard to reduce racial discrimination.

Mr. Bernie Grant: Rubbish.

Mr. Kirkhope: I repeat: we are working hard to reduce racial discrimination, to tackle racial violence and to ensure that everyone, irrespective of the colour of his skin, enjoys the same opportunities in this country. Good race relations need to be constantly worked at; we all, including the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends, know that. Any Government-sponsored measure that implied to ethnic minorities that they were unwelcome could only have a detrimental effect on race relations. There is absolutely no place for such proposals in our work.

I know that the hon. Member for Tottenham has a number of proposals. He raised them with the Home Secretary in my presence on 6 December. As he has said, the Home Secretary was certainly not persuaded that the hon. Gentleman's proposals deserved further consideration. He does not intend to change the present arrangements. As the hon. Gentleman has also said, the Government fund a small humanitarian scheme under which people with few savings—not British citizens—can be given basic financial assistance to return overseas, when it is in their best interests to do so and they wish to go. The assistance is limited to the travel fare and the cost of transporting a small number of personal possessions.

About 60 people a year benefit from the scheme. They are mainly elderly people, often without close family ties here; and most of them return to Jamaica. The important point is that only those with very low savings of less than £3,000 are eligible for full assistance. The scheme is low key and the assistance is limited. That of course is deliberate. The scheme does not set out to persuade people to leave Britain. It seeks to help those whose hearts are set on returning home, where they have satisfactory future arrangements and the only significant obstacle is the cost of the travel. We see no reason to change these arrangements, and we have recently agreed to extend the current scheme for a further five years.

I turn now to some of the suggestions that the hon. Member for Tottenham has made. He has said that he thinks that British citizens should be eligible for help. Our objection to that is straightforward: we do not think it appropriate for the Government to pay for the removal of British citizens to a foreign country. There would in any event be numerous practical problems in administering such a scheme, which would be wide open to abuse and which would attract all sorts of opportunists to apply. Effective administration would be difficult and expensive and the Government can see no good purpose in pursuing such ideas further.

Another of the hon. Member's ideas is that young unemployed people of Afro-Caribbean descent but who were born in the United Kingdom should be encouraged to emigrate to Africa and the Caribbean. He appears seriously to think that the Government should pay for such young people to leave our country. We value our young people in this country. [Interruption.] The hon. Member may laugh but we value our young people. I find his idea not only outlandish but offensive. I cannot believe that sending young people to a country of which they probably have little no or experience would help them in the least.

We take the problem of unemployed people seriously. That is why we are committed to having a dynamic economy in which jobs are created for them, not destroyed. The Labour party would, as we all know, destroy jobs through its schemes and ideas. The way to help unemployed young people is to train and educate them so that they can find jobs. We are trying to do that more and more. The answer is not to send them back to the country from which their ancestors came. A Government-funded emigration programme is emphatically not the answer.

Mr. Grant: The Minister says fine words about how the Government want to do things about unemployment. Among black young people aged between 15 and 25 in Tottenham, unemployment is 65 per cent. What are the Government doing to get those people jobs?

Mr. Kirkhope: The hon. Member is well aware of the schemes that the Government employ to try to give jobs to, and provide training for, young people. There are schemes operating in his area that he surely must be aware of. He should give credit to the people involved with that. Some of those people are paid directly by the Government, some are indirectly paid and some are voluntary workers. He knows well of the schemes. I will be delighted to discuss the matter further with him at another time. The Government are concerned that young people should have jobs in this country and not be encouraged to leave the country.

What would the receiving country think of us if we sought to export young people in that way? We have no information to suggest that those countries would be keen on that.

Mr. Grant: I have.

Mr. Kirkhope: We have no evidence of that. I would be extremely surprised if they were as keen as the hon. Gentleman suggests.

The BBC "Newsnight" coverage of the issue on 6 December made a helpful contribution to rational debate. What I found especially striking were the stories of old people who had visited their countries of origin in the West Indies after decades away and their bewilderment at how much things, and they themselves, had changed. Many saw their lives clearly now as being firmly based in Britain. They did not want to return. If that is the case for people of their generation, who were born abroad, how much more true would it be for people born in the United Kingdom who have British attitudes and presumptions about life? Life in the West Indies could come as a cultural shock—and not inevitably a pleasant one—for them.

DAMAGED ORIGINAL

The hon. Member referred to a number of other schemes that involve financial assistance with the travel and other costs of movements between one country and another. I acknowledge the presence of those schemes. There is, for instance, a European scheme under the Lomé convention, to which I think the hon. Gentleman alluded, that encourages, as a form of overseas aid to Jamaica, young Jamaican professionals to take up posts which would otherwise be filled by foreign experts. That scheme aims to boost the Jamaican economy.

Similarly, the International Organisation for Migration assists refugee and asylum seeker movements, usually under the auspices of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. I must emphasise again the limited nature of such schemes and the Government's belief that they should and must remain limited.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary told the hon. Member for Tottenham when we met him on 6 December, the Government are totally opposed to encouraging voluntary repatriation, let alone emigration. To do so would send out all the wrong messages to ethnic minority communities and, worse still, play into the hands of racists. That is well recognised by many influential sections within those communities and I am pleased that they have not been slow to criticise the hon. Member for doing so. I emphasise that the Government's view is that everybody in Britain, regardless of race or creed, should have a fair chance. They do not think that there should be measures that discriminate between races, as the hon. Member's suggestions seem to.

The hon. Member has long been interested in this subject, but I simply do not agree that the extension to the current very limited arrangements that he has in mind would provide a solution to race relations problems or necessarily help the individuals with whom he says he is concerned. The way to improve race relations is positive participation by all ethnic minority groups in British society, so that they are not socially excluded or disadvantaged in any aspect of life here. This country is greatly strengthened by the different ethnic groups that make up our population. We have all gained from their commitment to Britain's success in every field: economic; social; artistic; and sporting. I totally reject the suggestion that the Government should actively encourage members of those communities to leave this country because they would be better off elsewhere.

Ms Abbott: As my hon. Friend the Member for Tottenham (Mr. Grant) is aware, I do not support his scheme for repatriation in the shape that he proposes. However, the Minister fails to understand that my hon. Friend's proposals have struck a tremendous chord in the black community. That is a symptom of the deep alienation, disaffection and unhappiness that many black people of all ages feel about their lives in this country. I have listened carefully to the Minister but much of what he has said reeks of hypocrisy. Moreover, he clearly fails to understand the reality of life for many black people in this country.

Mr. Kirkhope: The hon. Lady is entitled to her point of view. She says that the hon. Gentleman's proposals have struck a chord with the black community, but they have been received with great unhappiness in many sections of the ethnic minority community in this country. I believe that the Government's view on this matter reflects the majority's view. It also reflects the view that race relations are important to the Government and the country as a whole.

Mr. Grant: I am aware that a group representing the Asian community, and one or two people from the West Indian community, went to see the Home Secretary recently. The West Indian Standing Conference voted almost to a person in support of my scheme. My scheme has nothing to do with the Indian sub-continent, India, Pakistan, Bangladesh or Sri Lanka; it concerns the Caribbean. Which Caribbean groups support the Government against my proposals?

Mr. Kirkhope: I shall not get into a contest with the hon. Gentleman on which groups support his proposal. As far as I know, he has been unable to persuade the Opposition Front Bench, although the presence tonight of the Opposition spokesman for the inner cities seems to show some support from the Labour party for his ideas. The Government do not support his ideas and have no intention of doing so. I have no idea whether his proposals might become Labour party policy. He must discuss that with his Front Bench spokesmen.

Tonight, I invite the hon. Gentleman to join me in pursuing policies that promote good race relations rather than those that he put forward, which might jeopardise them.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at two minutes to Ten o'clock.

House of Commons

Wednesday 20 December 1995

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Adjournment (Christmas)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House, at its rising today, do adjourn till Tuesday 9 January.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

9.34 am

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): On this last day before the Christmas recess, may I wish you, Madam Speaker, a very happy Christmas? Some of us believe that you do an excellent job in the Chair.

The Leader of the House may recall that, during the Prime Minister's speech on the Loyal Address, I raised the issue of the amount of money and effort that Labour and Liberal Democrat local authorities were expending to put forward arguments, when votes are taken at schools, against their opting for grant-maintained status. The Prime Minister said that the matter would be looked at. What steps are being taken? In the county of Devon, there is constant proof that the local education authority and county council employees are making a considerable effort to urge and support those who wish to resist grant-maintained status. Examples in Devon of the great success that grant-maintained status has brought about include Colyton grammar school. It is not right that ratepayers' money should be used for the political purpose of resisting grant-maintained status.

Will the Leader of the House discuss with the Secretary of State for Education and Employment whether the Government have considered the possibility that, where sums have been expended for that purpose, they should be surcharged against the councillors for unnecessary expenditure that does not form part of a local authority's normal expenditure? The matter is of considerable importance. I need not spend more time on it, and I should be pleased if, in the period before the House reassembles, it could be looked at much more fully.

9.37 am

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): In the spirit of Christmas, may I too wish you, Madam Speaker, a happy Christmas and new year? If next year I sometimes feel that I am not catching your eye, I shall bear in mind the fact that I wished you a happy Christmas at the appropriate time.

I wish only briefly to mention what occurred last night: once again, the Government were defeated and humiliated. It is important, however, and it would be useful, to have a proper statement arising from that defeat. So far, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has merely made an inadequate statement on a point of order. The Government must now work on the assumption that the political arithmetic is going against them. They would be wrong to work on any other assumption, as their majority is likely to go down next year, and they will be faced time and again with the same difficulties as last night.

How much better it would be if the Government resolved that matter by going to the country and letting it decide, rather than trying to linger on until the last possible moment, despite all the setbacks and humiliations. It is time for a general election, and I hope that it will come sooner rather than later.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): How many times were the Labour Government of the day, whom the hon. Gentleman supported, defeated in Parliament between October 1974 and 1979? Did they not soldier on as long as they could?

Mr. Winnick: Conservative Members have often told us that that was unfortunate and undignified, and that the Labour Government should have gone to the country. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman has said the same. Regardless of what happened in the 1970s, surely it is time for Conservative Members to practise what they preach, given that we have been lectured so often by them. Let the country decide sooner rather than later.

I must raise two other matters before we go into the recess. Not long ago, I applied under Standing Order No. 20 for an emergency debate on cold weather payments, especially for those pensioners on income support. It was not successful.

It is extremely unfortunate that, despite the extremely harsh weather that we have been experiencing, so few pensioners who would have been eligible to receive what is only a modest sum—£8.50 a week—have received it. I checked the latest information with the Library. Out of 55 weather stations—I do not know how the country is divided up and why there are 55, but so be it—the trigger mechanism worked in only seven. What conditions are necessary for it to work?

The Leader of the House will understand all this, because he was involved with the appropriate Department for some time. The weather has to be freezing for seven days and seven nights continuously. If it is intensely cold or freezing for three, four or even six days, as it has been in many parts of the country, but there is then a change in the weather, the payments are not made. It is a daft scheme, which deprives so many elderly people on the lowest incomes of extra money to keep themselves warm.

In the main, it is rare for pensioners to get into fuel debt—that applies as much to other Members' constituents as to mine—simply because they are frightened of receiving a bill that they cannot afford to pay. They do not keep the heating on as much as they should, or as we would do because we have the income to do so. They might heat only one room, or go to the library or some other public place during the day to save fuel. It is a terrible situation, and that is why I applied for an emergency debate and why I have kept on about the subject.

As the Leader of the House is aware, I am sure, percentage-wise more elderly people die here in the winter months than in many other European countries. One can only come to the conclusion that, because elderly people on low incomes suffer so much misery and hardship, they put their health at risk—they risk hypothermia and related conditions. The emergency payment should be made to all those who would otherwise be eligible. As I said, out of the 55 weather stations scattered around the country, the mechanism has worked in only seven.

Finally, the Leader of the House may be aware that, following the terrible tragedy of the headmaster who was knifed to death, I asked at the first opportunity in the House—on the following Monday—whether it would be possible for the Government urgently to consider legislation to toughen up on knives. They have responded in some ways. I am not merely criticising; I am pleased with that response.

A private Member's Bill—the Offensive Weapons Bill—has been tabled, and there is no reason why I, along with my hon. Friends, should not support it. Obviously, we will have to wait until Second Reading and the Committee stage, and I hope that the Bill receives a Second Reading. The Bill and the response of the House are the attitude that the general public want.

In a dignified and courageous statement last weekend, Mrs. Lawrence, the widow of the head who was murdered, gave an interview to the Press Association. She spoke of her family's deep sorrow, for her children and herself. She also said that she would like it to be more difficult for knives to be purchased.

At business questions last Thursday, I asked whether, rather than the Home Secretary taking a confrontational attitude to the Opposition over this—although the Leader of the House denied that that was the case—the Home Secretary could meet my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) before the Second Reading of the Offensive Weapons Bill to find out whether any agreement could be reached on the purchase of knives.

I understand all the counter-arguments—what would happen about bread knives, and would one stop people buying knives for legitimate sporting purposes?—but we should be aware that there is a knife culture among youths in certain areas. It is almost as if a knife is a part of their dress when they go out. Fortunately for the safety of the general public, the knives are not usually used, but their use for criminal purposes is increasing.

At about the time that Philip Lawrence was knifed to death, a security officer at an Asda store in Newcastle was also knifed to death when he courageously went to the aid of two female employees. We should not forget him, either. Those two men exhibited the highest courage. They could have saved their own lives by acting differently; instead, they lost their lives.

The Government must understand that, yes, we want to tighten up on sentencing, for which there is a strong case—hence my support for the private Member's Bill—but that there is scope to make it more difficult for knives to be purchased, despite all the difficulties. Fortunately, unlike the United States, we have pretty tough restrictions on guns. In some respects, I would like them to be tougher. Fortunately, one cannot simply purchase a gun.

I hope that the Home Secretary, with my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn, will be able to find out whether there is scope for tightening up the sale of knives, and will take legal advice and so forth, so that one will not be able to buy the most ghastly knives in shops in central London or by mail order. The weapons might not be intended for criminal purposes, but what guarantee do we have of that? I hope that the Leader of the House will pass on my views to the appropriate Ministers.

9.47 am

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): May I join colleagues on both sides of the House in wishing you a happy Christmas, Madam Speaker. I hope that you will take my word for it that no analogy is intended in the fact that I intend to begin by mentioning the royal yacht. I often likened my wife, when I married her, to a sleek racing craft. After 26 years of marriage, I now say that the cargo has shifted a bit.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: It has in my hon. Friend's case, too.

Mr. Field: Yes, it has in my case, too, as my hon. Friend so rightly points out.

I have a slight sense of déjà vu, since we began the year with a campaign for the royal yacht—or I certainly did—and I seem to be ending the year with one. Having said our prayers for the royal family, what more appropriate way is there to start?

The BBC is running a programme on that magnificent vessel tonight. As she is a riveted ship, I do not understand why we cannot keep her in commission for many years to come. She is quite capable of being repaired and kept in good order and, although in her present state she requires a large crew, the manning levels could be reduced with modern machinery.

I hope that I may yet win that important battle because, as has been said many times, the yacht is very much part of the fabric of our nation. There could be no finer sight than the Heads of State embarking on that magnificent vessel to celebrate the D-day landings. One Head of State, the President of the United States, chose not to travel on the royal yacht, and went aboard a grey-funnel ship of his own nation—it did not look the part. If Heads of State of the major countries throughout Europe voted with their feet and stayed aboard the royal yacht, that would be a good way of influencing the Government.

I should like to keep with the slightly salty flavour, and mention last night's fishing debate. I was rather surprised to receive a letter from the Liberal Democrat-controlled council of the Isle of Wight asking me to vote against the measure. In the right-hand corner of the council's notepaper, there is a silhouette of the Isle of Wight, over which it says that it is a "region of Europe".

The Liberal Democrat Members seem to have gone off to Christmas rather early. I wonder if some of the Opposition Members who are present could search behind the Benches to see if there are any Liberal Democrat Members in the Chamber—it seems rather bereft of their presence. Perhaps Liberal Democrat Members have decided that the United Kingdom has become a region of Europe; they are so Brussels-barmy that they have probably gone there for the day.

It is extraordinary for the Liberal Democrat-controlled council on the Isle of Wight to tell everyone that the Isle of Wight is a region of Europe. It even went to the extent of minting its own coins, on the back of which it said that the Isle of Wight ecu would be introduced in 1996. That same council says that we should vote against the fisheries policy of the EC.

I went to the trouble of telephoning the chairman and secretary of the Isle of Wight fishermen's association, who also approached me about last night's debate. I asked them what had changed since I last voted on the issue in the House. Fisheries policy is, of course, a contentious matter, particularly for Members of Parliament who represent fishermen who fish in the western approaches. The chairman and secretary could not tell me what had changed in terms of the Isle of Wight, but they suggested that I contact a fisherman named Ray Hayles.

I telephoned Ray Hayles, and asked him what had happened. He said, "It is the general conservation view—we are concerned that there are more Frenchmen and Spaniards, and fewer fish." I told him that I understood that, but that the Government had reduced the number of fishermen who can come from the rest of the EC into British waters. I said that I wanted to know what had changed in relation to the Isle of Wight.

I took the trouble to ask staff in the House of Commons Library what had changed, and they more or less confirmed that nothing had changed. There is an incredible perception that hon. Members were voting to determine a policy, but the vote was taken on the motion to "take note", and had little influence. The vote was not, as many fishermen thought, on a motion to take Britain out of the EC fisheries policy. The vote did not make one ha'p'orth of difference to the fishermen of the Isle of Wight. As all hon. Members have long since realised, reality and fiction in the House are certainly not bedfellows.

One of my favourite subjects, which I first raised when I entered the House in 1987, involves light dues. The Government have done remarkably well in abolishing the dock labour scheme. There has been a fantastic increase in the amount of trade to our ports, which were privatised under the trust port legislation. The one remaining problem is the considerable cost of light dues when bringing a ship to Great Britain.

Even more pernicious, all constituents pay tax to the Treasury, but my constituents in some parts of the Solent also have to pay a tax to Trinity house for travelling backwards and forwards to the Isle of Wight. The position is anomalous: in the eastern Solent, the buoyage is controlled by the Queen's habourmaster—the Royal Navy—and no light dues are charged, but in the western Solent, Trinity house controls the buoyage, and has to charge light dues on the ferries coming to and from the Isle of Wight. Just outside Cowes harbour are two buoys which do not contribute to safe navigation in and out of the harbour, but their presence means that the red-funnel service to Southampton from Cowes has to pay light dues for the buoys, as do all day-trip vessel operators, both on the island and travelling from the mainland.

There was a recent inquiry in the western Solent, because Associated British Ports wanted to take over that section of the Solent, the channel up from the Needles, which is unregulated—there is no authority for it, which is extraordinary. ABP proposed that it should become the navigation authority, and I thought that, with some qualifications, that would be an ideal way of easing Trinity house out of the Solent.

Associated British Ports has offered to take over the buoyage in the Solent from Trinity house, but the proposal has been rejected for a variety of reasons. I find it difficult to understand why my constituents should be placed at a disadvantage compared with those of the rest of the United Kingdom by having to pay an additional form of taxation just because they live on an offshore island.

We have also encountered problems over the years with dredging for aggregate in the Solent. I am pleased that both the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Crown estate have given me a guarantee that in future there will be no renewal or extension of licences for the dredging of aggregate in the Solent.

It is remarkable that one of the objections to ABP's proposal, which included maintenance dredging in the Needles channel, was that it should not be allowed to dredge. That objection came from the Isle of Wight council—the same council that refused to support me against New Forest district council dredging the shingle bank to replenish Hurst spit. That is an extraordinary example of environmental double standards, which seem to infect not only Isle of Wight council policy but some of its councillors.

There have been difficulties in Solent waters in recent years due to sewage pollution. One oyster bed has been closed in the western Solent this year. The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has kindly agreed that we should meet the fish experts at Weymouth, which we shall do in the new year. When we have done that, we shall go to see the Environment Minister to discuss the problem of sewer outfalls. Southern Water tried hard to get the Solent waters redesignated; I am pleased to say that Her Majesty's Government resisted that proposal.

All the requirements of the urban waste water directives will have to be met. That will involve building a new sewerage plant with a long sea outfall at Sandown. Local fishermen and the tourist board are rightly concerned that there should be a cast-iron guarantee that the effluent will not wash up on the beaches to create the problems that have occurred in other parts of the country. It is proposed that the sewerage plant and outfall system should serve the whole of the Isle of Wight—or at least a great proportion of it. I hope that the Lord President will take note of my remarks, as it is a tortuous problem; we have suffered for many years from the inadequate Victorian sewerage system around the coast of the United Kingdom.

As a result of water privatisation and EC directives, there has been a massive investment and clean-up. We won some blue flags for our beaches on the Isle of Wight. However, one problem is that the scheme for Ventnor has been delayed; Ventnor has a serious problem, because it has an inadequate system. It was to have a new system, but that has been scrapped because of the redesignation of the seas off the north side of the island, the Solent. I hope that ministerial pressure will be exerted on Southern Water to ensure that it gets on with the scheme, and to guarantee that it is effective.

I now turn to the subject of education on the Isle of Wight and our standard spending assessments. The capping limits for the Isle of Wight council have been raised, and in March a whole series of bids will come in for various functions of the new unitary council. However, a substantial body of opinion on the island is encouraged to believe that the Government have not properly funded education on the Isle of Wight. I take great exception to that, because the settlement we have just had is more than adequate, taken with the savings made by having a unitary authority that we expect from—indeed, were promised by—the Isle of Wight council.

[Mr. Field]

The settlement should be more than adequate to ensure that we have a quality education service on the island. We understand that it is more expensive than most other education authorities, because it is a three-tier system. Given the small size of our population, education will always be more expensive per capita.

I support, and align myself with, the chairman of the education committee on the council. The council should spend all the money available on education in the island, which is mostly good. Obviously, education is our future, not just for the Isle of Wight, but for our nation, too.

On the island, we have had a serious problem with the British Medical Association. It has, on three occasions, run some serious scare stories about the island's health service. The most recent was last week—the suggestion in a television programme that St. Mary's hospital was to become a cottage hospital, and that the single-handed specialties were to be removed from the Isle of Wight.

The story suggested that, in future, we would have to travel to the mainland to have those surgical operations that have hitherto been available on the Isle of Wight. In fact, those operations have been available on the Isle of Wight only since the funding improvements and the general expansion of the health service by the Government.

On Sunday, with my wife, the chairman of the Isle of Wight council and the high sheriff, I toured St. Mary's hospital. We started at 9 am, and my wife and I finished our tour just after 6 pm. I was told by the chief executive that there was absolutely no truth in the programme on the BBC that emanated from the BMA. The chairman has written to the single-handed specialists in ophthalmology, oral surgery, and ear, nose and throat to say that the suggestion in the programme is not true, and that he is awaiting the results of an advertisement for a cardiac consultant on the island.

We have had problems, as my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will know, with community care and its funding on the Isle of Wight. I was shocked to be told on my rounds on Sunday that there was a proposal for the closure of the Totland ward. That ward is operated by the Isle of Wight Community Healthcare NHS trust, and a little lady there told me how much it meant to her for respite care.

The Leader of the House is ideally qualified, because of his previous ministerial offices, to understand the great conundrums one faces in trying to deliver community care. For example, Margaret Condon, who was a patient in that ward and is a great supporter of mine, was worried that she would no longer receive assistance from that facility. The hospital is trying to contract out the service to private nursing homes, because of the numbers involved and the staff ratios. The next person I spoke to, whom I had never met before, was Alfred Chapman, who is 91 and blind. His wife is blind as well. He told me that he thought the time was coming when he and his wife might need a little assistance at home from social services.

Those two examples show the diversity in people's needs and requirements of the health service. That chap of 91, blind and living with his wife, has hitherto been completely independent at home, and has come in for respite care because he had a problem with his chest and was feeling down. On the other hand, Margaret Condon, who is considerably younger, relies on that type of care all the time.

We will have a unitary authority, and we have some sense of realism about the delivery of community care on the island. We also expect the decision—which I have long campaigned for—on the amalgamation of the Isle of Wight Community Healthcare NHS trust with St. Mary's Hospital (Isle of Wight) trust. We are told that that will save nearly £500,000 per annum.

I hope that the council will not continue to insist on running an entirely separate organisation, but will join in one mutual organisation with shared services, so that we can ensure the greatest efficiency and the most money for patient care. In the meantime, I hope that the Leader of the House will support the staff and the rest of us to ensure that Totland ward does not close.

There is concern about the target formula from the Department of Health—

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is not the House suffering a selfish abuse of the procedure? The understanding is that these Adjournment debates are limited to three hours and that each of us should show some kind of restraint. Parading constituency problem after constituency problem is not a proper use of a Wednesday morning.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): I have to say to the hon. Gentleman that the hon. Member who is speaking is entirely in order, in relation to the subject before us.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Tedious repetition.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There has been no repetition. If there had been, I would have intervened.

Mr. Banks: Well, it has been very tedious.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would have intervened had there been repetition. I imagine that the hon. Member who is speaking will notice how many other hon. Members wish to contribute.

Mr. Field: If the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) had had the courtesy to intervene, I would have given way to him. I hope that he would have accepted—because he is reasonable—that I have a cogent explanation for my speech this morning.

Since I came to the House in 1987, I have never made an entire speech about the Isle of Wight. I am the only Member who represents an entire county in its own right, and we have a number of problems. Not least, I am the only Member who represents more than 100,000 constituents, and this is the first occasion on which I have endeavoured, and am endeavouring, to make a comprehensive speech about the Isle of Wight. I am sorry if Opposition Members find it tedious: I am sure that my constituents do not. I can tell the hon. Member for Linlithgow that I do not intend to have a similar marathon in the future, having made this speech.

However, I have a number of other, separate points that I intend to raise this morning.

Mr. Banks: Tut-tut.

Mr. Field: The tut-tutting from Opposition Members would be more reasonable if they understood the considerable pressure and work load that having more than 100,000 constituents brings.

I shall continue. Sadly, this week, a policeman was stabbed on the Isle of Wight. I am pleased to say that his injuries will not cause him to be off work for long, but I am sure that we wish him a speedy recovery. I am pleased that the House is addressing the subject of the carrying of knives in public places. The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) has already—and rightly—raised that subject this morning.

There is considerable frustration on the Isle of Wight that we cannot get our local authority to take seriously the installation of closed circuit television cameras in public places. I am not suggesting that the island needs to be blanketed by them—fortunately, we have a considerably lower crime rate than the rest of the United Kingdom—but many people on the island believe, and I am sure it is a universal opinion, that CCTV can make a major contribution to reducing crime, particularly petty vandalism in public places.

I am pleased that the Chancellor made provision for that in the Budget. We do not seem to be making much progress on its installation on the island, although I believe that the council, in conjunction with the police, will submit a bid for CCTV shortly.

We have the highest level of seasonal unemployment in the United Kingdom, which is another reason why I feel fully justified in taking up the time of the House this morning. In the past few days, however, we have benefited from the single regeneration budget.

There is a feeling on the island that glad tidings are about to come to us from the Government in the form of the assistance that they will give us. The business link has been established, and it is beginning to extend its tentacles throughout the island to draw together all the agencies of Government. I am sure that it will grapple with the intractable problem of seasonal unemployment, from which the island has suffered for so many years.

I still wonder why the Department for Education and Employment, the Isle of Wight council or business link has not conducted a survey of the number of people who commute to work from the mainland to the Isle of Wight. My constituency has one of the highest unemployment rates of all Conservative constituencies, and it seems extraordinary that a contingent of people commute to the Isle of Wight to work. We should endeavour to address that mismatch.

This week, the island's citizens advice bureau received the largest grant of those given throughout the south of England—more than £300,000—to assist its work on the island. I am particularly pleased about that, because our CAB has had problems in obtaining funding locally in the past. I am sure that that funding will ensure that it gives an efficient service to all my constituents throughout the island, and not just those in Newport, as it did hitherto.

The Isle of Wight's roads are notorious. When one drives off the car ferry, there is, for some reason, a large sign, erected courtesy of the council, which says, "Island roads are different", and indeed they are. They are rather corrugated. One former Transport Minister, who knows the Isle of Wight extremely well, said that the island's geological formation is a road maker's nightmare.

We have some serious traffic problems on the island. We have conducted some experiments, such as removing double yellow lines, to try to improve the lot of local traders who have suffered from the arrival of large supermarkets on the island, which have absorbed a considerable amount of the traders' business.

Like other hon. Members, I am concerned that my council continues to pursue traders who operate on the pavements. Given that the Isle of Wight is a holiday resort, I think such trading is perfectly reasonable and acceptable, and adds to the holiday atmosphere. I am sad that that trading practice is frowned upon where the pavement is wide enough to allow it.

The island recently received a substantial grant from lottery funds for its housing advice centre. I backed that bid, and I am pleased that the Department of the Environment has also given the centre money. My right hon. Friend might like to know that the Liberal Democrats opposed the allocation of that money, on the ground that the centre was also receiving income from Shelter.

That centre has made a considerable improvement to the advice that young people and those threatened with homelessness receive. It has also assisted them in finding accommodation. The centre is greatly trusted by all parties on the island, because of the excellence and professionalism of its advice. It has made great strides, and its professional, specialist advice has helped to lessen the work load of the CAB. I should like my right hon. Friend to pass on my thanks to Ministers at the Department of the Environment for their support in the early stages of establishing the centre.

The Isle of Wight has a number of bids in for the millennium fund. My own proposal, which I hope will be accepted, is for the establishment of a national civil war museum on the island. As everyone in the House is aware, at the other end of the building lies the arrest warrant for King Charles I, which was served at Carisbrooke on the Isle of Wight.

Although it is understandable that no nation would wish to celebrate a civil war, sufficient years have now passed, and we should try to draw together all the artefacts and historic memorabilia from around the country in one national museum. People could visit it to learn about the incarceration of King Charles I, and how that affected the island. In due course, I hope that that museum could become a national centre of excellence, as well as an archive of that remarkable period of history.

Mr. Winnick: I do not want to antagonise the hon. Gentleman, because I hope that he will support my private Member's Bill. I have already spoken, so I have no personal motive in asking the hon. Gentleman to bear in mind the fact that this is a time-restricted debate. He has spoken for half an hour, and if he continues to speak he will deprive many other hon. Members, Conservative and Labour, of the opportunity of speaking. I have no motive in saying that, other than that I think he is being extremely unfair. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that criticism in the spirit in which it is intended.

Mr. Field: It is Christmas, so I will. I also think that it is extremely unfair that Opposition Members get the same allowance for office costs as I do, when, after the next election I shall have almost half as many constituents again as the rest of them. I make no complaint about that, however, because it is a great privilege to be here. I must repeat that I have never been selfish since I was elected in 1987, and I am coming to a conclusion, but I have just two more points to make.

[Mr. Field]

Under the Budget, the relief on capital gains tax was not extended. The yield from CGT has been considerably reduced because of the roll-over reinvestment available on unquoted shares. To combat that low yield, I suggest to the Treasury that, if the relief was extended to allow for investment in housing associations and external loans for investment in private housing schemes for renting—a Budget proposal—the yield from CGT would not alter, but it would be targeted at the private housing market and give it the oomph it needs.

My right hon. Friend will be aware that the Evening Standard has recently run an effective campaign about the problems of long leaseholds and landlords who take advantage of them. We have a lot of Victorian property on the island which has been converted into multiple-occupation housing and sold on long leases, so we have had problems with leases in the past. I was interested to note that the Evening Standard mentioned companies that were in a similar location to some that had caused me and my constituents considerable problems.

The cry for more legislation goes up yet again. If the Department of the Environment were to join with the Department of Trade and Industry, their combined weight against a company which is sailing very close to the wind would prove a very effective force. They could apply pressure to the directors of the company, and perhaps make public the organisation's activities. That would be much more effective than again opting for primary legislation, and it might well prove a more speedy solution.

That brings me, finally, to the question of deregulation. As hon. Members know, I am the Chairman of the Deregulation Committee, and it is a matter of personal regret to me that we shall not be able to dance on new year's eve—which falls on a Sunday this year—as dancing is prohibited in this country on a Sunday. I had hoped that the deregulation order would be passed to allow people to celebrate the new year, but the other place decided that that was an inappropriate use of a deregulation order. Therefore, I know that this year our constituents throughout the United Kingdom will sit at home cuddling a cup of Bovril instead of dancing. That is very sad.

In the new year, we should examine deregulation proposals and consider giving local authorities the discretion to exercise some of the powers they used to have. In my keenness to vote in the House for a unitary authority on the Isle of Wight and the Local Government Commission, I was surprised to learn that we were also voting for the commission to consider the issue of parish and town councils. As you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in the old days, if a proportion of the local population—I think that the figure was two thirds, but I may be wrong—declared that they required a parish council, the local authority would put that proposal to the Secretary of State, who could then allow it.

I am now told that that is impossible without a complete review by the Local Government Commission. That band of wandering minstrels rumbles around the country while local communities, that would desperately like to have a parish council are no longer afforded that option. A deregulation order could be brought before the House to deal with that situation, and return that power to local authorities.

If that cannot be done, my noble Friend Lord Mottistone in the other place is in the early stages of producing a Bill with the Government that will allow East Cowes to have a parish council. The Local Government Commission envisaged in its report that the Isle of Wight should have a unitary authority. In his capacity as Lord President of the Council, I hope that my right hon. Friend will ensure that all Government Departments give full force to my noble Friend's proposals, if that is the only alternative open to the people of the Isle of Wight.

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): Hon. Members who have spoken in the debate have wished Madam Speaker a pleasant Christmas and a happy new year, so I think that it is appropriate to extend the same sentiments to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to the many people who serve Members of Parliament in the House. I refer especially to those in the Refreshment Department and in the tearooms, who provide a valuable service and who are never fully appreciated for the work they do.

St. George's hospital, Tooting—one of the major hospitals in south London—is located in my parliamentary constituency. It serves Wandsworth, Merton and Sutton, and no doubt people from other areas attend the hospital for health care and other services. I do not question that it is an excellent hospital which offers good health services and employs a very dedicated team of doctors, nurses and other health service workers.

However, like so many other hospitals in London and in other parts of the country, St. George's faces more and more difficulties in its service provision. I am sure that all hon. Members have read in today's press, and have heard on this morning's radio broadcasts, reports about the problems that many hospitals in the United Kingdom have providing accident and emergency care. That is certainly the case at St. George's hospital.

I visited the St. George's accident and emergency department some months ago at the request of senior doctors, and both doctors and nurses told me about the problems they face. The hospital does not have the provision to meet patients' needs. While St. George's has difficulty finding beds for patients, whole hospital wards are closed. The difficulty of providing home care services in adjoining boroughs for patients who are about to be discharged adds to those problems. Unfortunately, the situation has not improved since my visit—and, in the case of elderly people and those who are most at risk, it has worsened.

John Millard, the consultant physician at St. George's hospital, sent me a letter shortly after my visit to the hospital. In the letter, dated 21 September, he says:

> "Many thanks for your letter of 15th September. I am so glad that you were able to come to St. George's and see both junior and senior staff who have to work in the system. I will certainly pass your message on to them."

My message was to express my appreciation to the staff for the services they provide in the community. Mr. Millard continued:

> "I hope your discussions with both Lambeth and Merton are fruitful. Getting elderly patients home, when they no longer need high-tech medical care is a major problem".

I think that that comment clearly outlines the problems at the hospital. However, it is only one aspect of the difficulties that it faces.

Week after week, the Prime Minister and other Ministers cite figures to justify what they believe is happening in the national health service. I do not doubt that money is being spent, but doctors, nurses, local people and Members of Parliament with hospitals in their constituencies know that many Government changes have created a two-tier health service. I put it to the House that London has suffered far more than other parts of the country. Year after year, successive Secretaries of State have told us that there are too many hospital beds in London. In recent years, 2,500 beds have been closed in the Greater London area.

Hospital admissions in the Wandsworth area are much higher than the national average. The number of admissions for elderly people in Wandsworth is in the highest 10 per cent. of the national figures. Against the background that I have outlined, we have seen funding taken from St. George's and allocated to areas far away from London, which is having a disastrous effect on our health services. That is not only my view, but is the view of senior doctors and administrators at the hospital. The Wandsworth health authority loses money every year. Since 1993, our budget has been cut by some 24 per cent. The continuing reduction in expenditure cannot continue without the serious effects that we are now experiencing. I have discussed the matter with the chief executive, senior administrative officers, doctors and nurses at the hospital. They all accept that this is happening, and it will continue, as will their complaints to me and to the Secretary of State for Health.

Regrettably, a major hospital in south London that provides hospital care for in-patients and out-patients has closed wards, and nurses are about to be made redundant. We all know that it will lead to the cancellation of operations and cuts in services for out-patients. Senior doctors rightly complain to me, and we should give them credit for voicing their complaints about those matters, which ultimately will affect patients.

I sought this morning's short debate because the hospital is still set to have its funding cut in the coming years. Where is the sense in following such a policy, when it is roundly and repeatedly condemned by the very people who are seeking to run the services in that hospital?

My speech is not about the national health service in the United Kingdom; it relates solely to one hospital—a very important hospital that meets the needs not only of my constituents but of hon. Members on both sides of the House.

Local people share the deep concern of the hospital administrators, the chief executive and senior doctors at the hospital that there is no sense whatsoever in closing hospital wards that are needed and making loyal members of staff redundant because, sadly, insufficient funding is available to that hospital.

It is no good for the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for Health to come to the House, as they do week after week, to say how marvellous everything is in the national health service. One only wishes that was true. Sadly, it is not. It is now time for change. That is what people really want, not some time in the future, but with an urgency to face the need to change policies which are having such a regrettable, indeed disastrous, effect on the standards of that hospital—especially for the people in that part of south London who go there for their health provision.

10.32 am

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): I welcome these Adjournment debates, as they give us the opportunity to raise matters of specific concern to our constituents. I should be grateful if my right hon. Friend the Lord President would address two points when he replies to the debate, as my constituents are interested in them.

The first concerns the incident involving the chief inspector of prisons at HM prison Holloway. There has been much talk about the conditions in that prison, and I would be interested to know what my right hon. Friend has to say on the subject. I hope that he will bear it in mind that my constituents have scant sympathy for those serving prison sentences, as they have clearly offended against society. While we should ensure that our prisons are sanitary, they should be spartan, and not have conditions which are not available in our youth clubs and elsewhere.

Secondly, I should like to raise the vexed subject of Mr. Peter Davis, the national lottery regulator. As I understand it, he used free flights in the United States which otherwise would have been paid for by the taxpayer. He has a reputation as a dry accountant but a person of the utmost probity. Having been in business, I know that there is always pressure to save on one's expenses. If that is the context, it is to be commended, but I should like some assurance from my right hon. Friend on those points.

The debate was opened by my right hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery), who was concerned about the pernicious campaign against parents when they are asked to decide whether they wish to back the decision of the board of governors for a school to become grant-maintained. It struck a strong chord with me, as I represent a Kent constituency.

Only yesterday, Gravesend received a magnificent Christmas present. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment announced her approval of the application for grant-maintained status from the Gravesend grammar school for girls. We have been dismayed at the delay in that approval, as the parents voted for that change by an overwhelming majority last July.

Eight out of nine secondary schools, and three of the primary schools, in Gravesham are now grant-maintained. The process has been a remarkable success. St. George's Church of England comprehensive school, the first school in the borough to become grant-maintained, has achieved wonderful results by redeploying 100 per cent. of the resources, balancing the staff against other spending, and getting value for money.

I commend to the House the comments of the chairman of the governors, the Rev. Joe King, who is a well-known Labour party supporter. He makes it clear that he values the school's new freedom and has considerable scorn for so-called specialist support supply by Kent county council.

Meopham school in my constituency, a rural secondary school that was under threat of closure from the county council, is now absolutely thriving. Those involved have used great imagination to make the school the core of the community campus in the village.

Only a few years ago, Southfields school in my constituency had the unenviable status of being bottom of the league of schools in Kent. It is now moving steadily away from the bottom as the school rallies round, using all the discretions available to grant-maintained schools.

[Mr. Jacques Arnold]

It is all most encouraging. The grant-maintained schools system is so successful that the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), the Opposition spokesman on education, is already well on the way to implying that it was all their own idea in the first place. We know that the Leader of the Opposition scorns his council schools in Islington, and has taken his young son right across London to a leading grant-maintained school. It is all positive. We want parental choice, and other schools to follow the great achievements of schools in Gravesham and in so many boroughs throughout the country.

We should consider the action taken by the Labour party in respect of grant-maintained schools. There have been 12 ballots in Gravesham, and in every one the parents voted by an overwhelming majority in favour. However, they have done so against a background of rumours, falsehoods and the spending of £100,000 of council tax payers' money by Labour-Liberal-controlled Kent county council. It is really dreadful.

There has been a great deal of messing about by the county council. There have been land grabs and disputes over land on campuses and equipment. There have even been problems over the delivery of pay slips and P45s to the teachers in the schools concerned.

The Labour party fought and won the county council elections two years ago on the basis that the borough of Gravesham needed more nursery schools. To date, not a single new one has been provided. When there was one such proposal from a grant-maintained school—the Holy Trinity Church of England school—the Labour-controlled county council opposed it. Having said that Gravesham needed more nursery units, it voted down one such proposal because it came from a grant-maintained school. Thanks only to the action of my hon. Friend the Minister, we now have a new unit serving youngsters in Gravesend.

Gravesend grammar school for girls is now going ahead with grant-maintained status. The delays have been caused by the bogus objections of Kent county council, under the inspiration of the Labour party. One of the objections was that the governors arrived at their decision in only 15 minutes. On investigation, we found that they had held two lengthy meetings to discuss the whole matter, and had deferred the second meeting only so as to allow the KCC area education officer time to confirm the exact details of his offer of an admissions policy for the north-west Kent area.

Another bogus objection which was particularly patronising and insulting to my Sikh constituents was the allegation contained in the following KCC letter:

> "The ballot documentation supplied by the Electoral Reform Society was made available in the English language only. In an area with a substantial Asian languages speaking population, this will have had the effect of disenfranchising a proportion of the electorate on racial lines."

There is only one large minority in Gravesham—Sikhs from the Punjab, who speak the Punjabi language.

Most of the Sikh community are now second or third generation. The school itself already offers parents a translation service for general education matters, and not one parent has ever felt the need to take it up. Furthermore, not a single student in the school, of Sikh or any other origin, needs English language support on the ground that English is their second language. So this was yet another pernicious example of playing the race card.

Another bogus objection came in the form of the suggestion that the public meeting for parents was not balanced. That cannot be true; the co-chairman of the education committee, a Labour county councillor, attended and spoke at the meeting. Is it thought that parents are so stupid that they cannot hear out a Labour councillor and then make their own minds up?

This was all, of course, a fatuous waste of time, but it delayed the process for five months and endangered the 1996 intake of girls to the school, at a time when parents were facing anxious decisions about the future of their daughters' education. The fact is that the Labour party issues soundbites of approval for GM status, but the reality is quite different.

Our schools in Gravesham have to cope not just with this sort of trench warfare but with other ridiculous nonsense to do with school funding. Last year, Kent county council was given another 2.1 per cent. funding in terms of actual cash, but passed on only a 1 per cent. increase to the budgets of schools—after considerable pressure had been exerted. That resulted in a shortfall of £3.4 million across the county. Weeks later, it was found that—possibly owing to mismanagement—the council had underspent for the previous year by £19 million.

The solution that was obvious to parents and anyone else of sound mind was to put £3.4 million from the £19 million into topping up schools' budgets to the amount that they should have had in the first place. Such a proposal was made by Conservative county councillors, but it was voted down by the Lib-Lab pact, whose members wanted to keep up the party political pressure on parents. Speaking as the parent of three youngsters in state schools in Kent, I do not believe that our youngsters' education should be played around with for party political purposes.

This year, the Government increased the funding for Kent county council by 4.38 per cent.—significantly more than inflation. As education is the top Government priority, the percentage applicable to education is even higher. But what is the prospect of that money getting through to the schools?

A meeting has just been held by Kent county council with the chairmen of governors of schools. At the end of the meeting, just as the Conservative leader of the county council opposition left the hall, up jumped the co-chairman of education—this time a Liberal Democrat—to tell the assembled chairmen of governors that there had been no increase whatever in Government funding. That is game playing of the most inaccurate and damaging kind. What on earth will these councillors do with the budget if their starting point is so inaccurate?

I should like to have spoken on Second Reading of the Asylum and Immigration Bill, but blocking tactics were used to stop me being the last speaker in the debate, organised by the Labour Whip, the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew). Hence my sympathy in respect of certain recent comments is somewhat thin. Nevertheless, I want to put on record two points that I was unable to make at the time.

I have some personal experience of immigration racketeers. They charge large fees for smuggling immigrants into this country. In Kent, we see immigrants who cannot speak English wandering around the lay-bys of our motorways, where they have been dumped by these miserable intermediaries. Some immigrants have even been suffocated while hidden in the backs of lorries. It is vital that the problem be dealt with soon.

There are also unscrupulous immigration brokers. Time and again, immigrants have been to my surgery to tell me that they have been led on by so-called advisers who charge huge fees. They take their clients through the mass of regulations, and then try to exploit our generous asylum system.

Worst of all are the immigration marriage brokers. They ruin the lives of young constituents of mine. I give the House the example of a 20-year-old British-born Sikh girl who used to work in a large office. One afternoon, she went to her boss and asked for half an hour off. He asked her why she wanted to go out. She replied that she wished to get married, but would be back in half an hour. The boss wondered what was going on. She said that there was a register office just across the road. So she went off and got married, but she did not much like the look of the man who was to be her husband—and then realised that he was an illegal immigrant.

The girl came to see me: could I do something to prevent her having to go through the religious ceremony? It seems that a marriage broker had arranged the marriage with her father and brother; she alleged that money had changed hands for that purpose. She had only one way out—to flee her home and the borough in which she had been brought up. She had to pack her personal belongings in her suitcase, which she had brought from the office, and flee to London that very weekend—a disgraceful episode.

The marriage broker concerned also happened to be the chief executive of the Gravesend Commission for Racial Equality, formerly the Gravesham community relations council, which had a valuable and long-standing record of service to the borough. The Gravesend CRE branch suddenly closed down. The secretary came to me at my surgery to tell me that she had been dumped with no redundancy money and to ask me whether I could help. I approached the chairman of the defunct CRE, a Labour councillor, who told me that there was nothing he could say. I then approached the one-time honorary president of the CRE, another Labour councillor, who was equally unable to help.

It is odd that this marriage broker and former chief executive of the defunct CRE, a Mr. Gurdev Singh Talwar, was also a Labour councillor at the time. For some months now, the Labour party has been throwing allegations of sleaze and secrecy across this Chamber. It is time that the Opposition cleaned up their act and came up with an explanation of what went on in the cases to which I have referred. I also hope that the press will turn to some investigative journalism to shed light on these scandals.

Another aspect of the Asylum and Immigration Bill—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman cannot talk about a Bill which is already before the House. There will be other occasions when he can talk about it, of course. Meanwhile, he can talk freely about the problems of Gravesham, but not about the Bill.

Mr. Arnold: My Sikh constituents, largely because of their origins in the Punjab, depend for their livelihoods on labouring jobs—they work in construction, on roads, in market gardening and so on. For two or three years, they have been telling me that the pay for their jobs is being undercut by people who will work for very much less. They specifically asked, "What are the Government going to do about it? We know that these people are illegal immigrants and bogus asylum applicants." In fact, the Government are acting, and I support them.

Denton, in my constituency, received a good Christmas present from the Government. It has received nearly £2 million from the challenge fund to support project Denton. Moneys from the single regeneration budget will go to a very old part of the borough. It is an area of small streets, in which a new factory has developed. The factory provides 250 jobs in an area of high unemployment. Comma Oil mixes and bottles lubricants and other fluids for the vehicle industry.

Heavy goods vehicles have rumbled through the old streets of Denton to reach the factory, to the distraction of residents. The clear solution was to build a new highway on the other side of Denton. We have never been able to implement that solution, because the local highway authority, Kent county council, has been resolute in not including it in its programme, despite the fact that the Labour co-chair of the relevant county council committee is the local ward councillor.

As a result of wonderful co-operation between the public and private sectors, a deal has been put together that includes a new road. It also includes training and youth opportunities, as well as anti-crime improvements. The deal is a considerable success. It will ensure that the factory will remain in the area. It was going to go elsewhere. I can now disclose that it would have gone to Huntingdon. I could not admit that earlier, because, if the proposed move to that particular constituency had been known about, there might have been a temptation not to approve our grant! Comma Oil is to stay on the site, and there will be an additional 50 jobs. The opening up of other land will create another 250 jobs.

The remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Field) stirred a memory for me. He talked about parishes and a local population, virtually without exception, wanting to create a parish council. That is the position at the village of Vigo in my constituency, which is currently part of the parish of Meopham.

All the residents—I know of no exceptions—wish to establish a parish council in their own right. The mechanism is to go through the Local Government Commission for England. Unfortunately, given the vast amount of work that the commission is undertaking, it will not get on with the job. I hope that the matter can be re-examined, with a view to finding a simplified way of allowing populations, if they wish, to establish a parish council. They should be able to do so.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): The hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) should not be suspicious on every occasion about people who nip out from work to get married. Mrs. Banks and I did precisely that. We married and went back to work the same afternoon. She is not, as far as I am aware, an illegal immigrant.

There seems to be a practice—it has almost become a tradition—of Members presenting the House with compilations of their favourite speeches, or perhaps of speeches that they did not make, during these Adjournment debates. I suggest that letters to Ministers or local press releases might be equally appropriate ways of drawing attention to the points they want to raise.

I do not wish to be churlish, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I join all those who have wished you a happy Christmas. Long may I catch your eye, Sir. You might have a happy Christmas, but after the vote last night, I doubt very much whether the Prime Minister will be able to enjoy his Christmas. I am sure that he would like to wake up on Christmas morning to find all the heads of his Euro-sceptics in his Christmas stocking. He would then, of course, find that his parliamentary majority had disappeared. He is not, of course, able to rely on some Conservative Members these days. I endorse the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), who said that the country desperately needs a general election. I suspect that parliamentary arithmetic will force one sooner rather than later on the Prime Minister.

[Mr. Tony Banks]

I was not going to be here this morning. I had intended to travel to Zurich for a Council of Europe meeting. Unfortunately, being a practised wally, I left my passport at home. When I reached Heathrow, I found that the British immigration service was more than happy to let me leave the country. I do not know whether that tells me something of which I should be aware. British Midland was superb in arranging things. Unfortunately, those at the Zurich end refused to let me into Switzerland. Who would wish to impersonate a British Member of Parliament these days? That would be outrageous. This episode takes up the theme of illegal immigrants that the hon. Member for Gravesham introduced.

I would not fancy the chances of young Master Tell if I were to shoot at the apple on his head this morning. He would end up looking rather like King Harold.

The debate gives me the chance to raise the case of Mr. Mark Votier. He is a constituent of my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Miss Hoey), who is a good friend of mine. She knows that I am raising Mr. Votier's case, and supports me in doing so.

Mr. Votier is a freelance journalist. He was commissioned to film a Japanese whaling expedition in the Antarctic. He was so shocked by what he saw aboard Japanese whaling ships that he released the footage of his film to journalists throughout the world. We saw examples of that footage in newspapers such as the Independent and The Guardian earlier this month. As a result of releasing his film, he is being sued by the Japanese Government's Institute of Cetacean Research for £60,000-worth of damages. Total costs will be another £200,000.

The Japanese are killing minke whales in the southern ocean sanctuary. This year, they will kill no fewer than 440 whales. Mr. Votier went to the area as someone who was not passionately committed to the preservation of whales. If he had been, he probably would not have wanted to go to the area to see what was going on. There are, of course, brave people who are supportive of the anti-whaling movement who are prepared to expose themselves to both dangers and horrors. However, Mr. Votier saw things that appalled him.

Mr. Votier found that 50 per cent. of the minke whales that were caught were only wounded by the harpoon, not killed. The Japanese butchers then put into the minke whale a lance through which they passed an electric force. The force is not sufficient to kill the whale instantly. On average, they took at least eight minutes to die. On one occasion, Mr. Votier saw a minke whale thrashing around for 23 minutes waiting to die while the Japanese put an electric shock through it. That is a whale dying in agony. The Japanese have no right to do this.

We should make a strong protest to the Japanese authorities. The British representatives at the International Whaling Commission met in May. They attempted to use examples of Mr. Votier's film to demonstrate that so-called scientific whaling is butchery by the Japanese. The Japanese vetoed the attempt. They said that the film that the British representatives wished to use—it was shot by Mr. Votier—was illegally obtained.

When Mr. Votier was commissioned, he was told that he must exclude from his film all unsightly tasks—in other words, the sort of things that tell us the truth about what the Japanese are doing to whales in the southern ocean sanctuary. He was told that his film would have to be submitted to the Japanese authorities for censorship.

A spokesman for the agriculture and fisheries division of the Japanese embassy in London denied that whaling was unscientific. He said:

> "We need to gather scientific data on the age, sex and population of the minke whales in the antarctic."

He claimed that 400 whales had to be slaughtered to satisfy statistical best practice.

The United States, using the Pelly amendment, has censured Japan for its so-called scientific whaling, and Japan is now 90 days away from having sanctions imposed on it. Incidentally, the sanctions will not affect electrical equipment or cars exported by the Japanese—I wish that they did, because that might concentrate their warped little minds. The sanctions will relate only to fishing, but they are still worth imposing, which is why I am asking the British Government to do something.

I have tabled an early-day motion that has been signed by 113 hon. Members, asking for the strongest protest to be made to the Japanese authorities. The case in Tokyo, which involves a British citizen, has been adjourned until 23 January. It is likely to be postponed again for procedural reasons until 20 February, when a decision is expected.

I ask the Lord President to pass on, through the Foreign Office, our strong feeling that the case against Mr. Votier should be dropped. He should not be prosecuted; he should be thanked by world opinion, although not, clearly, by the Japanese. I hope that the Lord President will bear in mind my remarks, and ensure that the necessary pressure, in defence of a British citizen who was doing his job and informing world opinion, is put on the Japanese authorities.

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): Before the House adjourns for the Christmas recess, I wish to raise three issues. However, before doing so, I put it on record that I agree wholeheartedly with the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on some matters. I share his views on animal welfare and agree that an international railway station should be located at Stratford, but we disagree about football—he supports Chelsea and I support West Ham.

I was reflecting on the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold), who mentioned the education of the Leader of the Opposition's child. I was flattered when the leader of the Labour party and his deputy chose to mention me in their speeches to the Labour party conference, but my family is still smarting from the Labour party's delightful comments about me and the education of my own son. The attack was led by a former Labour Member of Parliament, supported by my defeated Labour rival in the general election for whom no handkerchief is big enough to blub into. However, I do not intend to go into detail about the conduct of those people. I shall wait until the leader of the Labour party and his deputy are present and then put a number of questions to them.

The first matter that I want to raise relates to the Solicitors Complaints Bureau. A number of my constituents are worried about the speed and effectiveness of the bureau. I have often passed on complaints which then meet inordinate delays. I know that the Law Society's new president believes in self-regulation, but I doubt whether self-regulation is in the best interests of our constituents. I am also concerned that the majority of people who sit on the bureau are solicitors. That seems bizarre; I should have thought it was fairer to have a majority of lay people.

Secondly, I wish to draw attention to the Raoul Wallenberg appeal. Some years ago, I introduced a Bill under the ten-minute rule procedure for him to be declared an honorary British citizen. The Bill was not successful so I introduced another, the object of which was to set aside a piece of land so that a suitable monument could be erected to honour him, even though there is still some dispute as to whether he is alive or dead.

I am delighted to be able to say that great progress has been made by the appeal committee under the chairmanship of Sir Sigmund Sternberg, aided by Mr. Lionel Altman and others. Next year, or certainly by the spring of 1997, a monument will be erected to Raoul Wallenberg.

As I am sure the House knows, Raoul Wallenberg was a brave Swedish diplomat who, in 1944, risked everything and saved the lives of more than 100,000 Hungarian Jews. He designed the Schutzpass, a fake document that effectively entitled the bearer to the same protection as that afforded by a Swedish passport, which the Nazis accepted. He did a very brave thing, and I am delighted that a splendid bronze sculpture, to be done by Philip Jackson, is to be erected in the crescent of Great Cumberland place in front of the Marble Arch synagogue. However, in order for that to happen, £100,000 has to be raised, to pay not only for the sculpture but for its maintenance.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will, through the best endeavours of his office, try to secure from the Department of National Heritage a substantial contribution on the nation's behalf to that magnificent sculpture, which is to be unveiled in the not too distant future.

Finally, I deal with local government. Yesterday, the Local Government Commission announced its findings on unitary status for Basildon, Thurrock and other parts of the country. For my part, I have always believed in unitary authorities and very much regret that we have not set about introducing more across the country. I very much want Basildon to be given unitary status. When we examined the matter in the early days, I should have preferred large unitary authorities. It might surprise the House to learn that, although Basildon was very happy to be joined up with other areas, some parts of Essex were reluctant to join up with Basildon. I very much hope that next year we shall make the firm announcement that Basildon has—perhaps as part of a larger authority—been given unitary status.

In Essex, there is a phenomenon of Liberal and Labour party pacts. The Labour and Liberal parties share a bed on Essex county council, Basildon district council and Southend district council. When the phenomenon first developed, both parties were anxious to see the back of the Conservative party but, since the two socialist parties joined together, they have had something of a falling out.

It is the old story: Opposition parties are adept at articulating problems but they have difficulty in coming up with solutions. When they get power and find that they have difficult decisions to make, there is a falling out.

On Essex county council, Labour and the Liberals have made a complete mess of social services, and care in the community has not been conducted as it would have been under Conservative control. Matters are in such a shambles that the Government have announced an inquiry. On education, Labour and the Liberals have done all that they possibly can to undermine the position of grant-maintained schools in the county. We recently received a letter from the leader of the Liberals on Essex county council, asking the 16 Essex Conservative Members of Parliament to vote against the 1p off income tax announced in the Budget. The Labour party bravely abstained because it worries about votes and about whether such action might make it unpopular and reduce its so-called lead in the opinion polls, but the Liberal Democrats bravely and courageously encouraged us not to go ahead with the penny off income tax.

On extra funding for education, I very much hope that it will be better understood that the Government have put in, as a result of the Budget, a substantial amount of extra money, which will go to education specifically to reduce the size of classrooms. It would be dishonest of any Labour or Liberal politician in Essex to try to deny what the Government have achieved.

What is going on in local government in Basildon at the moment is extraordinary. One is given the impression that the three parties in Basildon are sharing power and agree on everything, but the reality is that Labour and the Liberals vote against the Conservative party on everything. For three years, the Conservatives controlled Basildon district council and sensibly managed our finances so that people's council taxes would not be put up in the future. It has not taken the Labour and Liberal parties long to start wasting that money. Once again, they are setting up area offices. The most extraordinary thing is their handling of local government officers. Everyone in the House believes that local government officers should do their job professionally and not be signed up to any political party. The last time that we had a Labour council in Basildon, the chief executive disappeared, for whatever reason, with no details given of how his removal from office was conducted or, indeed, how much he was given to leave the local authority's employment.

I now find that since the Labour and Liberal parties have controlled Basildon district council, the chief executive, yet again, has disappeared, and his deputy has taken his job—no word of explanation or details about the money that local residents in Basildon were asked to fork out to make that happen. It gets worse. I learnt this week that the previous excellent director of housing in Basildon is no longer employed by the local authority. Instead, someone who I understood was sacked by the local authority has got his job.

I am not prepared to see those matters swept under the carpet. Given that the Labour party and the Liberal Democrats believe in open disclosure, I trust that Members of Parliament will have a word with the local councillors in Basildon to ensure that local residents know precisely what is going on in relation to the conduct of local officers in Basildon.

The country and the world will be celebrating Christmas on 25 December, but I wonder whether there is any profound realisation of what Christmas day is all about. Does it demonstrate that the country and the world believe in God? I hope that the real meaning of Christmas will be better understood by the whole of the population, because if the true spirit of Christmas is understood and followed—not just for one day in the year but for 365—the country and the world will truly be a better place.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Before the House adjourns, I seek clarification on two matters, notice of which I gave to the Lord President's officials, I thought prudently, at a quarter to 10: first, the expulsion from this country of Khalifa Barzelya, the head of the Libyan interests section; and, secondly, the veracity or otherwise of the very remarkable presentation in The Guardian of Saturday 16 December by Maggie O'Kane, which relates to the Gulf war. The article forms the foundation of a programme that is to be shown an Channel 4 on 3 January. It raises very important questions of truthfulness or otherwise in relation to the Gulf war.

First, on Khalifa Barzelya: because of Lockerbie, I have come to know him over the past three years relatively well. I really am astonished that he should be considered to warrant expulsion from this country. In the light of the dreadful murder of a Libyan business man, it is the opinion of Scotland yard that Mr. Barzelya was in no way related to that matter.

I must remind the Lord President that, at Heathrow tomorrow evening, a group of relatives will meet in the airport chapel for the seventh anniversary—they meet every year on 21 December—of that dreadful night when the Pan Am Clipper "Maid of the Seas" came down. They are as determined as ever to get to the truth. It is their view, as they know him, too, that Mr. Barzelya has been greatly helpful. My estimate is that he has tried to improve relations between Britain and Libya, and to help the Libyan students that we still have—although not as many as previously—in this country. I ask, therefore, why he is being expelled. When I ask him, he says that he really has no idea; he thinks that it may be because he has been developing associations with a number of academics and, indeed, politicians. I have to say that the politicians are "undesirables" like the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) on the Conservative Benches and myself on the Opposition Benches.

If such contact is really creating trouble for the Foreign Office or the security services, it is outrageous that no explanation has been given. Therefore, I make a suggestion to the Lord President. We have a statutory committee on security. Could Mr. Barzelya's case be referred to it? I know better than to ask that I should be given some explanation from the security services, but that presumably is why we set up the committee, which is a non-House of Commons body, as I understand it, under the right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King).

I would be quite satisfied if the right hon. Gentleman were to say, "My Committee and I have seen the evidence and, on the basis of the evidence, the Government are quite justified," but, really, one does want some kind of objective assessment, because let us be clear about how damaging it is. Of course, tit-for-tat, David Hawkes has been told to get out of Tripoli. The Government should remember that there are some 5,000 of our citizens earning their bread and butter in one way or another, mostly in the Cyrenaican desert and mostly for firms such as Brown and Root. They want some kind of presence in the British interests section of the Italian embassy in Tripoli.

I could go on and on about the damage to British industry and to one of our traditional markets. The managing director of Babcock made it very clear that he would not have had to pay off some 400 skilled people in Renfrew the other day had we still had the traditional Libyan order.

No doubt I will be contradicted if I am wrong, but I fear that this has something to do with the on-going Lockerbie business, and the feeling that certain elements in the Government want an easy excuse not to hold a trial in The Hague with Scottish rules of evidence and under a Scottish judge. After seven years, any Government who wanted the truth would surely compromise to some extent, and go along with what has been offered. I have to say that I believe that the last thing that the British Government want is any kind of trial that would bring these matters to a head.

The second issue that I wish to raise relates to the article that appeared in The Guardian last Saturday. I want to ask three questions. First, are the satellite photographs from the Soyuz Karta genuine? If not, what happened in connection with the massive build-up on the Kuwaiti border about which we had been told? When I did my national service with the Royal Scots Greys, now the Royal Scots Dragoon Guards, we were taught to read aerial photographs. I am no great expert, but it appears that the aerial photographs that were so crucial during the Gulf war do not show the build-up that served as the justification for that war.

Secondly, let me refer to specific statements that were made in The Guardian about dead babies. According to the article, > "Dead babies are nothing new. During the German invasion of Belgium in the first world war, stories circulated in Britain and France of Belgian babies being butchered by German soldiers wielding bayonets. There's always a dead baby story. The story of how Iraqi troops, in the first days of the invasion, went into al Adan hospital, tore the sick babies from incubators and left them on the cold floor to die, was graphically told to Congress in November, 1990—before a crucial vote—by Niyirah al Sabah who, unknown to her audience, was the daughter of the Kuwaiti ambassador to the US. In her tearful testimony, she said she had witnessed the Iraqi troops' brutality when she worked as a volunteer in the maternity ward.

> About 100 yards from the front of the al Adan hospital in Kuwait City is a white two-storey building which houses about 50 nurses. Nurse Myra Ancog-Cooke is a Filipino nurse. Six months after the war ended, I found her still working in the hospital. She poured tea and told her story—a story which for me sowed the first seed of suspicion about the tales and half-truths that marked the build-up to > the Gulf war. A staunch Catholic, she explained that it was her duty and God's will that she stayed to care for the sick. She was assigned to the children's ward and took it in turns with the other Filipino nurse who stayed behind, Freida Contrais-Naig, to sleep in the incubator room with the babies.

> 'I remember someone called and said, "Look at CNN, they are talking about us." We watched and it was strange seeing that girl telling them about the Iraqis taking the babies out of the incubators. I said to Freida, "That's funny, we've never seen her. She never worked here." We didn't think very much about it really. We were more excited seeing our hospital on the television.' Later, Amnesty, who had also been duped by the testimony, admitted they'd got it wrong. Andrew Whitley of Middle East Watch described it as a fabrication, but it took months for the truth to come out.
> Meanwhile, President Bush mentioned the incubator babies in five speeches and seven senators referred to them in speeches backing a pro-war resolution. Subsequently, Hill and Knowlton were unabashed that the media worldwide, the UN Security Council and the US Congress had been deceived by a 15-year-old girl who had been 'trained' by a public relations firm. Lauri Fitz-Pegado of Hill and Knowlton, who prepared six witnesses who corroborated the incubator story to Congress, told John Macarthur, author of The Second Front, a book on censorship in the Gulf War: 'Come on John, who gives a shit whether there were six babies or two. I believed her.' The invading Iraqi army did rape, kill and torture in Kuwait, and that's what the world wanted to read.
> Highly exaggerated reports of thousands of deaths were accepted uncritically, as the PR firm, using Kuwaiti contacts inside the country, smuggled 24 videotapes to hungry and unquestioning mass media. The tone was set, and the tide was running in the Kuwaiti Government/Hill and Knowlton direction—war."

That raises serious issues in relation to the role of public relations firms in general, and Hill and Knowlton in particular. In considering our role in the Gulf war, the British House of Commons is entitled to ask the Government whether what was published last Saturday, and what I understand is to be shown on 3 January, is true or false. I have given the Minister's officials some warning, and I hope that the Minister will give at least a preliminary reaction in his winding-up speech.

Let me ask my final question. According to the logs, the British, French and Soviets also detected chemicals flowing down wind from the Iraqis' chemical and biological stations, which had been bombed. This is not the occasion for me to go into detail about the problems of some of our constituents who may have suffered from the effects of chemical weapons; let me simply ask the Government whether they propose to give a considered response once they have seen the film, which goes to the heart of the truthfulness of the statement that has been made by Maggie O'Kane.

Mr. Sebastian Coe (Falmouth and Camborne): I am delighted to have an opportunity to speak. I shall break with tradition—not, I hasten to add, with the protocol or the great traditions of this place. I intend to speak briefly about a subject about which I have not spoken in the House before, although it has been pretty close to my heart for many years: sport.

If the House will indulge me for a few minutes, I shall set the scene. I feel some concern—in fact, "concern" is probably too strong a word; I feel some nervousness—about one aspect of sport that has been highlighted in the past year or so. Governing bodies in sport—and, probably, the House at some stage—may wish to consider it, especially in view of the forthcoming passage of the Broadcasting Bill. I think that hon. Members on both sides of the House recognise that sport is important—it matters.

In 1989, just before I left the Sports Council as its vice-chairman to throw my hat into the political arena—obviously, I did not crave job security at that stage—I commissioned some work on its behalf by the Henley research centre, which identified two or three key statistics on the way in which sport was valued in this country. In the late 1980s, about 22 million people identified themselves as being involved in sport regularly at one level or another. I have no reason to believe that that number has decreased; in key sectors, it will have increased. That is getting on for roughly half the population. It is probably one of the most popular activities that could be identified in such statistical terms.

In economic terms, by the end of the 1980s, sport was about the fourth largest employer. It employed more than the car and petrochemical industries and the agricultural sector put together. It accounted for about £3.5 billion-worth of high street retail sales, which had it alongside, and in some areas outstripping, electrical goods and even, for a time, cassettes and other audio equipment.

That is a long-winded way of saying that sport matters and that people recognise that it matters. There is no hon. Member sitting in the House today who does not have sports clubs in his or her constituency. They are either closely attached to such clubs or recognise their work, whether they be in rural areas or in inner cities.

One of the key arguments that has always raged within sport, sports administrations and sports governing bodies—it raged especially during my time at the Sports Council—involved sports funding and whether the funds that were available, through the private or public sectors, should be distributed towards the excellence end of sport or towards its participation end, remembering that the Sports Council's royal charter specifically gave it the remit to increase participation in sport. We recognise that those were and remain key arguments.

Throughout a number of years in sports administration and certainly as a competitor, my belief has been that, in relation to participation and excellence and funding, we cannot have one without the other. We recognise the old pyramid argument that one needs a firm base through which the Daley Thompsons, Steve Ovetts, Steve Crams and Paul Gascoignes emerge. One also needs, however, specifically to target sport at the excellence end, either through our national sports centres or possibly through the development of an academy of sport—a whole range of issues exists here.

We recognise that some countries have targeted specifically and very well. The Swedes produced Bjorn Borg and Stefan Edberg; the Germans, in exactly the same way, identified what I suppose one could describe as a niche market, through which the Steffi Grafs and Boris Beckers emerged. There is, therefore, a gentle and fairly subtle balance in all that.

The landscape of sport in relation to its public face has changed dramatically, even since the time I was serving at the Sports Council. I wish that I had had available to me in the late 1980s the sort of budget that is now available through the mechanisms of the national lottery and the Sports Council grant. At that time, basically, the public face of British sport was run on about £40 million a year, which was significantly less than the Arts Council grant, but I do not wish to revisit old griefs.

"Raising the Game" is probably one of the best pieces of political thought that has gone into sport since 1945 and is something that hon. Members on both sides of the House agree should be welcomed. In the development of sport, whether with regard to competition in school, the maintenance of school sport, linking clubs—where there is now probably more coaching expertise than in schools—with schools and ensuring that funding is appropriate and resources are available as and where they are genuinely needed, "Raising the Game" was probably the single most important contribution that this place and Government have made for many years.

[Mr. Sebastian Coe]

The general populace's access to top-class sport concerns me. We are not all likely to turn up at Wimbledon and lie in our sleeping bags for three days to obtain tickets for Centre court. We recognise that the majority of people who watch sport at the highest level do so through their television sets. I wish that more people turned up and actively supported sport, but that genie is not likely ever to be put back in the bottle. We must recognise that the main vehicle for sports promotion is television.

One of my concerns is that, if we are to maintain participation levels and excellence, we must maintain people's maximum access to sport on television. That difficult issue must be confronted, given the nature of some of the contracts that are being drawn up between sports governing bodies and television, the balance of terrestrial television and satellite television in particular, and the advent of pay-per-view, which, for the majority of sports fans in the United States of America, remains the most important access that they have to television sport.

Back in the 1950s, we produced a protected list of events. It was ostensibly to ensure that there was no likelihood that one of the key events—the World cup, the Olympic games, the English FA cup final or Scottish FA cup final—was protected from a monopoly broadcast. The protected list was put together to ensure that the majority of people had access to sport at that level. Satellite television is now in the arena, looking to and making hard progress towards the sort of exclusive deal that is likely to cause hon. Members concern in relation to access to some of the more traditional sports.

I was interested to be a bystander—a seated bystander, I hasten to add—at an Adjournment debate some months ago when hon. Members on both sides of the House spoke passionately about the deal that was being struck between Sky television, the Murdoch organisation and rugby league. Your colleague, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Sir G. Lofthouse), is well known for his strong rugby league background. One of my more cherished memories of that debate is of the hon. Gentleman trying to hold back his anger about developments in a sport that hon. Members on both sides of the House, and especially those with northern constituencies, recognise as causing concern.

I hope that we do not deprive the average sports fan of access to top-class television sport. In a few months' time, the Broadcasting Bill is due to be considered by the House and, when it does, perhaps we can visit that issue. Perhaps we could debate it in terms not of strong or tight prescriptive measures on governing bodies or television, but of how they might develop negotiations with satellite or terrestrial television authorities.

One issue that we could visit relates to highlights packages. In a few months the World cricket cup competition will be held in India and Pakistan. The agreement between Sky television and the world cricketing bodies was for exclusive coverage, but the original discussions agreed that the highlights package would be available to the BBC. I understand that that package will not be available and that means that, for large parts of the year, a generation of young cricket fans will have limited television access to their sport. Of course, domestic test matches will remain on the protected list, but we shall have to make sure that highlights packages for overseas tours are available.

In their negotiations with satellite companies, the governing bodies should carefully consider entering into contractual agreements that preclude terrestrial television showing such packages. It is in the interests of the governing bodies to have the maximum number of people wanting to take up their sport, whether that is badminton, cricket, football or track and field. Numbers are their life blood and, if they are limited, the ultimate price to be paid is that people will turn away from sports to which they do not have ready access on television and will find other sports. I gently suggest to governing bodies that might be negotiating at this moment that, if they are not careful, they may slaughter the goose that lays the golden egg.

Sport is important and it should remain accessible to as many people as possible. It has gained a political status in this place that most of us who were working in the vineyard in the 1980s did not think would come about so quickly. I am grateful for that, but I am still nervous about the other issues.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There is just under half an hour to the winding-up speeches. Five hon. Members wish to contribute to the debate and I ask for short speeches so that all five may take part.

11.43 am

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I appreciate this opportunity to take part in the debate. This is the season of good will, but on the first Christmas people were too busy with their own interests to care about others, and there was the murder of the innocents. I do not say whether the person who was murdered last evening in my constituency was innocent, but that murder reflects the issue that we must keep before us—there can be a tendency in society to excuse certain events because people might have deserved what happened to them. The House should give a clear signal that lawlessness in any guise is unacceptable in a democratic society. I know that we will sympathise with the widow and children who in this Christmas season have the harrowing experience of such a tragic loss.

Just before the House rose last Christmas I had an Adjournment debate on traffic flows in Belfast. Is the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland serious about dealing with some of the road congestion that remains? One of the blights in my constituency that affects housing and health is the Broadway roundabout for the west link and the Donegall road. Is it the Department's policy not to have flyovers? If it is, it has never been stated publicly. Is the Department concerned about the topography and geology in the area: I understand that there are two underground rivers there? There is also an electrical cable and that causes similar problems. We have constantly been told that the delay in taking action is due to lack of finance. Are there other reasons that the Department is not prepared to reveal?

I should like to speak about the problem of vetting procedures, especially as they affect people from Northern Ireland. One of my constituents went to Edinburgh university and volunteered for the officer training corps and encouraged one of her room mates to join. The room mate was accepted, but because my constituent had a Northern Ireland background she had to be vetted and, despite letters to the Minister about the issue, she has not been cleared.

I understand the need for vetting, but I also understand the deep hurt that is felt by my constituent's father, an Englishman who served in the Royal Navy for 18 years, and by her grandfather, who served in the Royal Ulster Rifles for more than 30 years. They are dismayed that she is so vetted that she cannot take her place with her friends. The same pattern was evident in a London constituency when the granddaughter of a former councillor and high sheriff of Belfast, who never lived there and whose father was an Englishman, was subjected to long vetting procedures simply because of the Northern Ireland connection.

A colleague engaged an aide in his constituency office and sought to get him a pass so that his bona fides were acceptable here. Although that aide had 30 years' service in the Royal Ulster Constabulary, vetting took three months. I am not sure whether it is a matter of job protection or whether some people with cosy jobs, even part-time ones, do not realise the impact of such vetting. Perhaps they do not give the matter the attention that is necessary, although I am convinced that much of the vetting is unnecessary.

I have no intention of delaying the House. I have made my points succinctly but definitely, and I seek clear answers.

Mr. Michael Stephen (Shoreham): I wish Madam Speaker, her three deputies and all the clerks and servants of the House a very peaceful Christmas and a happy new year.

In the short time available I would like to say a few words about Britain's relations with Europe. Britain is a European country, but it is very different from its continental neighbours. It is a maritime country. Our world interests are far-ranging and go back a very long time. Britain is a pragmatic country. Our common law is built on practical decisions made by judges in actual cases throughout the years, step by step—not for us the grand design, the "code Napoleon".

The exchange rate mechanism was a very good example of European grand design that ended in disaster. Instead of trying, as we would have done step by step on a pragmatic basis to build up a system of aligned currencies firmly based in the economies of the countries concerned, the imposition of an artificial structure from above with deadlines and timetables was attempted, and it collapsed under its own weight, as most of us knew that it would. It was rather like fiddling with the oil pressure gauge on a car instead of attending to the engine. Market rates cannot be rigged, as King Canute would have told us if he had still been here. Perhaps it is not insignificant that King Canute was a Dane.

Britain has had to go to the rescue of Europe three times in recent history—in 1815, 1914 and 1939—and, throughout the ages before 1815, Britain's policy has always been to maintain the balance of power in Europe. We have not been pro-French or anti-German. We have not been pro-German or anti-French. We allied with the French if the Germans began to get too powerful, and with the Germans if the French began to get too powerful. It worries me that such a strong Franco-German alliance is developing in Europe and I worry about the future balance of power in Europe. That ought to worry the French, the Germans and all the other Europeans too.

As for external security, it has not been the European Union that has protected us from war since 1945 but NATO, and the involvement of our American allies. Let no one ever lose sight of that or ever think that the Western European Union could take the place of NATO.

We are good Europeans and, as such, it is our duty to advise, to warn, and, if necessary, to say no. A single currency is a matter of enormous political significance. It is being sold to people on the basis that they will not have to pay exchange costs when they change their money. If they think that the banks will not find another way to extract that amount of money from their pockets, they are very naive.

The single currency would prevent us from setting our own interest rates, tax policy, public borrowing policy and exchange rates. Since the economies of Europe would not be able to move in relation to each other by shifting their exchange rates, massive subsidies would be required. It could all end in tears, just like the ERM.

We fought a civil war in this country 350 years ago to place in the hands of the elected representatives of the people the control of the purse strings, and we should not lightly allow that control to slip into the hands of bankers—who have not covered themselves with glory during the past 20 years—and certainly not foreign bankers.

The opt-out that the Prime Minister negotiated for us at Maastricht was one of his greatest achievements. It may well be that if other countries decide to go ahead and form a single currency, we might be better off outside it—no one can tell at this stage. The City of London is used to dealing with all manner of currencies; it would not matter to the City whether we were in or out of a single currency. What matters to the City is the cost of doing business in London—the cost of regulation.

The questions that the Prime Minister put in Madrid were pertinent, and we need answers to them before we can decide whether to take this momentous step. It would be very foolish to rule in or rule out Britain's membership of a single currency at this stage, as the Prime Minister is often urged to do. Although it seems almost inconceivable that we will join a single currency in the foreseeable future, it is a constitutional principle in this country that no Parliament can bind its successors. Therefore, even if my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister wished to rule out Britain's membership of a single currency within the lifetime of the next Parliament, he could not do so.

I am concerned, too, about the activities of the European Court of Justice. It proceeds by virtue of the civil law tradition, not the step-by-step, pragmatic approach of our common law judges. Continental judges adopt what is called a purposive construction. Put simply, it means that, by basing their judgments on general principles, they can make the treaties mean anything they want them to mean, which is very dangerous. It means that we are forced to comply with rules to which we would never have agreed had they been spelled out in the treaties.

For example, we would never have allowed the European Court to interfere in relations between the Ministry of Defence and serving soldiers, whether male or female. The European Court of Justice must be put on the agenda of the forthcoming intergovernmental conference, and some effective way must be found to clip the wings of these judicial legislators.

I am also concerned about the European Court of Human Rights, an organ not of the European Union but of the Council of Europe. We signed the European convention on human rights just after the second world war to protect the peoples of Europe against gross abuses of human rights perpetrated by fascists and communists. We did not sign that convention to allow foreign judges to interfere in every nook and cranny of our national life, so that we could be told whether we could cane schoolboys in our schools. There are hon. Members on both sides of the argument on caning, but it is a matter for this country to decide. This Parliament is perfectly capable of deciding such matters and it is no business of European judges to tell us whether we can cane our schoolboys.

It is also no business of European judges to tell us whether our courts martial system can continue. It has been the basis of our military discipline and, partly as a result of it, we have some of the finest armed forces in the world. Defence is entirely outside the competence of the European Union and I do not know how it could be argued that the European Court of Justice has any right to interfere in defence matters in relation to pregnant service women or anything else.

There is no such prohibition, however, in relation to the European Court of Human Rights and therefore it is entitled, if it so wishes, to tell us what we can and cannot do in relation to courts martial. I believe that we should make it very clear to the judges of the European Court of Human Rights that Britain will not tolerate interference in defence matters. If the European Court of Human Rights will not restrain itself, we may have to exercise the right conferred on us by article 65 and withdraw from the European convention on human rights altogether. I fear that our own courts are also getting into bad habits. They are being led on by the European courts to make much more use of their powers of judicial review than they ever did before.

Democracy depends on a delicate balance between the legislature, the Executive and the judiciary. British and European judges must resist the temptation to trespass too far into the field that the people have entrusted to their elected representatives.

Mr. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood): I am delighted to welcome you to the Chair, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to wish you a merry Christmas. I wish a successful new year to all my colleagues who have remained in the Chamber, although I think that we might define success in different ways.

I am delighted to have the opportunity to return to an issue that I first raised when the House resumed after the summer recess on 15 October. It may be fitting, on the day before we break for Christmas, to highlight it again. It is the tragic and fatal mining accident that occurred on 12 October at Thoresby colliery in Nottinghamshire.

We were promised an inquiry into the accident. The Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Sir P. Beresford), said in written replies and correspondence with me that an inquiry was under way. I have also been in touch with the director general of the Health and Safety Executive, who has confirmed that an inquiry is taking place. So far we have merely had a press statement, which the Health and Safety Executive released at the end of October, confirming what we already knew: that there was an inrush of gas, oil and water and one man lost his life. We have not yet had a detailed report on the causes of the accident.

It is essential that the men who work in the industry and the wider community know the cause of the accident so that precautions can be taken and best practice can be put into operation.

Rumour and speculation abound in Nottinghamshire about the accident. Some say that it was caused by old oil industry boreholes, while others maintain that the evacuation procedures were not properly followed. Men who work down the colliery persistently complain that, before the accident, there were severe smells—worse than normal—in the pit.

On the day of the accident, R.J. Budge (Mining), which now operates the pit, did not contact all the mining unions. I remind the Leader of the House that Sir Bernard Crossland's inquiry into the Bilsthorpe colliery accident stressed the need for all unions to be involved because pit safety is a matter not just for management but for all those who work at a pit; no one should be denied the knowledge about the cause of an accident.

It is now two months since the accident and we are still waiting for a report. It is essential that we have one, but it is equally vital that a wider look is taken at pit safety. This is the first year in which the deep-mine coal industry in Britain is operating under private ownership and the record for major accidents appears to have deteriorated. It is common knowledge in the mining community that the number of major incidents has increased over the year. I am told that, at the end of October, the number of incidents was 64, compared with 42 in the previous period when the industry was controlled by British Coal. It therefore appears that major incidents have risen by 50 per cent.

When I wrote to the director general of the Health and Safety Executive asking whether the figures were correct, he could not confirm them. That gives rise to serious concerns because the HSE was set up to prevent accidents and promote good practice. It is not satisfactory that it should be unable to come clean about those figures. It clearly has the figures but will not release them. That is bad practice because working in the deep-mine coal industry is still a dangerous activity. I am not exaggerating when I say that it is a matter of life and death. Men's lives depend on examining accidents and propagating the knowledge gained so that precautions can be taken to stop them occurring again.

I hope that the Leader of the House has listened carefully to my complaints and will use his best endeavours to ensure that the report that we have been promised, which is now two months overdue, is soon put into the public domain.

Most important, I hope that he will read early-day motion 165, tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) and others, which states that mining records should be kept on a pit-by-pit and company-by-company basis so that we can identify what is going wrong. Those of us associated with the industry know that accidents will occur in pits, but we are determined to ensure that, when a tragedy occurs, we learn from it.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I wish to raise the case of a young constituent of mine, Neil Edwards from Creswell, who has suffered a serious accident. I promised that I would draw it to the House's attention in view of the bizarre circumstances that surround it. It is a story about declining safety standards in industry, fraud by an employer, lack of regulation and a dereliction of duty by the Health and Safety Executive.

Neil Edwards found a job advertised in a jobcentre to work at a sawmill in Clumber park, Worksop. He had been a building worker and had been laid off, so he took the job. The sawmill was owned by a fellow called Philip Gray and was run on land owned by the National Trust. Neil Edwards had been working there only since 9 September 1994 when he suffered a serious injury. All kinds of logs were lying on the ground and he slipped on one. As no proper guards protected employees from the machinery, his hand went into a machine and he was lucky to escape with his life. He was given emergency treatment and extensive surgery at hospital but lost part of his hand and fingers.

Neil Edwards' employer did not even report the serious accident under the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1985. As a result, the Health and Safety Executive was not informed of it and Neil Edwards' mother had to inform the HSE herself. It then examined the accident but did not prosecute, despite the fact that, only a few years previously, another employee, Mr. Ryan, had lost three fingers at the same sawmill.

As Neil's employer had not even paid sickness benefit, Neil Edwards decided to claim compensation from him under common law regulations. His employer told him, "Here's a few quid, kid. Keep your mouth shut," but young Neil refused to take the money. He decided that his employer was acting contrary to the law and took action to try to claim compensation. Despite the fact that wealthy people such as Roger Levitt and the Maxwell brothers were granted legal aid, young Neil Edwards was at first refused it. He would obviously never be able to work in the building industry again so he tried to get a few bob for having lost part of his hand, yet he could not even claim legal aid. I intervened and managed to get legal aid to take up the case.

I attempted to get common law payments. As former miners for a number of years before we came to this House, you and I, Mr. Deputy Speaker, would simply have taken action through the responsible lawyers and, as a result, the National Coal Board or British Coal would have had to foot the bill. In this case, there was no money because the employer had not even taken out compulsory liability insurance. He did not pay sickness benefit, did not have liability insurance, had not guarded the machinery correctly and had broken the law because he did not even report the case to the Health and Safety Executive.

The HSE was informed that liability insurance had not been taken out. It could have fined the employer, Philip Gray, £1,000 per day. Under this tawdry Government, who seem not to care—they are against regulation and all the rest of it—the Health and Safety Executive did nothing. It did not even rap him over the knuckles. It discovered that Mr. Gray had no assets, or said he had not, although he has been running a business, making a profit and doing so for several years. The legal aid lawyers said that they were unable to discover whether the man had assets that they could claim against so that Neil Edwards could get proper compensation.

The battle is still going on. I call on the Leader of the House to get in touch with the appropriate Government Departments, which are those that control or have some connection with the Health and Safety Executive, to ensure that it does its job correctly, to bear in mind cases like this when they talk about fraud by employees on the Department of Social Security, and to ensure that Philip Gray carries out the duties for which he is responsible.

As we all know, the Health and Safety Executive is just another quango. We have just found out that the medical wing is to be cut by 25 per cent., and that 14 senior HSE posts are to go. The story goes on and on. That may be why employers feel confident about taking risks with workers' safety. Not prosecuting criminals gives a green light to other bosses who are contemplating taking such risks. If the Government are so keen on law and order, they should look no further than the bosses whom they protect. Deregulating health and safety law for employers is a sure way of maiming more people like Neil Edwards.

Postscript: the Worksop jobcentre has just put another advertisement in the window to advertise Neil Edwards' job. The employer is carrying on. Neil Edwards has got no benefits. It is time that the Government did something about it.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) made a powerful case on behalf of his constituent. If we had had a little more time, we might have heard more details. My hon. Friend was the 13th hon. Member to speak this morning. That demonstrates the failure of this debate, which is part of a series of pre-Adjournment debates. Normally, about 20 hon. Members manage to contribute in the three hours. By and large, it has been a tradition for hon. Members to speak briefly and to raise no more than one or two subjects—that has always been my experience. Unfortunately, two speeches ran to 55 minutes, which has prevented all hon. Members who wished to participate from doing so.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): As you realise, Madam Speaker, I am the only hon. Member who has been present throughout the debate and who has been seeking to speak, but has been unable to do so. By taking 55 minutes, the hon. Members for Isle of Wight (Mr. Field) and for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) have prevented me from speaking on the state of our democracy. It might have been useful if I had been able to make my speech, so that they could respond. Obviously, they do not act within its spirit.

Mr. Rooker: My hon. Friend made the point that I was trying to make, but did so much more clearly. I hope that the Leader of the House will take that on board and that those who organise our business will do so to enable the maximum number of Members to benefit from this brief debate, which occurs only four times a year before a recess.

I cannot refer to all the speeches—I cannot even attempt to answer what amounted to an Adjournment debate about the Isle of Wight. My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) made a powerful case about the difficulties in his constituency and the creation of a two-tier health service. That case has to be answered and is typical of what is happening throughout the country.

The hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) referred to the difficulties at Holloway prison.

Mr. Tony Banks: He is not here.

Mr. Rooker: That may be so, but I still intend to raise this point.

The hon. Member for Gravesham made it clear that he had no sympathy for the inmates of Holloway prison. If the reports of the past few days are true and all the problems at Holloway prison were raised with the Minister of State, Home Office in July of this year, the situation at the prison should have come as no surprise when the inspectors walked in. Yesterday, one newspaper reported that a pregnant prisoner at Holloway was shackled to a male officer while undergoing an antenatal examination. Is that report about the situation inside the prison and the overzealousness true? That situation is disgraceful. People have lost their liberty. That is the penalty that we impose on them—we do not impose other penalties. If that report is true, it is unacceptable.

The hon. Member for Gravesham also mentioned—and other hon. Members were planning to do so—the lottery regulator and the astonishing decision taken by the Secretary of State for National Heritage yesterday evening. As a senior Cabinet Minister, will the Leader of the House say whether it is true that senior Cabinet Ministers ganged up on the National Heritage Secretary to keep that discredited regulator in his place, to avoid adverse publicity? Clearly, the man has lost the confidence of those in public affairs, who are concerned with the good name of the lottery. It has been an outstanding success and there is no argument about that, but the fact that he appears to have done nothing to stop Camelot selling the names of winners to junk mail firms adds to disquiet about its regulation. That is unacceptable and I warn the Leader of the House that the problem will not go away by keeping the gentleman in his job just to save some adverse publicity. It will probably rebound on this accident-prone Government early in the new year and it will be their own fault when it does.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) made a powerful point about the British citizen who is the subject of the vagaries of Japanese court action over the disclosure of the horrific scenes from Japanese whaling activities. The majority view in the House is that the hypocrisy of the Japanese about whaling is well known. They have always lied about the purpose of experimental whaling. It is well known where the meat ends up. The international community has not taken the matter seriously. I hope that there is no even-handedness or soft-glove treatment on the part of the Government simply because the Secretary of State for Defence is trying to persuade the Japanese to contribute troops to Bosnia. For all we know, it might be, "We'll keep quiet on this, if you help us out on the other."

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): Come off it.

Mr. Rooker: It is no good the right hon. Gentleman saying that. That is how things are done—behind closed doors.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Rooker: No. I ask the Leader of the House to deny that that is true and to give a commitment that the British Government will take a strong and positive stand against what the Japanese are doing and the fact that they are penalising a British citizen for making it known.

Several hon. Members mentioned education. In the brief time available, I want to raise a side issue, but one that is important. In the past few weeks, many of my hon. Friends have mentioned the position of the 400 colleges of further education, which serve 2.5 million students. It is becoming clear that the 5,000 governors of those colleges are in a very uncertain position regarding their financial liabilities. I must declare an interest as I was a governor for more than 20 years. We cannot get an answer from the Department for Education and Employment about the liabilities of such governors. They are not in the same position as directors or trustees, but they are the governors of a statutory, set-up authority.

Due to the effects of the Budget, some of those colleges will probably become insolvent in the forthcoming year. There needs to be a clear statement that, in terms of public service—these are unremunerated positions, by the way—those governors will not be placed at a worse risk than trustees and company directors. The Nolan committee is considering that aspect, although it is not considering protection for those 5,000 governors. If governors are put at risk because of the refusal of the Department for Education and Employment to make a clear statement, it will ruin the tradition of voluntary public service in this country. It is no good saying, as the Department for Education and Employment has more or less said, that one governor will have to take a test case to court. That is quite unacceptable. Many hon. Members have spoken about education issues, but that particular aspect deserves detailed examination by the Government early in the new year.

Before the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Mr. Coe) was elected to the House, many of us sat in front of our television sets and cheered him on as he ran for this country. The situation has, of course, changed since he entered the House, and today it was interesting to listen to him talk about sport—some of us thought that he might talk about fishing. I regret that you were not in the Chair at the time, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because the hon. Gentleman, who is a powerful source for such comments, spoke about the possible television tyranny of sport—I use my words, not his—and particularly cable television's shackling of rugby league players.

The House, particularly the Government, should listen to the hon. Gentleman's warning, which has also come from other hon. Members. Access to televised sporting events will be denied to millions of people in this country, which is unacceptable. If the Government want to avoid any defeats over the forthcoming Broadcasting Bill, they had better get the Bill and the policy right. There will be support from both sides of the House to ensure that millions of citizens of this country are not denied access to top sporting events, as that would damage future generations.

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): There has been unanimity on one aspect of the debate: wishing the occupant of the Chair—Madam Speaker or you, Mr. Deputy Speaker—a happy Christmas, but no one has seen fit to wish the Leader of the House a happy Christmas. If I were to seek to respond fully to everything that has been raised with me today, I would still be here at Christmas. I do not think that even my worst opponents in the House would wish that upon me.

All our Christmases have been brightened by the Swiss immigration authorities, to whom we owe the presence of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), who made his usual vigorous remarks. I doubt whether the Japanese Government would welcome his presence here today as much as we do, but he has certainly improved the quality of our debate. I am tempted to express the hope that the Swiss immigration authorities might have let him in because, as he did not have a passport, our authorities might not have let him back in. As this is Christmas, however, I do not think that I will pursue that matter any further.

I acknowledge that I shall clearly be unable to comment on all the speeches. Various hon. Members, including the hon. Members for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping) and for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth), raised important constituency issues and I shall ensure that those points, as well as any others that I do not cover, are drawn to the attention of the relevant Ministers.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) raised a specific point on whaling and I was slightly surprised that he did not know—I am sure that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West does—that the United Kingdom has been consistently critical of Japanese whaling for research purposes. At meetings of the international whaling conference we have played a major part in the adoption of several resolutions calling on countries to stop lethal research whaling in International Whaling Commission sanctuaries and for research on whales anywhere to be conducted using non-lethal means, except in exceptional circumstances. We have made it clear that we object to the use of the electric lance in that context. There is no doubt about the United Kingdom Government's position—that should be firmly on the record.

I understand that the legal action in Japan involving Mr. Votier is not a criminal prosecution but a civil lawsuit taken out by the Japanese Institute of Cetaceous Research, if I have the title correct. For the British Government to seek to interfere in civil proceedings in another country would not be easy—it would be difficult enough to interfere in criminal proceedings. I hope that that point will be registered.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) and the hon. Member for Perry Barr raised two important issues: Holloway and the lottery regulator. On the subject of Holloway, my hon. Friend the Minister of State, to whom I was speaking about the issue yesterday, visited Holloway last year, and as a result of that visit action was already being taken. In October more than £300,000 was added to Holloway's budget to provide extra staff and fully trained new staff are due to join next month. Senior management at headquarters are working with the governor to set firm targets for improvements and dates by which the targets should be achieved. Yesterday, arrangements were made to send 16 staff on loan to Holloway from other establishments to help ease the immediate problems. I hope that I have been able to give the hon. Member for Perry Barr some information and some reassurance that the problem is not only recognised but is already being tackled.

On the issue of the lottery regulator, I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham will have read the letter from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage to the regulator, dated yesterday, in which she made it clear that she expects him to "maintain a proper distance from the company"—

Camelot—

"and its constituent parts, and be seen to do so, taking all steps to guard against possible misunderstanding" of his actions.

In her letter my right hon. Friend drew attention to a number of factors, which I hope the hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend will, at the very least, bear in mind. The visits to America—the subject of the controversy—took place some months after the award of the main licence to Camelot. I do not think that anyone has suggested otherwise—certainly, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State accepted that there was no question of the regulator having sought or received personal gain from the visits that he undertook. It is important that that fact should at least be placed on the record.

In the remaining minutes I shall comment on as many issues as possible. My right hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) and my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham made a number of points about local authority spending on what they regard as political campaigning in respect of grant-maintained school ballots. Regulations limit local education authority expenditure on influencing the outcome of ballots. I acknowledge that my right hon. and hon. Friends do not regard those limits as adequate. Shortly after Christmas we expect a further education Bill on grant-maintained schools and my right hon. and hon. Friends may wish to pursue aspects of the argument in that context.

The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) and I had some exchanges about cold-weather payments during, I think, business questions last week and I do not think that I can add to what I said then. I also had some exchanges in the House about knives—I cannot add to what I said then. I shall ensure that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary is made aware of the hon. Gentleman's support for the private Member's Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) and that attention is drawn to the hon. Gentleman's other suggestions.

As usual, I have improved the range of my knowledge during our debate; I am unbelievably well informed about the Isle of Wight. I know the location of every lightship, buoy, sewer outfall, school and hospital and the size of the grant to the local citizens advice bureau—I shall be unable to cover all those issues. I now know much more about light dues around the British coast: apparently, they are administered by three general lighthouse authorities, including one called the commissioner of Irish lights, which no doubt operates as close to Belfast as anyone can. Fascinated though I am by the subject, I had better not engage in it any further today.

The hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) made a number of points about St. George's hospital—which I believe I visited when I was Minister for Health—and London health services in general. Clearly, I do not have time to rehearse that debate now. As a Member of Parliament who represents part of Essex, I know that the home counties, including Essex, have long felt that the sharing of resources between London and the home counties was not fair. I believe that the Government have been right to tackle that problem and to recognise the need to shift the resources to where the population has moved historically—to the counties around London.

My hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess), not for the first time in an Adjournment debate, made a number of references to Essex. I recognise his concerns about care in the community, and I am glad that, following the representations that a number of us made to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security, he has asked the social security inspectorate to consider the provision of community care in Essex.

I have made at least as many comments as I could have been expected to make in such a short time. I think I have done rather well. Even though nobody wished me a happy Christmas, I wish everyone a happy Christmas.

International Station (Stratford)

12.29 pm

Mr. Stephen Timms (Newham, North-East): Our most recent full debate on this topic was on the day before the Christmas recess in 1994, although it was at a somewhat less congenial hour—about 4.30 am. This shorter debate today gives us an opportunity to review the progress since then.

The then Secretary of State for Transport announced in 1991 that the channel tunnel rail link would run through east London, because it would bring regeneration to east London. If there were to be no station in east London, however, there would be no regeneration, either. In good faith, the Government should honour the commitment they made in choosing the route for the channel tunnel rail link.

The transport case for the Stratford station is a compelling one. Stratford is a better station location for users of the rail link based in east and much of south London. Given the Jubilee line extension, Stratford is better for users from Westminster, and for users from the City, Essex and East Anglia. I am pleased to see the hon. Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) in his place this morning, and that hon. Members from Essex and East Anglia have signed early-day motion 126.

The Thames Gateway Partnership was launched in the City at the European bank for reconstruction and development on 1 December. The event was extremely well attended, and it was distinguished by the strong support voiced for an international station at Stratford in the speeches of both the Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration, and Mr. Neil Kinnock, the European Transport Commissioner.

I wish to highlight the developments since the previous debate, because they have powerfully advanced the case for Stratford. I shall concentrate on just two: first, the July report of the Select Committee on Transport; secondly, the publication of the London Pride Partnership's transport action programme.

The Select Committee, after its exhaustive deliberations, gave a ringing endorsement to the Stratford proposal. It identified the national and regional importance of the Stratford proposal and urged that the necessary powers for the station under the transport and works legislation should be obtained as soon as possible. That was a welcome and important decision, which recognised the case for Stratford at national level, which we had not previously achieved. We debated that report last summer.

The second development I wish to highlight is the launch of the London Pride programme last month. That was significant, because of the breadth of support it has achieved from local government and the business sector in London. The transport action programme that London Pride has produced represents a remarkable consensus among all those concerned about the future of London.

In the foreword to the programme, signed by Lord Sheppard and Toby Harris, the leader of Haringey council and chairman of the Association of London Authorities, one of the main priorities of the programme of action is > "the award of the concession for the Channel Tunnel Rail Link with an international station at Stratford".

All the London boroughs, London First, the Confederation of British Industry and the London chamber of commerce have recognised the Stratford station decision as one of the keys to the future of transport in London. As the Stratford promoter group has shown, the proposal can be achieved at no cost to Government.

One of the benefits of the Stratford station proposal is the excellent onward connections that Stratford can offer to the north. The Minister may be aware that the proposal, in its initial form, for additional tunnelling at Islington—which I support—could jeopardise some of those connections. Newham council, of which I am still a member, is working with the London borough of Islington on a proposal that would give the extra protection in Islington that the Select Committee advocated, without jeopardising Stratford's link to the west coast main line.

When we debated this topic at 4.30 am a year ago, the Minister intimated that a final decision would be announced in spring 1995. We have not yet had that decision, and I understand that there will be a decision in January. I appeal to the Minister to make a real and substantial decision. Some people are saying that the Government will duck the issue, by leaving it to somebody else to make the decision. It is a priority for the capital, as London Pride has demonstrated, and it is important to the national interest, as the Select Committee has shown.

This matter cannot be left to the vagaries of purely commercial decision-making. The Government need to make this decision; they have always suggested that they will; and I hope that the Minister will be able to confirm today that that remains their intention. The Government should now resolve swiftly, clearly and unequivocally in favour of Stratford International.

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): Unfortunately, I am advised that the procedures of the House mean that, as I have already spoken this morning, I cannot make a separate speech. However, I can intervene.

I wonder whether the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Timms) understands my personal commitment to Newham. As the House has become tired of hearing, it is the place where I was born, and I still have family there. The case for having the international railway station at Stratford is very strong. There is enormous support from Conservative Members of Parliament in Essex and in East Anglia for having the international railway station at Stratford.

From my point of view, on the Conservative Benches, I am very proud that the Conservative Government built the channel tunnel, and I am very proud of what they did in the London docklands. I believe fundamentally that the case for the international railway station being at Stratford will enhance the success of the docklands. There will be an enormous benefit for constituents in Essex and East Anglia if we have the railway station at Stratford.

Does the hon. Member join me in hoping that my hon. Friend the Minister will give the House a Christmas present by announcing in the new year that the railway station will be at Stratford?

Mr. Timms: I gladly endorse many of the points that the hon. Member has made, especially the last one about the aspiration for a Christmas present from the Minister. I gladly acknowledge and put on the record the long-standing and unwavering support that the hon. Member has given to the interests of Newham and to the case for the international station at Stratford. I agree with his assessment of the importance of this proposal, not just for east London, but for Essex and East Anglia. I have already said that I especially appreciate the support that many Conservative Members have given to the proposals by signing the early-day motion.

The channel tunnel was built by a private sector organisation rather than by the Government, but I agree with the hon. Member for Basildon that it is an important element of our infrastructure. We need to ensure that it brings benefit not just to London, but to Essex and East Anglia. An international station at Stratford would help to make that possible.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Stratford is in my constituency, but I am in favour of the proposed international station not because of a narrow constituency interest, but because, as my hon. Friend has rightly said, the project involves all London. I am glad that the three Members who represent Newham, together with supporters on the Government Benches, have worked together on the campaign for Stratford international station.

Does my hon. Friend agree that that campaign is an example of the public and private sectors working together? Organisations across London of all political persuasions have said that the station should be located at Stratford, as have Conservative Members. Is that not a perfect example of a co-operative venture? Does my hon. Friend agree that that should impress the Government? Given the enormous support across the House and across London and the south-east for the station to be located at Stratford, we cannot understand why it has taken the Government so long to make a decision.

Mr. Timms: I agree. I am particularly pleased that my hon. Friend is with us this morning, and I know that to some extent we owe that to the immigration authorities at Zurich.

A year ago, the Minister acknowledged the impressive nature of the public-private sector partnership which supports the Stratford proposal. I agree with my hon. Friend: I hope that the Minister and the Government will swiftly make the decision for which so many of us have been pressing for such a long time.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): I am glad to join my hon. Friends from Newham, and the support from Basildon of all places, in praising a multi-party, multi-beneficial investment in public transport. I say "public transport" even though there may be a slightly different emphasis on the manner in which it is funded. That is now less important than the principle.

I am also glad to support the Stratford proposal because I can support, surprisingly enough, two aspects of Government policy that are intimately connected with it. That may sound strange, but it is absolutely true.

The first policy with which I agree is the provision of the station works at Stratford without cost to the public purse. That will not come under the various formulae that we have talked about or the private finance initiative, but it will be funded by the Stratford Development Partnership and those in the area who are willing to provide the capital for the station inside the concrete box that is part of the works that have been agreed. That is wholly in line with the Government's policy of private enterprise, and development from private means. On this occasion at least, the Opposition have no objection to that.

The second aspect of Government policy with which I agree is something that I heard the Secretary of State for Transport, no less, express only this morning on "Today"—a programme which often reflects, or perhaps leads, rightly or wrongly, what happens in the Chamber. He said that the Government want more and more people to travel by rail. That is good news, particularly when congestion is caused by cars and other traffic in Greater London. A station at Stratford would contribute not just to international facilities but to traffic flow in Greater London. We all know that people choose to travel by the underground not just because of the time saved, but because of the convenience of it.

Hon. Members will be aware that the Stratford location is truly extraordinary. Whether trains from the channel tunnel rail link will eventually stop there or not, the existing rail network from Stratford is considerable. Fortunately, I have time to spell out the links from Stratford to other parts of Greater London. One can travel around the North London link to Richmond, Cambridge and beyond, to Stansted airport.

Stratford is linked to two branches of the Central line, one to Epping and one to Hainault. It is linked to two, possibly three branches of the Great Eastern line to Southend, Clacton, Chelmsford and Norwich. It is also possible to take a night service from Stratford to Barking and Southend, and indeed to Basildon by another route.

In future, there may be a permanent service operating every half an hour from Stratford to the royal docks, and beyond, under the Thames, to Woolwich and north Kent, should the proposed link be built. At the moment, it is perfectly possible to travel to north Woolwich and the important development and exhibition centres and the university college of East London at the royal docks.

Stratford will also be connected to the Jubilee line, on which it will be possible to travel to London Bridge, Waterloo, Westminster, central London and beyond. Stratford is also on the docklands light railway, which connects to Canary Wharf, which is an important development, whatever one may think of it. It may well be possible, should that line be extended, to travel on to Lewisham.

Stratford is also on the Central line, and is thus linked to central London through the Oxford street access. In addition, if crossrail is built, that would add a through line to Paddington, London airport, Reading and perhaps as far south as Bristol or Exeter. Such is the network to which Stratford has, or is soon likely to have, access.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): I do not want to pour cold water on the comments of the hon. Members for Newham, North-East (Mr. Timms) and for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), who have said that passengers from south London and Kent would be able to use Stratford station, but may I remind them that Ebbsfleet international station has already been approved for the route? Due to the excellence of the South Eastern Railway Company, it will be able to cater precisely for those people from south London and Kent. That does not detract, however, from the advantages of Stratford to Essex and north London.

Mr. Spearing: The hon. Member speaks for north Kent, and Ebbsfleet will be a valuable link on the network. We all know that there are breakdowns on every line for good or bad reasons. If trains have to stop at Ebbsfleet, it may be possible to change to alternative routes. It is to those alternatives that I wish to refer.

The channel tunnel rail link should go to King's Cross and St. Pancras by some means or another. Many visitors to London get taxis from King's Cross or St. Pancras to their hotels or an exhibition centre, so they are the preferable stations to which the rail link should go. A station at Stratford would also offer additional access to the channel tunnel rail link to many people in Greater London through designated trains or routes, and could provide luggage facilities for passengers. If things go wrong—they go wrong in the best regulated circumstances—trains have to be reversed from a station further out—for example, Reading. A station at Stratford would offer an additional facility to cope with such problems.

I believe that the choice of Stratford would add to the returns of traffic on the route. We know that the rail link has been subject to financial difficulties, so I suggest to the Minister that everything points to supporting the works order, and thus creating a station at Stratford.

The Minister for Railways and Roads (Mr. John Watts): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Timms) for bringing this important matter to the attention of the House again. As he reminded us, we last debated it a year ago, at a less sociable hour. I know that he and many other hon. Members have campaigned long and vigorously for an intermediate station at Stratford. I understand their concern and impatience that a decision should be made without further delay. I therefore welcome the opportunity to inform the House of the current position on the proposal.

On the occasion of our previous debate, I explained the process by which the Government had reached decisions to date about intermediate stations on the rail link. I described the position as it then stood, and how we saw things moving forward to a final decision. I also acknowledged that an international station would assist the regeneration of the Stratford area. I also drew attention, however, to the need to be sure that there was a good economic case for it.

At that time, we were hopeful that we would be able to reach a decision in the early part of this year. In the event, the nature and complexity of the bids received from the consortia bidding to construct and operate the rail link, and their proposals for a possible Stratford station, meant that that decision has had to be delayed. I do not apologise for that, because the Government have to be sure that they make the right decision on the basis of all the necessary information. The important thing is that no time has been wasted in the process of reaching a decision.

The Government and the two short-listed consortia have had the opportunity to address the concerns expressed in the various recommendations of the Select Committee on Transport, which considered the Channel Tunnel Rail Link Bill.

Mr. Tony Banks: The Minister said that the Government must ensure that they make the right decision. When reaching a decision about Stratford, will the Minister take into account strategic reasons, or will he look only at the commercial case put by the developers? He said that the Government must make the right decision. What factors will influence the Government?

Mr. Watts: I shall come to that issue in a moment. The Government will be influenced by a broad range of factors, including some of those to which the hon. Gentleman has alluded.

The Stratford promoter group has continued to lobby very hard, and there have been a number of meetings with Ministers. I agree with the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) that it is an excellent example of public sector and private sector co-operation, the like of which we are seeing increasingly in London and around the country.

The group made presentations both to the former Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney), and to me in February. I also had the pleasure of accepting an invitation to visit Stratford in March on a very wet day, and I was impressed by the strength of support from the local community. More recently, the Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris), has also met representatives of the group.

The group has argued that patronage of, and therefore revenue from, the CTRL would be increased, that the station could be built at no cost to the Government, and that there would be substantial regeneration benefits. It has argued strongly that the total realised from the sale of development lands in the area would exceed the cost of providing the station, and that the site offers the prospect of a major new public transport interchange of national and international significance. It is accepted that Stratford is now an extremely important public transport interchange, and I can see advantages in expanding that role. I know, too, that a great deal of work has been done in estimating land values and on associated planning issues.

The promoter group's funding proposals rely heavily on income to be derived from the sale of development lands—the Stratford railway lands. The Government have always reserved the right to consider other funding approaches and have invited the CTRL bidders to put forward alternative funding proposals if they so wish.

However, in order to ensure that the approach of the station promoter group remains viable, the Government undertook to ensure that the Stratford railway lands should remain available pending a decision on the future of the station. Concern has been expressed from time to time as to whether that is still the case, and I am happy to confirm the assurances that I and other Ministers have given, that there will be no piecemeal disposals and that the Stratford railway lands will remain fully available until a decision on the station is made.

Mr. Timms: I am grateful to the Minister for that assurance. In raising again the decision about Stratford, do the Government intend to decide for or against the Stratford station, or will they allow someone else to make the decision? I urge the Minister to assure the House that the Government will make that decision.

Mr. Watts: I shall come to that issue. We might make a decision in favour of the station, but we shall not make a decision against it. I will explain that comment later. I assure hon. Members that we shall certainly not duck a decision.

The Government will decide shortly whether a Stratford station should be provided now, and, if so, whether it should be a combined international and domestic station or an international station only. The possibility of having a station at some point in the future has already been secured as a result of the Government's acceptance this summer of the recommendations from the Select Committee on the Channel Tunnel Rail Link Bill.

The promoter will now be required to construct a long box at Stratford rather than the shorter version envisaged originally, which would have met only the operational requirements of the railway. The long box will be large enough to house the platforms and the other passenger facilities that are needed for a combined international and domestic station. Even if the decision is taken next year not to provide a station immediately, the possibility of adding one at a later stage will remain.

The decision will be either "yes" or "possibly in the future". It will not be "no", because the possibility of a station has been secured by the requirement to build the long box as part of the main construction of the link.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): At the beginning of the CTRL affair, British Rail espoused the wonderful theory that the economics of building a railway meant that, the fewer stops there were, the more money would be made. I am relieved to discover that Ministers have taken a rather different view. Will my hon. Friend confirm that it is easier for passengers to get on and off the train when it stops?

Mr. Watts: My hon. Friend is absolutely correct. Too many stops may reduce the frequency of services and may diminish revenue, but if the argument that it is better for trains not to stop is pursued to its logical conclusion, it means running trains that stop only at each end of the line—which would probably not maximise revenue.

The Government will decide whether to proceed immediately and, if so, how that would be financed. However, the views of the two short-listed bidders on the costs and benefits of such a station, and particularly the effect that it would have in terms of increasing or reducing the contribution sought from Government for the project, are key factors in that decision.

The bidders have been instructed to treat the long box as a minimum requirement, to price for a fully combined international and domestic station, and then to say how their bids would be adjusted for an international station only or no station at all. In that way, we shall receive the full range of available financial information.

Mr. Spearing: With regard to the comments of the hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe), does the Minister agree that the existence of some clause of which people are unaware, that traffic and fares are directly related to some formula involving distance and journey time, would be incompatible with the commonly held view? Stopping at a station may add only five minutes to the journey time but prove of inestimable benefit to many people, and thus increase traffic and revenue at the same time.

Mr. Watts: An extra stop might reduce the total number of trains that could be run. Against that, we must balance the extent to which the provision of an extra stop might generate additional passengers and revenue. Those are the sort of judgments that we must take on the basis of the best evidence available. The bidding consortia are also considering those matters when submitting their bids to us and indicating whether a scheme with a Stratford station is a better business proposition than a scheme without it.

If a decision is made in favour of a station, it will be promoted by an order under the Transport and Works Act 1992, which will provide the mechanism for the necessary planning consents. The process of securing such an order could begin next year, and, subject to securing the necessary approvals, should be capable of being completed and the station constructed within the same time scale as the completion of construction of the rail link.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): Will the Minister give the House an absolute assurance that the final decision will be based on all strategic considerations, including the recognition by his predecessors, such as the present Deputy Prime Minister, that it is not simply a transport project but a vital contribution to the economic infrastructure of the area? Will he assure us that that strategic decision will be taken by the Government, and not by any consortium for commercial reasons?

Mr. Watts: I have already said that the Government will make the decision, and that we shall take into account a wide range of factors, including the strategic considerations to which the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Newham, North-West have referred.

Apart from the CTRL effects and other transport benefits, another key factor in the decision-making process will be the regeneration benefits to be derived from an international station. The hon. Members for Newham, North-West, for Newham, North-East and for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) have been persuasive advocates of the contribution that a station would make to the regeneration of the Stratford area. We had substantial correspondence on that point following last year's debate.

I do not accept that east London would derive no economic benefits if there were no station development at Stratford. There is already substantial investment in transport, infrastructure and so on in east London. None the less, I accept—as I did when replying to the debates last year and in March—that a CTRL station at Stratford would prove a significant additional boost to those initiatives, and to the development of the Thames gateway as a whole.

In evaluating bids, the Government will carefully consider the assumptions about the viability of the station, the scope and nature of regeneration benefits, and the possible impact on the CTRL generally of a Stratford station. We shall also take into account other possible developments in transport infrastructure, such as the opening of the Jubilee line extension in 1998, and how traffic patterns and levels of use on existing and proposed transport links might respond to the opening of an international station.

In reaching their views on the costs and benefits of the various options, the two bidders have had the opportunity of extensive discussions with the Stratford promoter group. By deferring a decision until the final bids from the two short-listed consortia have been received, we have sought to give the promoter group and the bidders the maximum opportunity to make their best case for a station.

Mr. Deputy Speaker(Sir Geoffrey Lefthouse): Order. Time is up.

Schools (Broadstairs)

1 pm

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (South Thanet): I am most grateful to have been given the opportunity to raise in an Adjournment debate the subject of schools in Broadstairs.

I shall devote most of my speech to the individual and separate problems of three schools in Broadstairs that have become most inappropriately entangled in a complex dispute and need some help—perhaps even a touch of the wisdom of Solomon—from my hon. Friend the Minister if the dispute is to be sorted out swiftly and satisfactorily to the benefit of several hundred local schoolchildren, their anxious families and their worried teachers.

Before I focus on the dispute and make some suggestions for solving it, I shall make some general comments on the wider subject of school education in Broadstairs because it is, on the whole, a sparkling success story in which our local community rightly takes great pride.

Broadstairs is a charming town on the Kent coast with a residential population of approximately 25,000 and a flourishing education sector consisting of 12 schools. They include at secondary level Holy Cross school and St. George's grant-maintained school, whose GCSE examination results last year were top of the league tables for non-selective schools in Kent and second top in the league table for modern schools in the entire country. Charles Dickens grant-maintained school has a new science block under construction and scored a commendable 89 per cent. pass rate among its GCSE candidates taking five or more subjects. Dane Court grant-maintained school had its best ever year for examination results last year, with a 95 per cent. pass rate among GCSE candidates taking five or more subjects.

At junior level, Broadstairs has three good schools: Upton, Bromstone and St. Peter's, to which I shall refer in a moment. There are also two infant schools: St. Mildred's and Callis Grange, which also features in the dispute that is central to the debate.

I should also mention that the independent sector flourishes in Broadstairs with Haddon Dene school, St. Joseph's convent school and Wellesley House school—the latter being one of the outstanding preparatory schools in the country. Perhaps I should declare an interest as I say those words of praise about Wellesley House, as our own three children have had remarkably happy and successful educations there.

What all those schools in Broadstairs have in common are high standards, dedicated teachers and a keen sense of mutual interest and interaction with the local community. When something goes right, such as the good examination results that I have just mentioned, the whole community sits up and takes notice.

The same is also true, however, if something goes wrong. That is why I now refer to a subject that is in danger of going wrong on the Broadstairs education scene—the dispute affecting three schools—and that is the main focus of the debate.

At the heart of the dispute is a question mark hanging over the future of one of the oldest and most respected schools in Broadstairs. That is St. Peter's school, or to give it its formal title, St. Peter's in Thanet Church of England aided junior school. Unfortunately, St. Peter's also has the less happy distinction of having some of the worst premises in the entire county in the shape of its 19th-century physical facilities.

St. Peter's has the fundamental disadvantage of being a split-site school, with its two main buildings separated by a high street. The busy traffic creates daily physical risks for the pupils. The buildings deserve the overworked adjective "Dickensian", for they are overcrowded, unhealthy, damp and dangerous.

To give the House a vivid picture of St. Peter's in the winter rain, I can do no better than quote a report written last autumn by the school's then chairman of governors, Mr. Norman Morland:

> "As chairman of governors I visited the school on Wednesday 13 October, following several days of heavy autumnal rain. For the sake of the morale of all concerned, I went over to the high street building and can only say that I was appalled by what I saw. The atmosphere was akin to that of a hot house in Kew. Buckets and bowls were everywhere to catch the rain. Water was trickling down one of the walls, the pages of the books were curling up in the moisture-laden air, there was fungus on the cupboard walls. The catalogue could continue on and on.
> In the midst of all this the staff and the pupils worked heroically and deserve the highest commendation for continuing in conditions that are totally unacceptable and are deleterious to health of pupil and teacher."

So much for the bad news, which was well recorded in Mr. Morland's vivid prose and confirmed by a recent report by the Office of Standards in Education inspectorate. However, that bad news is on the verge of being consigned to the archives of history because the good news is that the local education authority, Kent county council and the Canterbury diocesan board of education, after many long and disappointing delays, have put forward an excellent proposal for a new St. Peter's school building.

That building project, which received no objections during the consultation period and was overwhelmingly well supported by the local community, is for a new, enlarged third-form entry junior school for 360 pupils. The new St. Peter's school would consist of 12 classrooms to be built around a central courtyard on land already owned by the local education authority adjacent to Callis Grange infant school. The funding for the project—some £1.6 million—is now in place, so until the recent unexpected dispute erupted, the new St. Peter's school was ready to roll, confidently on schedule to open its doors in September 1997.

I should emphasise that the new St. Peter's school building is being developed alongside another important school building development on the same site—that of Callis Grange county infant school. Callis Grange school, which currently has 356 pupils on its roll, suffers from an overcrowding problem, which has been temporarily alleviated by the use of five mobile classrooms and a mobile toilet block.

The facilities are woefully inadequate, particularly in the freezing, wind-chill weather conditions that prevailed last week. The LEA recognised the problem, which is exacerbated by the growing demand for school places in Broadstairs, and gave its full backing to a building project that would enlarge the school by 90 extra places. That means building new classroom accommodation to cope with the expected increase in the school roll and to replace some of the mobiles. The enlargement of Callis Grange school is scheduled to take place in time for the new classrooms to be opened in September 1997. As the project is being built on the same site and time scale as the new St. Peter's school, the two developments need to proceed simultaneously.

Against that background, I hope that it is clear to my hon. Friend that the substantial combined building project of a new school for St. Peter's and enlarged classrooms for Callis Grange is important and urgent in terms of the physical facilities and the basic need for more school places in Broadstairs.

Broadstairs is sometimes thought of as a town for retired people, but the community is becoming demographically more well balanced and has an increasing number of young families moving into the area. There was consternation among those young families, whose children require adequate provision for primary and infant school places, when the news broke recently that the St. Peter's and Callis Grange building projects had been halted in their tracks because of a totally unexpected and unpredictable obstacle in the form of eight letters of statutory objection signed by 10 Broadstairs residents. They were all dated 9 November. The letters were received by my hon. Friend's Department just two days before the period for objections to the public notices expired on 12 November. Those objections have the explosive potential to block or seriously delay the St. Peter's and Callis Grange school building developments unless they are withdrawn or my hon. Friend uses her statutory ministerial powers swiftly to overrule them.

I said a few moments ago that the unexpected arrival of those last-minute objections caused consternation in Broadstairs, but in some ways the word "consternation" is an understatement. For I am sorry to have to report that there was also a degree of anger and astonishment when it became apparent that the letters of objection were identical in text and had apparently been organised by the Roman Catholic archdiocese of Southwark's commission for schools in Kent, in order to draw attention to the plight of St. Joseph's convent school in Broadstairs, which faced the possibility of closure.

Needless to say, there are two sides to this story and I shall endeavour to explain sympathetically and constructively the anxieties of the archdiocese of Southwark about St. Joseph's in a moment. Nevertheless the manner and format in which those essentially bogus, although paradoxically sincere, objections were lodged raised the bizarre spectacle of a sectarian divide in Broadstairs, in which Roman Catholics were suspected of blocking the urgently needed building of a Church of England school.

I hasten to assure the House that those fears are not justified. Broadstairs has not suddenly become Belfast. The religious communities in the town remain on good terms, not least because local Catholic leaders such as Father Ronald Duggan, the parish priest of Broadstairs, and Canon Bill Clements, the dean of Thanet, have made it clear that the local Roman Catholic community has no objections to the St. Peter's school building project.

Meanwhile the Church of England vicar of St. Peter's, Canon Nick Bury, who is also chairman of the governors of St. Peter's school, has made it clear that there is nothing but Anglican good will towards St. Joseph's convent school, whose future aspirations should not affect the St. Peter's building project at all and should be seen as a quite separate issue, important though it is to the Catholic community of Broadstairs.

Let me therefore now refer to the separate issue of the future of St. Joseph's convent school. That excellent independent private school, which has approximately 100 Catholic pupils of primary school age, has for many years been run and subsidised by the sisters of the Christian retreat in Broadstairs. Sadly, the sisters, whose numbers and resources are declining, have decided that they can no longer continue to subsidise the operation of the school after 1997.

The archdiocese of Southwark, after taking local soundings in Broadstairs, came to the conclusion that, rather than see a much loved Catholic school close, it would make greater sense to try to continue the excellent traditions of St. Joseph's by seeing whether it could be taken into the maintained sector as a primary school. Confidential discussions between the LEA and the archdiocese for that purpose therefore started earlier this year.

I think it fair to say that there must have been some misunderstandings in those discussions, since for some reason or other the archdiocese came to believe that the only way to protect the future interest of St. Joseph's was to lodge objections to the St. Peter's and Callis Grange building project at the last minute in order to draw the attention of the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Minister to the full background of primary school options in Broadstairs. I hope that I have now explained enough about the background to primary school education in Broadstairs to demonstrate that there is a basic need for, and room for, a new and enlarged St. Peter's Church of England primary school and a St. Joseph's Roman Catholic primary school, transferred from the independent sector to the maintained sector as a voluntary-aided Roman Catholic school.

Since I started balloting for this Adjournment debate, further talks have been held between the LEA and the archdiocese of Southwark. A few days ago the Kent education committee, with much input and encouragement from Councillor Fred Shutler, the energetic county councillor for Broadstairs, decided to support the proposal to establish a new voluntary-aided Roman Catholic primary school in Broadstairs in September 1997, on the basis that the LEA will be submitting a bid for 90 additional primary school places for Thanet in 1997. Those additional places, taken together with the existing roll of St. Joseph's, will provide ample justification for the proposed new one-form entry primary school.

Against that background, and even though there is no real linkage between the St. Joseph's and the St. Peter's projects, it does seem that this should be a story that will have a happy outcome early in 1996, bringing to an end the current tense dispute affecting the three schools that I have been talking about.

So in order that those three schools can live happily ever after, I now ask my hon. Friend to respond, I hope affirmatively, to the key questions that need to be answered. So far as St. Joseph's is concerned, can my hon. Friend confirm that her Department has received, or expects to receive, a bid from Kent local education authority for additional primary school places for Thanet in 1997? Will she look favourably on the proposal, which

I know her officials are aware of, for a new St. Joseph's voluntary-aided Roman Catholic primary school, to open in September 1997?

So far as St. Peter's school and Callis Grange school are concerned, can my hon. Friend the Minister announce that she is now minded—or soon will be minded—to approve the LEA's and the Canterbury diocesan board's proposals for the combined building projects to go ahead as planned and in good time for the new St. Peter's school and the new Callis Grange classrooms to open their doors in September 1997?

If my hon. Friend is minded, in this season of peace and good will, to indicate her approval for all those projects this afternoon, I can assure her that she will be giving the education world in Broadstairs the best possible Christmas present.

1.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mrs. Cheryl Gillan): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for South Thanet (Mr. Aitken) on securing this important Adjournment debate on the schools in his constituency. He is well known as a champion of the excellent education in South Thanet, and his diligence in requesting this debate is a testament to his attitude to his constituency and its schools.

I want to begin by discussing some general issues that my right hon. Friend raised, not least the sparkling success of the schools in his constituency. I am delighted to hear about the high standards being achieved in Broadstairs schools, which clearly owe much to the excellent quality of the teaching. Once again, we must applaud the enthusiasm and dedication of the teaching profession, which has so rightly been described as a vocation.

School improvement is always at the top of the Government's agenda. It is also encouraging to note that this year's GCSE results for Broadstairs continue to be good. I am aware that three of the four secondary schools are grant-maintained, and their success is a testament to the GM policy.

We firmly believe that self-government is the best way of running schools. It sets schools free to decide for themselves how they use their resources and to target them where they will have most effect. It means that they can keep and develop their distinctive characters to meet the needs of the communities that they serve. Self-government releases the energies of teachers and governors by giving them responsibility for their schools' futures, and they certainly rise to that challenge. GM schools are well managed, achieve excellent results as they have done in Broadstairs, and are clearly popular with parents. They can get things done quickly, without waiting for town hall bureaucracy to get things moving, and they are directly accountable to local parents.

In Kent, more than half the secondary pupils are now being educated in GM schools. Parents have voted yes in ballots on going GM, so it is pretty clear that Kent parents support self-government of schools. It is a pity that we do not often see a positive approach on the part of Kent county council. It has been quite hostile to grant-maintained status, and it makes life as difficult as possible once schools have decided to ballot.

The development of GM schools is only one aspect of the Government's mission to promote excellence in education. We are also f[illegible] initiatives to encourage the development of specialist schools, which bring together three important strands of our education and employment policies: raising standards, extending choice and diversity, and linking schools and the business community. My right hon. Friend will be aware of the popularity of our specialist schools programme; indeed Sandwich high school, in South Thanet, has recently been designated a technology college. That programme proves that education and business want to work together. Each technology or language college is backed by sponsorship of about £100,000; private sector sponsorship for school education totals more than £14 million as a result of the programme.

The specialist schools programme is outstandingly popular. It was launched only in September 1993, but there are now more than 140 schools in it. There are 127 technology colleges as well as the first 16 language colleges. As there is stiff competition for places in the programme, all the schools approved can be proud of their success.

I have more good news about Kent to add to that presented by my right hon. Friend. We have been able to confirm our support for capital spending on schools. The figures for Kent are not available, but we have national figures, as I announced yesterday. Despite the tight public spending round, we have been able to secure capital spending for 1996-97 in local education authority maintained schools at a level that is 7 per cent. higher than the current year. That demonstrates the Government's commitment to helping LEAs improve the quality of their school buildings.

It is for LEAs, however, to decide their own capital expenditure priorities and to make the best use of the resources that are available to them. The annual capital guidelines, the ACGs, that have been announced are not tied to particular projects. Nor do they represent the total of resources available to LEAs for capital spending. The authorities are able also to invest their capital receipts. They can use funds from their revenue budgets for capital purposes if they wish. The Government do not control the funding of individual projects at county or voluntary-controlled schools.

The Kent local education authority was given an ACG of £23,223,000 in 1996-97. That was by far the largest in the country. That sum represents 40 per cent. of its total bid. It is significantly above the national average of 23 per cent. The ACG largely reflects the extent to which the authority's plans for spending on schools matched the national priority criteria.

Allocations for voluntary-aided schools' capital works have increased by 7 per cent. to £62 million in 1996-97. There has been set aside £38 million for repair grants in line with 1995-96.

Allocations for basic need and exceptional basic need will be much higher in 1996-97 than in recent years. They will be about £6.6 million compared with £2.5 million in 1995-96. The allocations for grant-maintained schools continue to show a healthy increase as well, from £130 million in the current year to £138 million in 1996-97. Those figures demonstrate the Government's commitment to improving standards in education. The examples given by my right hon. Friend provide encouraging evidence of the success of our policies in practice.

My right hon. Friend drew the attention of the House to Callis Grange and St. Peter's schools in Thanet. Both schools are in Broadstairs. I am sure that my right hon.

[Mrs. Cheryl Gillan]

Friend will appreciate that as an enlarged county infant school and a new Church of England junior in Broadstairs will be considered in the context of statutory proposals, those matters are currently under consideration by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. Therefore, I cannot comment in detail on the issues that he raised. I am well aware, however, of the problems surrounding the provision of primary school places in Broadstairs.

My officials visited St. Peter's junior school earlier this year. They were able to advise the governors and Kent LEA on how to proceed. My right hon. Friend will understand that I cannot prejudge the decision of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. I can assure my right hon. Friend, however, that I have listened carefully to what he said about the condition of the buildings used by pupils at Callis Grange and St. Peter's. I can give him my assurance that his description and the details that he has given will be taken into account.

Mr. Aitken: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the constructive and helpful tone in which she is replying. I understand that, for statutory reasons, she cannot prejudge the ruling of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. But what is the timetable within which my right hon. Friend will make a decision? If it is a favourable one, will it be made in good time to allow the building works to start within a period that will enable them to be completed so that the schools may open their doors in September 1997?

Mrs. Gillan: I understand my right hon. Friend's determination to try to extract from me a timetable, but I am unable to give him one today. I undertake to write to him in the new year. I shall try to give him an idea of the timetable for my right hon. Friend's decisions.

As for St. Joseph's school, I should explain that we have not yet received any statutory proposals to establish a new voluntary-aided Roman Catholic primary school in Broadstairs. That remains an outstanding matter. If and when we do receive such proposals, we shall consider them fully and carefully, and as speedily as possible.

On a more positive note, I can confirm that we have accepted in principle the basic need case for additional primary school places in Broadstairs. For reasons that I think I have explained fully, I cannot comment on whether those places will be provided at St. Peter's and St. Joseph's, bearing in mind the need for the statutory process. I cannot go beyond saying that, if the proposals are approved, funding will, of course, follow.

I am sorry that I am unable to deliver all the Christmas presents on my right hon. Friend's list. I trust that he will accept my reply as just a little stocking filler.

Knockhill Motor Sport Centre

1.26 pm

Ms Rachel Squire (Dunfermline, West): I am pleased to have the opportunity to discuss the future of motor sport facilities in Scotland. I shall use the debate to highlight the success of Scotland's national motor sport centre at Knockhill in my constituency and express the grave concerns that I and many others have that a proposed alternative facility at Forrestburn in Lanarkshire could lead to no winners, only losers, and a waste of public money.

If the Minister and other right hon. and hon. Members want an exciting day out, I recommend that they head for Knockhill rather than remain at Westminster. Knockhill is recognised by the Scottish Sports Council and the Scottish Motor Sport Federation as Scotland's national motor sport centre. The track deals with a wide range of car and motor cycle racing. It was declared the circuit of the year by the Touring Car Association. If the Minister and other right hon. and hon. Members want to visit a successful private enterprise, I recommend Knockhill.

The track was rescued from receivership some years ago by the director, Derek Butcher, who has put more than £3 million of his own money into the venture. Knockhill has not received any public funding for capital expenditure yet it employs 16 full-time permanent staff directors. The track supports three franchise businesses on site with a further 10 permanent staff. It takes on up to an additional 100 part-time staff when there is a big event. It thus makes a considerable contribution to the local economy. In addition, when there is a big event such as the British championship for touring cars, hotels in the Fife area are fully booked. The circuit manager, Eric Houston, said:

> "We put more people into hotels than Open Golf does", and that is once a year, not once every four years.

Knockhill's success, however, is threatened by the proposed development at Forrestburn. I can understand the Minister saying that that is a shame but asking why it should concern the Government. Let me explain.

The Minister is aware that, because of their industrial decline, parts of Fife and parts of Lanarkshire are eligible for support from European structural funds. That means that decisions on proposed programmes for areas that seek European funding are taken by committees. The principal committees involved in taking decisions on individual projects such as that at Forrestburn are, I understand, the programme management committees for eastern and western Scotland. They are chaired by the Scottish Office development department, acting on behalf of the Government as the official implementing authority for European Union funding programmes.

The first reason, therefore, why the Government should be concerned about the future of Knockhill and the proposed development at Forrestburn is that the Scottish Office retains responsibility for the payment of European grant money and is ultimately responsible for the audit requirements. My understanding is that Forrestburn has been allocated £1.4 million in European grant money, so the Government have a direct interest.

The second reason why the Government should be concerned about the Forrestburn development is that there is strong evidence that the use of European money to support the project will, in effect, displace an existing facility—in other words, it will put Knockhill out of business. I understand that such a displacement contravenes the rules for European funding.

The Treasury defines displacement as occurring when support for one project has the effect of reducing economic activity in other parts of the economy. I understand that a displacement analysis has been undertaken, but considerable concern has been expressed by many organisations that do not believe that it went into sufficient depth to enable it to be established that the only way in which Forrestburn could be successful was by taking much of Knockhill's business.

It appears that key interests such as the Scottish Sports Council, Fife Enterprise, Fife regional council and Dunfermline district council were not fully consulted about their views on displacement. Scottish Enterprise told me in a letter dated 27 October this year that

> "the developers of Forrestburn have not adequately addressed the question of displacement . . . if the Forrestburn project proceeds it may very well put Knockhill out of business."

In the past few days, Scottish Enterprise has changed its tune—one can only speculate why that is—but I hope that the Minister will want to satisfy himself about the adequacy of the displacement analysis that has apparently been conducted.

People with expertise and interest in motor sport facilities in Scotland believe that Forrestburn will be viable only if it takes business from Knockhill.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): Although I do not know a great deal about Forrestburn, I agree wholeheartedly that Knockhill has been a huge success in hosting not only the touring car championship but motor cycle racing and weekly club events, which are so popular in Scotland. Whatever my hon. Friend the Minister says in reply, I hope that he will in no way deprecate Knockhill's achievement. It has been an outstanding success in recent years.

Ms Squire: I thank the right hon. Gentleman very much for his support, which I know will be greatly appreciated by Knockhill. I have no doubt that Knockhill would look forward to a visit from him in the not too distant future.

Only a limited number of motor racing events attract sufficiently large crowds to make a business viable. I understand that at Knockhill only three events a year attract crowds of more than 5,000, and they are vital to Knockhill's commercial success. Forrestburn would have to compete with Knockhill and take those events from it if it was to be viable.

I believe that Forrestburn hopes to attract formula 1 racing, which Knockhill does not stage. I believe, however, that there is already fierce competition among existing tracks such as Brands Hatch for such events. Formula 1 racing is very costly, and the £6.5 million being talked about for the Forrestburn development would not support even the track safety and maintenance requirements of a formula 1 racing track for a single year.

A formula 1 track was opened in Japan this year. According to one set of figures, it cost £60 million to develop and will require £10 million every year just to maintain the facilities. Therefore, without a sufficient market in Scotland, public money could be wasted and a successful business badly, if not mortally, damaged.

Does the Minister believe that a detailed analysis was carried out by Lanarkshire development agency? Has a careful study been made of what events Forrestburn would host and the extent to which they would displace those that Knockhill has been successful in attracting? If a full consultation has not been carried out, will the Minister assure me that one will be undertaken; that it will involve experts in the industry, not only in Scotland but in the UK as a whole; and that it will be undertaken before any further attempt is made to decide whether there is sufficient business to support two racing tracks with such a short distance between them? The Minister's answers will be heard carefully not only by me and Knockhill but by the hotels and businesses in the Fife area, which gain so much from major motor sports events.

I have already touched on the third reason why Knockhill's future and the Forrestburn development should be of interest to the Minister. It is the apparent inadequacies in the decision-making arrangements that the proposals for Forrestburn have highlighted. I do not believe that key organisations such as Fife Enterprise and the Scottish Sports Council have been fully consulted. Not even the programme management committee for the east of Scotland was consulted. Although Forrestburn is a west of Scotland development, it will have a displacement effect on an existing east-of-Scotland facility. I understand that no direct approach to Knockhill has been made by the company involved in the Forrestburn development, Inreco, and that its only contact was three or four years ago—in a telephone discussion with KPMG Peat Marwick. Full consultation would have called into question the Forrestburn project's ability to satisfy the technical and financial eligibility appraisals and the core criteria, which include demonstrating clear evidence of demand.

I hope that the Minister will say that he believes that further investigation is necessary, and that a full and thorough displacement analysis will result, with all interested parties being fully consulted. If there is not the business to support two race tracks so close together, as I and others fear, we could end up with neither being commercially viable. Public money will have been used to build up false hopes in Lanarkshire, to ruin a successful private enterprise business in Fife and, I believe, to damage the sporting reputation of Scotland.

I hope that the Minister will bring some Christmas cheer to Knockhill and to all those who support it and are concerned with its future.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): I understand that the right hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) would like to contribute. Will the hon. Lady agree to that?

Ms Squire: I am most willing to allow the right hon. Gentleman to contribute.

1.41 pm

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I shall say a few words in support of the position of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Ms Squire) on Knockhill.

I have been deeply involved in motor racing and motor sport in Scotland since the war, as the former president of the Auto-cycle Union. One has seen, sadly, the demise of Charterhall and Ingliston, and Crimond up in the north. The one circuit that has been a success is Knockhill. I note that the hon. Lady said that it went through a difficult period, but in recent years it has come back very strongly indeed and is popular among competitors because in Scotland there is nowhere else to go. There are two or three major meetings that attract big crowds, particularly the touring car championship, which was an outstanding success not only at Knockhill but on television.

Many motor racing enthusiasts would have to travel far south, down to Croft or further into the midlands of England and to Oulton park if they wanted to take part in competitive motor sport. Knockhill has given them the opportunity to take part, through club meetings and renting the track for club groups. My own Bentley drivers club has a day out in August or September each year. That all brings valuable income to the area and to Fife generally. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will consider carefully the important issue of whether to promote what may, on paper, be an outstanding opportunity in Lanarkshire, to the detriment of Knockhill, which is so successful.

The hon. Lady flew kites about the enormous cost of major international events. It is all very well to say that we will attract formula 1 cars, but when it is difficult for a country to stage a grand prix, it is unlikely that we would get two—at Silverstone or Brands Hatch and one in Scotland. She rightly highlighted the immense cost of staging a grand prix, and the Pacific is likely to opt out next year. I think it wrong to say that we will have a formula 1 circuit, without any definite assurance that we will get a formula 1 race. The grand prix circuit is closely controlled. There is immense competition from Brands Hatch and, indeed, from Donington, which most drivers would say is a much more attractive course on which to drive than Brands Hatch.

It is not just a simple decision. We cannot just say that we should have a brand new circuit in Lanarkshire that would attract all the competition and sponsorship that is so central to modern motor racing. We should not go headlong for that concept, although it is a great vision, without realising that it could be to the detriment of Knockhill, which has done so much over the past 10 or 15 years to give those who are interested in motor sport the opportunity to participate.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. George Kynoch): I am particularly pleased to be here today to respond to the debate, which was initiated by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Ms Squire), and equally to have heard the wise words of experience from my right hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro). I am most grateful to both of them, because I believe that the debate enables us to clarify the position with regard to Knockhill race track and the proposed development at Forrestburn.

There was a discussion as to whether this was a sporting debate or an industrial development debate. I am the Minister responsible for industry and, therefore, perhaps the industrial development side. I looked at the background to the sporting side and asked to be briefed on the range of motor sports that are available in Scotland at present, and how many were pursued.

In motor car racing, we have motor racing itself; circuit racing of various classes; speed events; stage rallying, road rallying; auto tests and trials; and, indeed, stock car racing. There are around 40 motor cycling clubs in Scotland associated with the Scottish Motor Cycle Union. Events include moto-cross, road racing, speedway, motor cycle trials and motor cycle rallies. Events take place throughout Scotland—I shall come to Knockhill in a moment. We have, for example, a world-renowned auto-cross event that is held annually in Fort William, which attracts a top-quality field from Europe and America.

Scotland—as even I knew—has a long tradition of success in motor sport at both national and international level. In formula 1 racing, to which the hon. Lady referred, I remember very well Jim Clark being the world champion in 1963 and 1965; Jackie Stewart held the same title in 1969, 1971 and 1973.

More recently in formula 1 racing, there is David Coulthard, whom I thought was from the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries, but when I asked earlier today, I was told that he lives in the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Lang). David Coulthard's success in winning his first grand prix at Estoril in Portugal during this season, which has just finished, sets him up on a very promising motor racing career. I am sure that the hon. Lady will join me in wishing him every success with his new team, McLaren.

In the 1960s, Scotland had it is own motor racing stable. I am not sure whether the hon. Lady is old enough to remember Ecurie Ecosse, but I certainly do, and the driving at Le Mans and the successes that it had over those years. It helped to develop many budding young drivers, such as Jim Clark and Jackie Stewart. In the past few years, we have also seen Colin MacRae, who has been highly successful in motor rallying. He won the Royal Automobile Club rally in 1994 and earlier this year became the first British competitor to win the world rallying championship; he won it in a nail-biting climax in the Network Q RAC rally, showing tremendous skill and courage to come through an arduous final stage. Another Scotsman, John Clelland, this year won the British touring car championship, to add to his previous title won in 1989.

I think that 1995 has been a tremendous year for Scottish motor sport. I cover all this to provide a backdrop to today's debate, to emphasise the importance of sport, particularly motor sport, within the Government's wider priorities, and to stress that the future of Knockhill race track, which is the issue that we are addressing today, has indeed been carefully considered.

The hon. Lady clearly and ably set out her concerns for the future of Knockhill; she has previously raised those concerns with me in writing. I wrote to her on 14 September and 12 December, explaining the situation with regard to the proposed development at Forrestburn.

Like my right hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries, I am well aware of the success of the Knockhill race track in recent years. It has attracted top-level competition to the site, and has diversified its interests into other areas. I gather that it also carries out test circuit work for prominent motor companies. As the hon. Lady said, it is an excellent example of the benefits of private sector investment in sport. I join her in commending Derek Butcher for his success with Knockhill, which is currently recognised as the country's national centre by the Scottish Motor Sport Federation.

I listened carefully to the concerns expressed about the proposed development of a new motor-racing circuit at Forrestburn in Monklands, and its potential impact on Knockhill. The hon. Lady pointed out that the Forrestburn project would receive financial support from public sector bodies—Monklands district council and Lanarkshire development agency—as well as from the European regional development fund. I understand that the concerns expressed about the potential displacement effect of the new race track on Knockhill have been carefully assessed by the funding partners.

The hon. Lady quoted from a letter from Scottish Enterprise, dated 27 October. I, too, have a copy of that letter. She also referred to a later letter dated 4 December, which states:

> "Further to my letter of 27 October, I have now had the benefit of discussion with the Lanarkshire Development Agency from which I learned that a displacement analysis had indeed been undertaken with regard to the project.
> The decision to proceed by Lanarkshire has been taken within their authority and following proper analysis. Accordingly, Scottish Enterprise does not consider it appropriate to intervene in this matter."

The letter finishes with an apology for the fact that

> "the above information was not fully available at the time of my earlier letter."

I, too, apologise for the fact that the first letter from Scottish Enterprise to the hon. Lady was not fully informed. Earlier correspondence relating to Scottish Enterprise had made it clear that a displacement analysis had been carried out.

The proposed facility at Forrestburn is on a completely different scale from that at Knockhill. The Forrestburn circuit will be 3.2 miles long, which makes it as long as Silverstone and longer than Brands Hatch. It is well above the threshold for international racing events. The Knockhill circuit is only 1.3 miles long. I understand that the Forrestburn promoters intend to develop a circuit of international standards that would secure an FIA licence, which would allow events of international status to take place in Scotland.

I believe that the promoters of the Forrestburn facility will seek to attract such events as the British formula 2 and 3 championships, the German touring car championship and the FIA formula 3000 international championships. The hon. Lady will note that I have left out the formula 1 championship. I understand that it has not been included in the promoters' proposals; I suspect that they are being realistic about what they can achieve.

None of the events that I have mentioned is the kind that Knockhill would be able to attract. On that basis, it seems that the two facilities are considering essentially different markets, and accordingly the development of Forrestburn is unlikely to have an adverse impact on Knockhill. Indeed, the Forrestburn track is expected to bring new opportunities for co-operation with—for example—Knockhill through championships and back-to-back events. One of the wider attractions of Forrestburn is its potential to generate further interest in motor sport at an international level, and thus to expand the overall market, in which Knockhill will continue to play an important part.

As I have said, the Forrestburn project has secured funding from Monklands district council, the Lanarkshire development agency and the European regional development fund, but it would be wrong to describe it as a public sector project. The vast bulk of the finance is coming from the private sector; the public agencies are very much in a minority supporting role.

I understand—this will interest the hon. Lady—that the Forrestburn project has secured the support of the RAC Motor Sports Association and the Royal Scottish Automobile Club. Both bodies have emphasised the importance of Knockhill in Scottish motor sport, and clearly do not regard Forrestburn and Knockhill as competing facilities.

I understand the hon. Lady's reservations, expressed today and in letters that she has written. I am no expert on motor sport, and I suspect that the same applies to the hon. Lady, but I suggest that the RAC Motor Sports Association and the Royal Scottish Automobile Club are experts. I urge the hon. Lady to seek an early meeting with those organisations, and to try to understand why they consider the two projects complementary rather than adversarial.

Ms Rachel Squire: I shall take the Minister's advice, and seek meetings with those two organisations. I am, indeed, no expert on motor racing, although I share my London flat with a woman formula 3 racing driver, which gives me a certain insight into the subject.

I was not claiming that no displacement analysis had been carried out; my point is that that analysis has not been as detailed and thorough as it should have been, and has not involved all the interested parties sufficiently.

I understand that Knockhill involves formula 3 racing. I know that a longer track is being promoted at Forrestburn, but I gather that shorter tracks have distinct advantages, in that they allow spectators to see far more: the cars come round even faster.

Mr. Kynoch: I am pleased to learn that the hon. Lady shares a London flat with a young lady who is involved in formula 3 racing. Some claim that I can remember being a member of Bristol university's motor club and winning a rally. Perhaps I was wrong to say that I knew little about motor sport, but I must confess that I am a little rusty.

The hon. Lady asked whether a full displacement analysis had been carried out. That is a matter for the funding bodies—and Strathclyde European partnership, the tourism advisory group, the Lanarkshire development agency and Scottish Enterprise are indeed satisfied that the displacement issue has been dealt with adequately.

People in Fife are bound to disapprove of the project until they see that it will increase the inflow of motor sport into Scotland to their possible benefit. It might be helpful, however, if the proprietor of Knockhill talked to the project team at Forrestburn. I cannot bring that about; I can only urge the hon. Lady to suggest that Mr. Butcher in Knockhill try to establish contact. When the project is completed—if it is completed—there may well be a working relationship allowing discussion. If, as I am assured, the two facilities will not be in competition, let us ensure that the relationship is established on an informal basis at a fairly early stage. That could allay some fears. I suggest, however, that the hon. Lady contact the two bodies that I mentioned earlier.

Other than Knockhill, Great Britain has no proper motor sports venue further north than Oulton park in Cheshire. Given the potential catchment area of Scotland and much of the north of England, there is no reason why the motor sports market should not be able to support more than one circuit. That was certainly the case in the 1950s and 1960s, when Scotland had a number of successful circuits—for example, at Charterhall, Turnberry and Crail.

Given the resurgence of interest in motor sports—encouraged by the success of David Coulthard—I believe that it is a growing business. I consider that the question of displacement has been properly investigated by the bodies concerned, and I see no justification for Government intervention.

It being Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Sitting suspended, pursuant to Standing Order No. 10 (Wednesday sittings), till half-past Two o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

SCOTLAND

Agricultural Subsidy

1. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the current level of agricultural subsidy in Scotland. [5195]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Raymond S. Robertson): Agriculture grants and subsidies in Scotland amounted to around £330 million in 1994.

Mrs. Gorman: Is my hon. Friend yet aware of the findings of the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs, which, I understand, recently went to New Zealand? From what I have read in the newspapers, I believe that it has done away with its farmers subsidy system. At first, of course, that was greeted with consternation, but now it is being welcomed by farmers, who are doing very nicely without having to do all that dreadful paperwork. If he has been informed about that event, will he tell us a little about its outcome?

Mr. Robertson: The Select Committee on Scottish Affairs did go to New Zealand to consider a country that had abolished all agricultural subsidy under, I must add, a Labour Government, but we have no plans to follow suit. The Committee has still to report and I am sure that the Committee's Chairman will ensure that my hon. Friend has a copy of the report once it is published.

Mr. Home Robertson: I declare an interest, Madam Speaker. After years of half measures, will the Government now introduce a subsidised scheme, if necessary, for the eradication of bovine spongiform encephalopathy, both for the sake of better animal welfare and to restore confidence in Scottish beef? Meanwhile, will the Minister advise people that it might be risky to inject tissue from infected cattle into their brains, but that the more conventional practice of eating prime Scottish beef is much more enjoyable and perfectly safe?

Mr. Robertson: As the hon. Gentleman knows, two weeks ago in the Scottish Grand Committee, we had a useful Adjournment debate, initiated by my right hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), on that matter. I told the Committee on that occasion, and I repeat it now, that our measures to eradicate bovine spongiform encephalopathy in cattle are working. In Scotland, out of a total of more than 2 million cattle, the number of confirmed BSE cases in 1995 is expected to be around 600, some 27 per cent. below the 1993 level. We are fully aware of the problem and our measures are working.

Sir Hector Monro: Does my hon. Friend agree that our support through the beef special premium and the suckler cow subsidy helps to provide the best prime Scots beef? Will he say yet again that prime Scots beef is safe to eat and that the education authorities and others who are depriving children of good Scots beef are wrong?

Mr. Robertson: I agree completely with my right hon. Friend. I know that, at this time of year, our thoughts turn to eating white meat, but, perhaps after Christmas day's turkey, hon. Members on both sides of the House will decide to have a good, big, juicy steak, preferably from an Aberdeen Angus.

Mr. Canavan: Will the Government reverse their disgraceful decision to discontinue taking up the European Union milk subsidy, which will mean that many school children will be deprived of free school milk, with detrimental consequences for their health and nutrition? Is it not ironic that the Government are proposing that measure when, earlier this week, the Scottish Office Minister with responsibility for health was complaining that 62 per cent. of Scottish five-year-old children suffered from tooth decay and that Scottish school children were near the bottom of the dental health league table?

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman should direct his comments to local authorities all over the country, and I hope that he will take the opportunity to raise the matter with his own Labour-controlled authority.

Student Loans Scheme

2. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the operation of the student loans scheme in Scotland. [5196]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: I am pleased to say that the scheme is working well.

Mrs. Fyfe: That is not what the Minister of State, Department for Education and Employment said on Thursday in Committee when he announced that the whole scheme had had to be postponed until October 1997 because the banks had difficulties over mergers and because of difficulties with information technology. That is in spite of the whole thing being hustled through in the Queen's Speech at great speed. Will the Minister extricate himself from this mess or will he be tied into his hon. Friend's shambles and share the blame for the mess that no one in Scotland needs or wants?

Mr. Robertson: I congratulate the hon. Lady on her consistency. She disagrees with the Government's approach and with that of her Front-Bench spokesmen to student support. We announced a postponement of the scheme after discussions with the banks and building societies to ensure a proper and smooth transition a year later. As always, the hon. Lady is scaremongering on student numbers and on student support. She cannot accept, and will not admit, that there are more students in higher and further education in Scotland than ever before in our nation's history.

Mr. Stewart: Can my hon. Friend confirm that parity between grants and loans will be achieved in 1996-97? Secondly, does he agree that parity will be maintained thereafter? Thirdly, does he agree that recent debates in the House have shown that the Opposition have no policy whatever?

Mr. Robertson: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend, and I can give him the assurances that he seeks. As I have said, we have more students than ever before in higher education and the last survey showed that for the first time students from less well-off backgrounds are now in the majority in our universities and colleges.

Mrs. Liddell: The Government have been forced to walk away from the student loan privatisation proposals.

They would earn my respect and that of my hon. Friends if they would also walk away from the ill-conceived plans for nursery vouchers. Make no mistake about it, Labour is opposed to nursery vouchers. We will get rid of them when we are elected and will make sure that all three and four-year-olds get nursery education when their parents wish it. However, we have said—

Madam Speaker: Order. I have to bring two points to the hon. Lady's attention. First, I have not yet heard a question from her: that is most important. Secondly, we are dealing with student loan schemes and not with nursery vouchers.

Mrs. Liddell: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I was just coming to my substantive question. We have put a number of questions on education to the Minister and have failed to get replies. Why are we not getting a response to our request for an independent assessment board in relation to nursery vouchers? [Interruption.] Why is the Minister not prepared to respond to detailed questions about student loans and student accommodation and about other aspects of education policy? Will he give us a substantive reply rather than the bluster that we are used to when he is flummoxed?

Mr. Robertson: What does the hon. Lady have against those from less well-off backgrounds? Yesterday she was at every media outlet criticising our scheme for assisted places, which helps children from less well-off backgrounds. Today she is ranting about student loans and nursery vouchers, which are designed to help everyone in society but particularly those from less well-off backgrounds. Over the recess she should take a long hard look at what she has been saying since she joined the Front Bench because some of it has been quite shameful.

Health Board Boundaries

3. Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about health board boundaries in Scotland. [5197]

The Minister of State, Scottish Office (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): We continue to consider the impact of local government reform on Scottish health board boundaries.

Mr. Worthington: When I recently met people from Argyll and Clyde who were trying to persuade Clydebank to join Argyll and Clyde health board, they told me that the Secretary of State had said that there would be no changes to health board boundaries unless they were uncontroversial. If Clydebank joined Argyll and Clyde and lost its links with Gartnavel, the Western, Queen Mother's and Yorkhill hospitals, and had to manage with the appalling transport links with the Vale of Leven, that would be very controversial. Will the Minister assure me that plans to move Clydebank into Argyll and Clyde do not exist and will not exist?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: We certainly have no plans to change Scottish health board boundaries in the immediate future.

Mr. Gallie: While I welcome the ever-increasing amount of money that the Government are prepared to spend on health services in Scotland, may I congratulate my hon. Friend on the fact that he has almost managed to achieve parity in funding in the Ayrshire and Arran health board area? The redistribution of health service money around Scotland certainly benefits my constituents, and each and every one of them should say thank you to the Scottish Office.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. We have provided substantial expenditure of £4.2 billion this year. That is an additional £121.3 million, which provides real terms growth of 0.2 per cent. There is much higher spending per head in Scotland on health than there is south of the border. In Scotland £820 a head will be spent, which is 23 per cent. higher than in England. So very high priority is being given to that area.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: Will the Minister review the boundaries in Edinburgh and use that as a pretext for getting rid of his Conservative-appointed health board, which has presided over the shambles in the Royal Edinburgh hospital in my constituency, as evidenced in a secret report which shows that cleaning levels are "abysmal" and that staff shortages are chronic?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The answer is no. We are, however, considering a bid from the Royal Edinburgh hospital and I shall let the hon. Gentleman know the outcome in due course.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my hon. Friend agree that the quality of health services provided by the health authorities is even more important than the delineation of boundaries? Does he agree that, despite all the knocking copy from Opposition Members, the quality of the health service in Scotland is very much better than it was in 1979?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. At all times we will give top priority to the interests of patients.

Mr. George Robertson: When the Minister is looking at the boundaries of health boards, will he consider in particular Grampian—especially Grampian healthcare trust, whose plans for a new hospital in Stonehaven break new boundaries in the Government's push towards privatising the health service? Will he perhaps look up the pamphlet co-authored by the Secretary of State for Scotland in 1985, in which the Secretary of State wrote:

> "The rise of private medicine is an excellent thing and should be encouraged even more"?

The Secretary of State has never repudiated that, and indeed claims authorship of the pamphlet in "Who's Who". Is it not a fact that the Stonehaven project is but a Trojan horse for the mission of the whole Government—not just the Thatcherite rump over there—to go ahead with the ultimate privatisation of the national health service?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman is engaging in scaremongering. The proposals for Stonehaven will result very much more quickly in the provision of a purpose-built, modern hospital than would otherwise have been possible any other way. Services will of course remain free at the point of delivery.

Earnings

4. Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the change in average weekly earnings for (a) males and (b) females in Scotland over the last 15 years. [5198]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. George Kynoch): In 1995, full-time male earnings were almost three times more and female earnings were almost three and a half times more than the 1980 level.

Dr. Spink: May I follow that happy answer by wishing you, Madam Speaker, a very happy Christmas? Is it not a fact that the enterprise culture promoted by the Government's policies, which has driven up wages by such a great degree, would be damaged, if not destroyed entirely, by a tartan tax as proposed by the Opposition, which would destroy jobs and put a 3p premium on the suggested 10p minimum tax level? That would be a 30 per cent. subsidy for working in Scotland at the lowest level of the economy. How could that be just or fair?

Mr. Kynoch: I am sure that all hon. Members wish you a happy Christmas, Madam Speaker and since it is Scottish Question Time, would want you to have good Christmas spirit. My hon. Friend's point is absolutely right. Clearly, the Opposition have not worked out the damage that they are intending to do to Scotland and to Scotland's business by the imposition of a tartan tax that is bound to force earnings up. I have not heard any detail from the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) in explaining what extra the tax will provide. It will simply force earnings up and provide absolutely nothing for the people concerned except fewer jobs in Scotland.

Mr. Wilson: Some people in Scotland object to paying taxes, tartan or otherwise, for the purpose of moving jobs from Keith to the south of England. But that is another story.

Does the Minister recognise the effect that the firm, Burger King, is having on minimum earnings in Scotland? Does he have it in him to condemn unequivocally Grand Metropolitan, a Tory party funder, for paying its employees as little as 20p an hour? Is not that a Tory national minimum wage policy in action?

Mr. Kynoch: The hon. Gentleman's question is no better than usual. He does not realise the damage that his party's minimum wage policy would do to Scotland and the whole United Kingdom. Labour Front-Bench Members will not even say at what level they propose to set a minimum wage; they simply say that they want one. If they want the same level as the unions want, £4.15, it is estimated that, if only half the differentials were restored, some 950,000 jobs would go.

Mr. Simon Coombs: The question of average weekly earnings is of no interest to people who are out of work. Will my hon. Friend take this opportunity to contrast the fact that unemployment in Scotland is falling steadily under this Government whereas it would undoubtedly rise as a result of the Labour party's minimum wage policy?

Mr. Kynoch: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. That would be the effect not only of a minium wage but of a tartan tax, which Labour wants to apply through a Scottish tax-raising Parliament and the imposition of the social chapter. Its policies would badly damage Scotland and the Scottish people.

Mr. McFall: Have not the Government imposed 22 tax rises in Scotland over the past three years? For the population at large, Christmas comes but once a year, but for the Government since 1992, Christmas has come on average every seven weeks. What Christmas cheer will there be for the women who constitute 80 per cent. of the low-paid in Scotland and are paid less than the European decency threshold, or for the 107,000 people in Scotland who work for the miserably low rate of less than £2.50 an hour?

Mr. Kynoch: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman will say what minimum wage he proposes. Will he confirm that Labour's tax-raising Parliament would not put a 3p tax on the Scottish people? Under this Government, taxation is UK-wide; unfortunately, the hon. Gentleman represents policies that would tax Scottish people higher than people in the rest of the United Kingdom and put people out of work.

Council of Ministers

5. Mr. Neil Hamilton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent meeting of the EC Council of Ministers he has attended. [5199]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Forsyth): I attended a meeting of the Council of Fisheries Ministers on 26 October 1995. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, the Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson), will leave today to attend a Fisheries Council. It is expected to be concluded on Christmas eve, although I assume that that depends on my hon. Friend achieving a good settlement for Scotland's fishermen.

Mr. Hamilton: In the conscientious preparation that my right hon. Friend does before he goes to Council meetings, has he ever calculated the costs that would be imposed on Scottish businesses if Labour's policy of imposing the social chapter on Scotland became Government policy? Would not the Labour party's policies grind the Scottish economy between the nether millstone of Brussels burdens and the upper millstone of tartan taxes?

Mr. Forsyth: I agree with my hon. Friend. The Labour party's policies would destroy jobs in Scotland through the imposition of a minimum wage, the social chapter and a tartan tax. I assume that the minimum wage in Scotland would be higher than in England to compensate for the fact that the Scots will pay a tartan tax, so their take-home pay on the same wage would be less than that of people in England and Wales.

Dr. Godman: Compliments of the season to you, Madam Speaker. The Minister mentioned his attendance at the Council of Fisheries Ministers. Did he discuss the construction of the new fisheries research vessel for his Department? Could I remind him that Ferguson's in Port Glasgow has bid for that ship? Were he to announce that it was successful, it would be a very pleasant Christmas present for the men and women who work in that excellent yard in Port Glasgow.

Mr. Forsyth: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on the determination with which he has pursued the case for Ferguson's. We hope to be able to make an announcement shortly and I am delighted to be able to tell the House that it is not a matter on which I require the agreement of the European Community, so the hon. Gentleman can expect us to move fairly speedily. We will certainly do our best to look out for Scotland's interests.

Mr. Salmond: Should not the question be, at how many Council meetings has the Secretary of State actually spoken? The reports were that he went to the Fisheries Council playing second fiddle to the English Fisheries Minister and never uttered a word. Given that last night he totally failed to convince his former colleagues and Euro-sceptics to bail out his Cabinet colleagues to save their discredited fishing policy, why is he not going to the Fisheries Council tomorrow? Where will Scotland be tomorrow without the Secretary of State for Scotland going to the Council to represent our interests—with him saying nothing?

Mr. Forsyth: My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, the Member for Aberdeen, South, is attending that Council and will be speaking at it. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will have the grace to welcome that, given his complaints. As for my attendance at meetings of the Council of Ministers, I think that I have attended more such meetings than the hon. Gentleman and I have spoken at a number of them, including the Justice and Home Affairs Councils and the Social Affairs Council, where I saw at first hand how disastrous the policies on the social chapter that the hon. Gentleman and the Scottish National party advocate would be for Scotland's work force. In the margins of those meetings, many of the Ministers whose countries have the social chapter say privately that they recognise that, because we have an opt-out from it, we are a magnet for inward investment. That is why Scotland has benefited from so much inward investment in jobs, which the Scottish National party would destroy.

Mr. McAvoy: The Secretary of State will be aware that we still have a Scottish steel industry. In that context, can he tell us what representations he has ensured will be made at the Council of Ministers that is dealing with the application by Irish Steel for a European Union subsidy? Will he rest assured that he has the full support of Labour Members in opposing such a subsidy to an Irish steel company—unlike the Scottish National party, which voted against Scotland's interests last week?

Mr. Forsyth: Halleluiah! Labour Members are denouncing subsidies to the steel industry and distinguishing themselves from the nationalists on the basis that they no longer believe in subsidies. We really have achieved a lot since 1979.

Mr. George Robertson: If the Secretary of State is ever allowed to attend another European Council of Ministers meeting, will he bear in mind and perhaps learn the lesson of the stinging humiliation that he and the Government suffered last night? Is not it a fact that, even though they put up the last two Thatcherites in the Government to try to appeal to the rebels, they could not stave off defeat, or the exposed chasm that exists in the Tory party on Europe? Just as he cannot speak for the people of Scotland, with 87 per cent. of them opposed to him and his Government, is it not true that the Government cannot speak for this country in Europe? The sooner we have a general election and get a Government who can speak for the whole country the better it will be for us in Europe and in Britain.

Mr. Forsyth: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was able to follow the debate last night, but I should have thought that he would have recognised that the Labour party amendment was defeated by eight votes and did not reflect a policy that enjoyed unanimity on his Benches. Several of the hon. Gentleman's colleagues argued against the common fisheries policy, while the Opposition Front Bench argued in favour, so he should not present the idea that the Labour party is united on anything in Europe save in one respect; it is the party that would sell out our veto in Europe, hand power to Brussels, ensure that our veto was replaced by qualified majority voting in respect of the social chapter and the rest and which, on fishing, has nothing whatsoever in its manifesto because it has nothing to say to the fishermen of Scotland or of Britain.

Deregulation

6. Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to accelerate the deregulatory process, with special reference to small businesses in Scotland. [5200]

Mr. Kynoch: The Scottish Office is playing its full part in the deregulation initiative and is particularly alert to the concerns of small firms.

Mr. Steen: As the Secretary of State has not referred one regulation to the Deregulation Committee to deregulate, and as his commitment to deregulation and his support for keeping enforcement of European directives from Europe to the minimum are well known, will he say something about how we can reduce the burdens on small businesses so that they can become more effective and do not have to bear the burdens of officialdom?

Mr. Kynoch: My hon. Friend is aware that Conservatives are totally committed to deregulation; the Deregulation Committee has been bombarded with proposals and the Scottish Office has a number of proposals in the queue waiting to go to the Committee. I can assure my hon. Friend that my officials are well aware of the need not to hassle small businesses—the life-blood of this country. If my hon. Friend has any concrete evidence of firms being hassled, he should give it to me.

Mr. Foulkes: The Minister will be aware that many small businesses are in rural areas and he will know from the rural White Paper published last week that, in one decade, employment in Cumnock and Doon valley fell by 27 per cent.—the largest fall in a rural area in Scotland. Is it not crazy to cut the grant to Scottish Enterprise by £33 million and reduce the help to those small businesses in rural areas? Is it not equally crazy for the Secretary of State to cut capital consents to local authorities and restrict their capital borrowing, thus ensuring that some of the money that was to come from the European Community will no longer be forthcoming? My constituents who are unemployed will not have a happy Christmas.

Mr. Kynoch: The hon. Gentleman is aware that unemployment is falling significantly across Scotland. The hon. Gentleman does not recognise that the Government are committed to ensuring that taxpayers' funds are used wisely and sensibly. The board of Scottish Enterprise has assured us that, with its reduced budget, it can maintain and even improve output. The hon. Gentleman does not recognise that an important industry in rural areas such as ours is tourism, which employs about 8 per cent. of Scotland's work force. There has been a 20 per cent. increase in the budget to the Scottish tourist board—I hope that the hon. Gentleman will recognise that that is good news for tourism and rural economies.

Tourism Revenues

7. Mr. Merchant: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate he has made of the total tourism revenues in Scotland. [5201]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Some £2.1 billion in 1994, and we expect 1995 to be even better.

Mr. Merchant: I welcome my right hon. Friend's increased provision—to more than £18 million next year—to the Scottish tourist board. Will he confirm that that represents an increase of 20 per cent. over previous plans thanks to the reordering of priorities at Scottish Enterprise? Does he agree that that increase reflects the high priority that the Government give to the tourist industry in energising the Scottish economy?

Mr. Forsyth: I agree with my hon. Friend. The difference between Conservatives and hon. Members such as the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) is that Conservative Members do not believe that organisations such as Scottish Enterprise exist for their own account. If organisations such as Scottish Enterprise are able to deliver their targets within reduced budgets and we deploy the money to help tourism, which is what we have done, that is a good deal for the taxpayer and represents the right way to use scarce resources to encourage the wealth-creating sector. Tourism has a vital role to play in rural Scotland and throughout Scotland, and I congratulate the Scottish tourist board on its magnificent work in increasing the numbers of people coming to Scotland. There is still great scope for improvement, and that is why, in a difficult public expenditure round, we were able to increase its budget by no less than 20 per cent.

Mr. Donohoe: The Secretary of State, in giving us that information, will know of the shambles that has resulted from the lack of funding for the celebrations next year of the bicentenary of the death of Burns. There is a severe lack of sponsorship from the private sector. In those circumstances, will he give a commitment to funding the celebrations directly from the Scottish Office to make up for the losses that are being incurred?

Mr. Forsyth: I cannot give that commitment, but I can tell the House that we propose to have celebrations of the bard's life, in both London and Scotland. On 31 January, we shall be holding a large function in London, to which a number of Opposition Members will receive invitations, to celebrate the life and works of Rabbie Burns. It is also our intention to mark the passing of Robert Burns's life with an event in Scotland, and it is appropriate that that should take place in the south-west of Scotland.

Sir Hector Monro: Hear, hear.

Mr. Forsyth: I can hear my right hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) saying, "Hear, hear." I am sure that the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Donohoe) will welcome that information also.

Mrs. Ewing: The Secretary of State will recognise that tourism is an all-year industry, and that winter tourism plays an important part in the livelihoods of people in rural areas. I pay tribute to the Secretary of State's work in establishing the Scottish avalanche information service. Does he accept that there is now some concern about the future of that organisation? Can we expect an early report from the review group, because considered action will be needed to ensure that we continue and expand that important aspect of our tourist industry?

Mr. Forsyth: I agree with the hon. Lady. I established that avalanche warning service myself.

Mr. Canavan: It did not work last night.

Mr. Forsyth: This is a serious subject and people's lives are at risk.

I established the service on the recommendation of the distinguished mountaineer, Hamish McInnes. I was aware that there was a question mark over the service, and I gave instructions that the service should continue to be supported. We have given the service an extra £6,000, and we have commissioned a study, costing about £5,000, to consider the scope for expanding the service. I hope that one of the issues that will be addressed is whether we could cover a wider area using telemetric equipment.

I thought that some of the press reports were very unfair. The Government have every intention, as long as I am Secretary of State, of ensuring that the service is encouraged and expanded as far as is practically possible. However, we must ensure that money is spent wisely and that resources are used effectively, so that we get the best benefit out of the service.

I am grateful to the hon. Lady for giving me an opportunity to make that statement.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I take this opportunity to wish the Secretary of State and all Scots Members a braw hogmanay. Has the Secretary of State taken into consideration the interest in tourism in Northern Ireland, following the visit by the President of the United States, and will he urge the Scottish tourist board to use the Scottish-Irish connection to build up the tourist routes and encourage the growth of overseas visitors?

Mr. Forsyth: I am extremely grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his greetings for the new year. I wish him a happy Christmas and a happy new year, and you, too, Madam Speaker.

On the hon. Gentleman's point about tourism and Ulster, we Unionists must stick together on that and other matters. There is scope for encouraging tourism, and I am in discussion with the Scottish tourist board and others to improve the links between Ulster and Scotland. That will enable us to develop packages and tourism opportunities, and I shall raise the prospects for co-operation with my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in the light of the hon. Gentleman's helpful suggestion.

Capital Spending

8. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to be able to authorise new capital spending under section 94 consents for local authorities for the financial year 1996-97; and if he will make a statement. [5202]

Mr. Kynoch: In February or March 1996.

Mr. Kirkwood: Will not the announcement on capital expenditure in November, which restricts the amount which local authorities can spend through capital receipts on capital expenditure in 1996-97, and the current constraints on the amount of capital that can be funded from revenue, mean that £160 million or £170 million less capital expenditure will be devoted to capital projects next year in Scotland? Is it not passing strange that, after 16 years in office, £100 billion from North sea oil and gas and £60 billion from privatisations, the Government are putting constraints on capital expenditure, which means that less will be spent on roads, bridges, schools and industrial development north of the border next year?

Mr. Kynoch: The hon. Gentleman refers to the capital allowances. He must accept that, at present, capital expenditure by local authorities in Scotland is running significantly higher than elsewhere—it is 77 per cent. higher overall than in England. It is therefore only right and proper that we should try to cut the borrowing costs which divert funds from front-line services. That is why the constraints have been put in place.

When the hon. Gentleman came to see me with the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel), we talked about specific projects in his constituency. We also spoke about the opportunity to use the private finance initiative. I hope very much that local authorities will fully explore that possibility, because they could bring forward projects sooner than would be possible if the authorities used purely public funds. They may well find that they get those projects significantly cheaper by using private expertise.

Mr. Stewart: Will my hon. Friend say something about Government policy towards smallish local authorities which may have major capital projects to finance? I have no doubt that my hon. Friend has the Eaglesham bypass particularly in mind. I am grateful to the Minister of State for meeting a delegation on that recently. Can my hon. Friend say how those projects fit into the allocation process?

Mr. Kynoch: My hon. Friend will be aware of the challenge funding arrangement, which will be maintained. Some road and transport spending may be settled by those means, and I am sure that that arrangement will be considered for the particular bypass that my hon. Friend mentioned.

Mr. Michael J. Martin: The Minister may know that his colleague, the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson), visited my constituency recently to look at multi-storey flats. He will no doubt agree that it is important that more and more of such flats, which are not the worst place in the world to live, should have concierge systems. The local authority has tried its utmost to offer to as many multi-storey flats as possible the security of concierge systems. Will the Government release funds to allow local authorities to install such systems, which offer safety particularly to the elderly living in such flats?

Mr. Kynoch: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman's local authority on the work that it has done on security. He will be aware that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has already announced increased funding for closed circuit television, and that local authorities have greater flexibility on how they spend their capital allocations.

Mr. McAllion: Does the Minister not understand that, by forcing councils to use 25 per cent. of their capital receipts next year and 50 per cent. of them in the following year to repay outstanding capital debts, he is effectively cutting public investment in Scottish housing over those two years by at least £300 million, as well as depriving the already depressed construction industry in Scotland of £300 million-worth of business? How in God's name can that make any sense when there are still tens of thousands of Scots homeless and on the streets, and when the Government's own national housing conditions survey revealed that Scottish housing is riddled with damp and condensation and is in disrepair, which is an utter national disgrace? Why does not the Government give the people of Scotland and Britain the only Christmas present they want from the Government—a general election in the new year? That will give people the opportunity to cast the Government into the political oblivion that they justly deserve.

Mr. Kynoch: I look forward to whenever the general election campaign begins, because I shall be able to ensure that the people of Scotland are aware of the reckless spending that the Labour party would introduce in the country. The Opposition must accept the fact that, since 1987, local authority housing debt has risen by almost £1 billion to £3.938 billion—an increase of nearly 20 per cent. If the hon. Gentleman were to encourage stock transfers, he would get receipts. He must accept that the cost of borrowing is significant and that it is diverting taxpayers' money into funding debt rather than it being used to deliver services.

Local Government Finance

9. Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next plans to meet representatives of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities to discuss local government funding. [5203]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: On 19 January.

Mr. McMaster: Does the Secretary of State recall that, last Christmas, hundreds of my constituents in Paisley and Johnstone were flooded out of their homes and that some of them have been unable to return to those homes? When I recently met the Secretary of State, he promised to introduce a new flood prevention Act for Scotland. When will he introduce that Act and, when he does, will he ensure that resources are available to the new unitary authorities so that they can put flood prevention schemes in place?

Mr. Forsyth: I gave the hon. Gentleman those undertakings, and we shall deliver them. He knows that I promised to consult about the matter in the new year, and I shall do that. It will then be a matter of finding a slot in the legislative programme.

Is it not a terrible condemnation of Labour councils that they must be forced by statute to do something about the flooding of people's homes? We shall place a duty upon them to ensure that the present discretion that they enjoy is replaced by a requirement to take action when people are flooded out of their homes. Strathclyde has singularly failed to take such action.

As to the legislative opportunities, I am sure that Labour Members will be delighted that the new procedures in the Scottish Grand Committee and the opportunities for introducing new legislation mean that we may be able to take more action in respect of flood prevention than would have been possible otherwise.

Mr. Bill Walker: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the people of Perth and those living in the Tay valley are very grateful to the Government for their prompt action during the flooding of the Tay last year? We welcome the pledge that my right hon. Friend has given at the Dispatch Box, that he will impose a statutory requirement on the new authorities following consultation. It is absolutely essential that local authorities are made aware of their duties and responsibilities with regard to flooding.

Mr. Forsyth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for those comments. However, I do not wish to misrepresent the position in respect of the Tayside region. I think that I am correct in saying that the Tayside region is taking forward a flood prevention scheme using the discretionary powers that I have mentioned. Unlike some Labour authorities, such as Strathclyde or Central region, Tayside has chosen that course of action and the Scottish Office is providing resources through the capital allocation to assist it in that process.

My hon. Friend is right to acknowledge the progress that has been made, but I do not see why that cannot be achieved using the existing discretionary powers. In response to the representations from the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. McMaster) and the concerns that were expressed not only in his constituency but in Kilmarnock, we have said that we shall consult on the issue of imposing a specific mandatory duty upon local authorities.

Mr. Wallace: Will the Secretary of State confirm that his Department announced earlier today a cut of £400 million in real terms in investment in council housing over the next three years—which is equivalent to some 9,000 houses? How can the Secretary of State justify that decision against a background of too many of our fellow Scots sleeping rough and of overcrowding? When there will be no room at the inn for many thousands of Scots this Christmas, why does he assume the mantle of Scrooge so enthusiastically?

Mr. Forsyth: I am surprised at the hon. Gentleman. I am sure that he knows that the figures released recently show a welcome reduction in the number of homeless people. He also knows that we have spent £2 billion on housing and that we have been responsible for refurbishing about 750,000 council houses. He knows the figures for the increase in home ownership. I do not know whether he travels through Scotland on his way to Orkney and Shetland, but, if he does, he must see the transformation that has occurred under the Government, and I would have thought that he would welcome it.

The hon. Gentleman puts the worst possible interpretation on the figures. Given that he is a prudent and an honest man who argues for higher taxation in order to provide higher expenditure, I am amazed that he has anything to do with the policies of the Labour party, which seems to want to see Scotland and Scottish local authorities disappear under a sea of debt. It wants to fritter away the resources that we make available for housing by paying interest charges and by reducing opportunities for the future.

Madam Speaker: The pretty one—Rachel Squire.

Ms Rachel Squire: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Does the Secretary of State agree that, although the Budget announcement raising Department of Social Security thresholds in respect of means testing for residential and nursing care is welcome, it will place severe additional funding pressure on local authorities? Will he further agree to pursue additional funds for that purpose so that local authorities can ensure that no one in need of residential or nursing care is denied it or is forced into accepting a second-best standard of care?

Mr. Forsyth: I am delighted, Madam Speaker, that political correctness has not found its way into the Chamber.

I should have thought that the hon. Lady would have welcomed the changes introduced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor, as they benefit elderly people who have scrimped and saved throughout their lives yet are placed at a disadvantage compared with those who have not. As for giving local authorities more money, if local authorities such as Edinburgh were not abandoning projects to spend £400,000 on corporate identities and painting their vans, and other Scottish local authorities were not receiving 45 per cent. more per head in grant than equivalent authorities in England, there might be a case for considering allocating more money to local government in Scotland. Local government in Scotland has grown at a rate of 6 per cent. while in England it has declined by 6 per cent. over the same period. Its expenditure and its borrowing have grown and it is out of control because it is mainly under the control of the Labour party.

Tree Diseases

10. Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated into tree diseases; and what part he takes in its targeting. [5204]

Mr. Kynoch: The Forestry Commission carries out a wide range of research on tree diseases. Its work is summarised in the commission's report on forest research, a copy of which is in the Library. My right hon. Friend approves the commission's expenditure plans for research.

Mr. Pawsey: My hon. Friend's expertise in these matters is well known. Can he tell the House whether fungus diseases are on the increase? I am particularly concerned about honey fungus and the way in which it attacks a wide variety of trees and shrubs. What discussions are taking place with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to produce a cure for fungus diseases?

Mr. Kynoch: I was not aware that my hon. Friend had appreciated that I had branched out into new areas.

Mr. Pawsey: Not barking up the wrong tree.

Mr. Kynoch: I am certainly not barking up the wrong tree. As it is Christmas time, I have taken a great interest in what could be wrong with my Christmas tree.

The only completely effective way of dealing with an outbreak of honey fungus is to remove as much as possible of the infected plant, including the root system, and to replant a more resistant species. I understand that there are some chemical treatments on the market, but none is completely effective. My hon. Friend can be assured that we are trying to attack the problem. He will be happy to hear that many of our native broadleaved species such as oak are relatively resistant to honey fungus.

Violent Crimes

11. Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total number of reported violent crimes in Scotland in each of the last five years. [5205]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Some 19,700, 23,200, 24,900, 21,000 and 21,400 respectively.

Mr. Marshall: Is the Minister not ashamed and horrified by those figures? Can he explain why some old-age pensioners freeze to death because of VAT on fuel and why thousands of youngsters are homeless and refused benefits by the Government, yet violent crime continues to increase and is at an all-time high? Does one have to be a thug or a criminal to prosper in today's Tory Britain?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman should be perfectly well aware that we are spending about £86 million on urban aid in deprived areas; that should be of considerable assistance to his constituents and to many others in Glasgow.

Violent crime has fallen; serious assaults are down by 13 per cent. since 1992. Offences of handling offensive weapons are down by 19 per cent., as are robberies by 22 per cent.—a substantial step in the right direction. I am glad that we are bringing closed circuit television to more town centres, to quell crime levels still further. The experiment in Airdrie, for instance, was a complete success. We are allocating £4 million more for that purpose.

We are also bringing in proposals which mean that prisoners can expect to spend the whole of their sentences in custody, apart from a small amount of earned remission. We believe that that will be a deterrent. Of course there are appeals against too lenient sentences. When some criminals were recently caught on television, their sentence of four years was increased to seven as a result of the appeal by the Lord Advocate.

Lady Olga Maitland: Does my hon. Friend agree that the passage of the Carrying of Knives etc. (Scotland) Act 1993 over two years ago made an enormous difference to controlling the circulation of knives? Since then, there have been 500 convictions and 300 people have been gaoled. That is an example of the Conservatives in Scotland leading and England eventually following—in the shape of my private Member's Bill. Would my hon. Friend consider an amnesty for knives along the lines of what was done in Scotland? In 1993, 4,500 knives were thrown away in bins—the only place for them to be.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I wish my hon. Friend every success with her knives Bill for England. The Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie) to control knife assaults has been remarkably successful. As my hon. Friend says, there have been a great many arrests—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] It is all very well for Opposition Members to grumble, but they opposed giving the police the powers of search in the first place, while the Conservatives forced the Bill through.

We shall give top priority to ensuring that those who carry knives are caught through the necessary operations, and brought to justice.

Mr. Connarty: The Minister will be aware of the success of Operation Blade in Strathclyde and Operation Combat in Tayside. One hundred and ninety-seven knives were found on the 1,011 people who were stopped—almost a 20 per cent. success rate—in the Tayside operation. Is the Minister concerned, as I am, by the fact that some police authorities which I have contacted have said that they do not have a knife problem in their areas and do not intend to carry out such operations? Will he assure me that the Scottish Office will encourage police authorities to run operations such as Blade and Combat in their areas, so as to cut out knife carrying in Scotland?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The answer is yes. The key piece of evidence is the fact that the number of homicides fell substantially as a result of the operation in the west of Scotland. Operation Combat led to many arrests and also to a fall in knife crime rates over a comparable period in the year concerned.

Drift Netting

12. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next expects to meet representatives of the fishing industry to discuss drift netting for migratory fish. [5206]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: I expect to meet members of the Association of Scottish District Salmon Fishery Boards early in the new year.

Mr. Bellingham: Is my hon. Friend aware that there is huge concern in Scotland about the north-east drift net fishery, which regularly takes 50,000 salmon a year that would otherwise have run up Scottish rivers? Why is drift netting banned in Scotland, as it is in most other countries, but legal in England? Will my hon. Friend meet his MAFF colleagues to ensure that the fishery is closed down, with full compensation?

Mr. Robertson: I know that my hon. Friend has pursued this issue on many occasions at Scottish questions and with many Scottish Fisheries Ministers. He will be pleased to know that the phasing out of drift netting is proceeding, and that the number of licence holders has dropped by nearly 30 per cent. since 1992.

Sir David Steel: Will the Minister join me in paying tribute to the work of the Tweed Foundation and the research that it is doing into migratory fish? Will he keep a close watch on the numbers being caught in the open seas, bearing in mind the decline in the east coast rivers of Scotland?

Mr. Robertson: I am happy to agree wholeheartedly with the right hon. Gentleman. He will be pleased to know that interest groups, including the National Rivers Authority, support a shorter phase-out period.

Sir Hector Monro: Will my hon. Friend do all that he can to hasten the phasing out of the north-east drift net? He will appreciate that the wild salmon stock in our east coast rivers has been falling fast. That will inevitably have a long-term effect on the tourist industry, for example. Will my hon. Friend take the opportunity to say whether he has obtained a minimum import price for farmed salmon?

Mr. Robertson: My right hon. Friend, who had my job until July, is fully aware of the problems that have had to be faced. He has pursued the drift net issue from the Government Front Bench, as he has from the Back Benches. He will be pleased to know that there are now fewer licences. There were 149 in 1985 and in 1995 the number is 99 and falling.

My right hon. Friend will be delighted to know that the European Union has announced a minimum import price. I am delighted to have had the opportunity of working hard with the Scottish industry in tackling the problem.

NHS Trusts (Management Expenses)

13. Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent discussions he has had with NHS trusts on management expenses. [5207]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Discussion between officials of the Scottish Office and NHS trusts on trust matters take place on an on-going basis. Trusts in Scotland have been asked to reduce their administration costs.

Mr. Hughes: Even on the Government's own figures, there has been a staggering increase in administration costs over the past four years from £218 million a year to £355 million. As Scottish Office Ministers have defended those increases to the last ditch, what reasons can the Government give for asking for a cut in administration costs without acknowledging incompetence and failure?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman must bear it in mind that more patients are being treated than ever before. That factor must be taken into account. The hon. Gentleman must appreciate that expenditure on the national health service in Scotland has increased steadily in real terms. We are insisting on a 5 per cent. switch of resources from administration, which I think he would support. That applies to trusts and health boards. That should result in £14 million more being spent by trusts on patient care. An additional £4 million will be available to health boards. It is right that we should concentrate on the top priorities of heart disease, mental illness and cancer. These are three of the highest priorities in Scotland.

Local Government Electoral Reform

14. Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to implement local government electoral reform. [5209]

Mr. Kynoch: None.

Mrs. Michie: Last night, the Secretary of State said that he was open to positive suggestions on further constitutional reform. Will the Minister try to persuade him that one of the most enlightened reforms that he could undertake would be to introduce a fair voting system based on proportional representation for local government elections? That would make councils more accountable and representative and it would be an incentive for voters to vote. The reform should be attractive to the Secretary of State because, if implemented, it might just result in more Tory council seats. After all, Tory councillors are becoming an endangered species in Scotland.

Mr. Kynoch: When talking about a fair electoral system, the hon. Lady should talk to her colleagues in the Liberal Democrat party about a fair electoral system for their proposed tax-raising Parliament. She seems to have botched together some deal to get her party's proposals off the ground. It seems that about 56 of the 129 Members that they are proposing would be party hacks.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Conservative party has never changed constitutional rules to secure narrow benefits at elections? We are concerned about having a constitution that will stand the test of time, as has the unwritten constitution of the United Kingdom. We shall have no truck with Members being selected in smoke-filled rooms instead of at the ballot box.

Mr. Kynoch: I totally agree with my hon. Friend.

National Lottery

15. Mr. Jessel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of benefits to Scotland from the national lottery. [5211]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Scotland is doing extremely well from the national lottery. To date, more than 560 awards have been made, totalling around £125 million.

Mr. Jessel: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the sums available for Scotland from the national lottery for the arts, heritage, sports, charities and the millennium fund are far larger than originally predicted, that that is bringing widespread benefits to Scotland, and that the national lottery is a brilliant national achievement?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Some £23 million has gone towards Scotland's Field of Dreams at Hampden. The arts have received £27 million, sports £16 million, charities £17 million, heritage £22 million and the millennium £40 million, which includes a millennium forest that will extend the cover of native woodlands in Scotland. Some 80 per cent. of the awards have been for less than £100,000, so hundreds of small sports clubs, amateur dramatic societies and local museums have benefited to an extent beyond their wildest dreams.

Mr. Maxton: Will the Minister join me in congratulating Austin Reilly of the national stadium committee, Queen's Park football club and the Scottish Football Association on obtaining £21 million from the millennium fund for the continuing redevelopment of Hampden? Will he also find an opportunity to discuss with the Secretary of State for National Heritage the changes to the rules in the operation of the national lottery to ensure that some of the money can be used for revenue spending for the arts rather than entirely for capital spending, thus removing the threat that hangs over Scottish Opera and some of our other great cultural organisations?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage will have heard the hon. Gentleman's question. I share the hon.

Gentleman's great enthusiasm for Hampden's success and for that of many other projects in Scotland, including the Glasgow film theatre, the Scottish gallery of modern art, and the Strathclyde Poverty Alliance, in which he has an interest. In addition, £1.5 million has gone to Tayside regional council for a sports complex.

Director General of Oflot

3.30 pm

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland) (by private notice): To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will make a statement about the conduct of the Director General of Oflot and her decision to retain him in his post.

The Secretary of State for National Heritage (Mrs. Virginia Bottomley): I met the director general yesterday to discuss the issues surrounding the flights and hospitality that GTech provided for him and his staff on visits in America.

My confidence in the director general remains. There is no doubt about his integrity. He has played a major part in the launch of the highly successful lottery. He was responsible for the conscientious and effective evaluation of bids for the licence to run the lottery. The process was endorsed by the National Audit Office as in line with the statutory duties placed on him.

The visits to America took place some months after Oflot awarded the main licence to Camelot. The director general considered with care the issues raised, recorded them thoroughly, and made no attempt to hide them. He declared his interests appropriately. There has been no question of his having sought or received personal gain from the visits that he undertook.

The director general is accountable to Parliament. He is making a full report on his overseas travel and hospitality arrangements to the Public Accounts Committee. He has assured me that there are no other issues that may come to light subsequently which could affect my decision in this matter.

I have told the director general that I do not think that his acceptance of the flights was wise in the context of his role as regulator of the lottery. Within the statutory role that he performs, which is to ensure that the lottery is run with propriety, that the interests of players are protected and, subject to that, that the proceeds for good causes are as great as possible, it is inevitable that he needs to work closely with Camelot. I have told him that this fact makes it all the more important that he should maintain a proper distance from the company and its constituent parts, and be seen to do so, taking all steps to guard against any possible misunderstanding of his actions.

The director general has assured me that, should any issues arise that may lead to a potential conflict with his role as regulator, he will seek guidance from my Department and inform it of the decision that he takes as to how to proceed.

I can inform the House that the director general has announced today that Miss Anne Rafferty QC will head an inquiry into the allegations by Richard Branson against Mr. Guy Snowden of GTech. The inquiry will start in the new year, and the report will be published. The House will be aware that Miss Rafferty was a member of the royal commission into the criminal justice system, chaired by Lord Runciman. She is currently chairman of the Criminal Bar Association and a recorder of the Crown court, sitting in the south-eastern circuit.

Dr. Cunningham: Does the right hon. Lady recognise that her astonishing decision to give Mr. Davis a vote of confidence was rightly met with universal condemnation in the press today? Does she acknowledge that, on Monday, during questions to the Department of National Heritage, she withheld important information about Mr. Davis's disregard of clear advice from her Department? As she twice promised on Monday to report to the House on her decision, in columns 1204 and 1205 of Hansard, why did she then announce her decision in a press statement and not in the Chamber?

It has taken a private notice question to get the right hon. Lady to the Dispatch Box to answer questions on which she assured the House two days ago she would report. In less than three days this week, she has re-established a pitiful record for inconsistency and bad judgment.

Does the right hon. Lady recall that, as recently as Monday of this week, her own departmental officials were briefing the press that Mr. Davis had to go, yet within 24 hours she had confirmed him in his post? As Mr. Davis has brazened out his position and the Secretary of State has backed down, will she now say to whom and on what basis the regulator is accountable? Is it not absurd for Mr. Davis to suggest that he can carry out his public responsibilities for the lottery effectively only if the very organisation he is there to supervise pays his expenses? That is a completely new doctrine of public accountability.

Does the point in the right hon. Lady's letter to Mr. Davis yesterday—that his visits took place after the licence was awarded to Camelot—mean anything at all? Surely it is irrelevant, as his duties and responsibilities to regulate Camelot and GTech persist. She has confirmed him in that post. How can she possibly defend the regulator's conduct when she and her Department specifically advised him against the visits before he undertook them?

Is it not clear that, if the civil service management code applied to Mr. Davis, his position would be completely indefensible? Civil servants are told that they "must not receive gifts, hospitality or benefits of any kind from a third party which might be seen to compromise their personal judgment or integrity."

Is that not precisely what Mr. Davis has done? The code goes on to say:

"In drawing up and in interpreting their own standards of conduct, departments and agencies must pay full regard to the need for staff to conform and be seen to conform to the principles".

Has not Mr. Davis blatantly disregarded those principles? Does that not make it clear that a code of conduct for regulators of private monopoly organisations is now long overdue? Will the right hon. Lady undertake to present such a code to the House without delay?

Has not this whole episode exposed an abysmal lack of judgment, not only by Mr. Davis but by the right hon. Lady herself? Is it not clear from her inadequate response to this private notice question that she apparently has learnt nothing from the events of the past week?

Mrs. Bottomley: The decision was taken only after careful consideration, and an examination of all the facts. It remains the case that Mr. Davis, as the regulator, has overseen the introduction of an incredibly successful lottery—probably the most successful, and the most effectively regulated, anywhere in the world.

[Mrs. Bottomley]

There can be no question of withholding information from the House. The right hon. Gentleman is correct: the question of the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) was answered at 3.30 pm. I hope that I have been entirely open with the House throughout. Yesterday, at the moment when I sent the letter to Mr. Davis, I also placed a copy in the House, and gave copies to the right hon. Member for Swansea, West and the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee.

The regulator of Oflot is indeed required to follow the directions for which the National Lottery etc. Act 1993 provides. I issue directions to him under section 11; he is required by section 14 to report annually to the Secretary of State, and I lay his report before Parliament. Indeed, I drew attention to that report at Question Time earlier this year, because it is a thorough, comprehensive and impressive document.

The regulator also answers to the Public Accounts Committee. His performance before that Committee—he replied at length to questions, openly giving information that he had recorded meticulously on all aspects of those questions—was an example of his sense of responsibility and accountability to it. Under section 15 of the Act, the regulator must supply me with any information that I require.

As for the question of advice given to the regulator, it is indeed the case—as I have made clear—that, in general terms, he was advised that he should pay the costs of the hospitality involved in the trip to America. The money used to pay for that trip was provided by Oflot and the taxpayer. In the case of these incidents, the regulator took the view—for operational reasons—that the only way in which he could visit all the different lottery centres and return to work in London in the time provided was to accept GTech's offer.

I do not think that that was wise, but it must be said that—notwithstanding the Labour party's innuendo—it did not constitute an acceptance of gifts: "gifts" implies personal gain, and there is no suggestion of any personal gain in this case. As my hon. Friends are only too aware, the beneficiary was the British taxpayer.

Throughout the affair, there has been no suggestion of the regulator's honesty or integrity being in question. The Labour party's victimisation, pursuit and hounding of a man who has done his job as well as the regulator has demonstrates that it is unfit to govern, now or ever.

Mr. Peter Brooke (City of London and Westminster, South): My right hon. Friend had a very difficult decision to make, and no one would have blamed her if she had decided differently. She determined the issue fairly, judiciously and decisively. Are we not lucky to have in the director general a man who has created a most efficient lottery, as yet untainted by corruption? Is it not the case that only those with the languid intellectual self-assurance of the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) would believe that total infallibility is as universal among princes as it is always supposed to be among popes?

Mrs. Bottomley: I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend. I believe that we should make a considered decision that is right, rather than a rash decision that is wrong. I have weighed all the elements of the case very carefully, and I consider it right to retain confidence in Peter Davis, who has so far done an extremely impressive job.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Will the Secretary of State refrain from implying that the Public Accounts Committee has given Mr. Davis a clean bill of health? Will she recognise that many people would like to know not only whether she was satisfied about the unwisdom of his accepting hospitality and flights from GTech, but whether she has asked any questions of Mr. Davis about the possible unwisdom of involving GTech in the British national lottery when that company in the United States has left a trail of charges in the criminal courts that are in the public domain? Senior officers have been accused of bribery, fraud, corruption and other crimes. Has she or any of her officials done anything to investigate that appalling background to a company that, on the face of it, appears ill suited to be the lead in running a clean national lottery, far from sleaze?

Mrs. Bottomley: I was referring to the National Audit Office report, which commented on Mr. Davis's evaluation of the eight bids to run the national lottery, and on the investigation into all the constituent parts, including whether it was suitable, fit and proper for GTech, as a member of the Camelot bid, to undertake that responsibility. The NAO report said:

> "the evaluation process was comprehensive, consistent, logical and properly controlled".

As for the Public Accounts Committee, what I said was that the director general had given it thorough, open and honest answers at great length, on the basis of information that was carefully recorded and documented. He is a rigorous and thorough individual, which is characteristic of an accountant.

Sir Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Are not the Opposition making themselves look trivial and foolish by taking this stand against Oflot's director general? Can there be any justification in attacking the integrity of that decent, honourable and successful man, who was trying only to save the taxpayer money—[Laughter.]—look how they laugh when it is a question of saving the taxpayer money—to no benefit whatever to himself? Can the justification be any more than a determined attempt to destabilise the lottery, which has been an outstanding success, and to undermine the Government with it?

Mrs. Bottomley: Undoubtedly, the Labour party always seeks to resort to personal vilification rather than carefully weighing up the evidence. My hon. and learned Friend is absolutely right: the lottery has been a tremendous success. That affronts the Labour party, which loathes success. It would take it away from the operator, cap the prizes and reduce the remarkable amount of money coming through to good causes. Only today, there were another 22 grants from the national heritage memorial fund, which means that 4,600 different projects have benefited from the lottery.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): Will the Secretary of State confirm that the answer that she says she gave me at 3.30—which, incidentally, I did not receive at 3.30, but that is trivial—was nothing to do with the American flight? It was to do with Australia. Will she also confirm that her fax to me of the letter that was going in the Library was a welcome courtesy, but of no use to 650 other Members, and that it did not allow them or me to ask a question as to a decision on Monday?

Will the right hon. Lady now explain why she told me the day previously in an answer that her Department knew about these flights the week before the Public Accounts Committee hearing, why her accounting officer did not inform the National Audit Office of those flights, and why she did not, as a courtesy, inform the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee about those flights? We are left with a sneaking suspicion that, had it not been for the answer to one question at the PAC meeting, this matter would never have become public.

Mrs. Bottomley: It was neither appropriate nor necessary to take the steps that the right hon. Gentleman describes. My concern is second to none in wishing the lottery's good name to be maintained. It is a successful and well-run lottery. As I have explained to the House, I reported to it as I announced that decision. It was right to bring the uncertainty to an end.

Once I had had the opportunity, not only to discuss the matter with senior officials at my Department, who had spent a great deal of time with the director general, but to speak to him myself, as swiftly as I could, I took the opportunity of informing the right hon. Gentleman and the House, to bring the uncertainty to an end and to allow the director general to get on with his work.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Is it not obvious that Opposition Members detest the tremendous success of the lottery, and would love to overturn it? They cannot succeed in doing that: all they can do is chip around the edges to try to undermine it. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the director general is a completely honest man who has done nothing bad, but that, as a distinguished accountant, he has acted more like an accountant than like a judge, which would have been wiser in the distinguished appointment that he occupies?

Mrs. Bottomley: I entirely share my hon. Friend's assessment. The lottery is certainly a great success. The director general's duty is to ensure the propriety of the lottery, to make sure that the interests of those who play are protected, and to maximise the amount for good causes. As my hon. Friend and 4,600 good causes are aware, the results for good causes have exceeded all expectations. I wish to maintain the lottery's good name, and that is the commitment of the director general. I have made it clear, albeit that these incidents took place several months after the award of the licence to Camelot, that his steps were unwise.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Did not the Secretary of State realise from the very beginning that Peter Davis was connected to this dodgy firm in the United States, which is well known for handing out backhanders to get its own way? That is the firm that he has been cosying up to, and he has been flying here, there and everywhere using its money.

I am drawn to the conclusion reached by somebody, not in the House but out there, one of the people who buy lottery tickets, who said, "What is it Peter Davis knows? How does he manage to save himself from getting the sack? Does he know where the bodies are buried? Does he know about all the lottery fiddles that have been covered up by the Government?" When will this Government learn? They are hanging on to save this man's skin, but as sure as night follows day, like all the rest of them they have defended, in the new year he will have to go, and a different story will have to be told.

Mrs. Bottomley: It saddens me to hear the hon. Gentleman speak in that way on these matters. If I had taken the view that Peter Davis was unfit to continue as the regulator, I would not have hesitated to say so. Having looked fairly and thoroughly at all the evidence, it is my view that he is a proper person to continue with that task, which so far he has undertaken successfully.

I am sure that people "out there" are influenced by repeated comments, such as those made by the hon. Gentleman, which are neither fair nor proper. I understand that Mr. Davis's wife shared childbirth classes with the wife of a director of GTech 20 years ago. That is not a matter that people are required to enter in a register of interests. The hon. Gentleman may understand that.

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): Does my right hon. Friend understand that her decision to stand by the director general of Oflot is widely welcomed by Conservative Members, and by the country as a whole? Does she share my sense of revulsion at the attempt by the Labour party to destroy the reputation of an honest public servant for narrow party advantage? What does she think that kind of gutter politics does for the reputation of politicians as a whole?

Mrs. Bottomley: My hon. Friend speaks exactly the view that I share—that, if someone from outside the public service comes in to take on a position of responsibility, he has as much right as anyone else to be treated fairly on the basis of the facts. I thoroughly scrutinised all aspects of this case, and I believe that it is right for him to continue with the task. Labour's attitude does it no credit at all.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): Whether the Minister likes it or not, is not the sad reality that, because of what business people call the "smell factor", Mr. Davis is from now on damaged goods? He will not have the legitimacy and credibility that are necessary for the proper performance of his functions.

Mrs. Bottomley: I think that I have made it clear that he has done an effective job. He has achieved a better result for the national lottery and for good causes than anyone expected. If the Labour party thinks that the decision should be made on the "smell factor", that makes it even less fit for government. People and their jobs and responsibilities should be considered on the basis of the evidence and the facts, and not on the smell from the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Was that question from the Opposition not a dreadfully obscene example of blood sports, in pursuit of not a politician but an official who thought that he was doing something good by saving his employer—in this case the taxpayer—expenses?

Mrs. Bottomley: My hon. Friend encapsulates the situation precisely. Mr. Davis has been competent, effective and successful. I believe that he should continue in his job.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): The Secretary of State may not know it, but she has issued a serious criticism of the director general from the Dispatch Box. She said that he seriously lacked wisdom in this matter. In those circumstances, an honourable person would resign from his position, or it should be her job to remove him. From now on, should not Oflot be called "Offload"?

Mrs. Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman did not—I believe—encapsulate the words that I used. What I said was that, in this case, which took place some months after the licence had been awarded, I took the view that it was unwise—albeit there was no personal gain, no lack of honesty or integrity and all aspects were carefully recorded and indeed discussed when questions were asked.

The hon. Gentleman should look carefully at the National Audit Office report, because it is as complimentary an endorsement of the rigour and integrity of the whole process of selection of the operator as any Member could wish to see. The director general of Oflot deserves a great deal of the credit for that successful process.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on her courage in not taking the easy way out of this problem. It would have been very easy to ask Mr. Davis for his resignation. Is it right to think that a successful, intelligent and able man should be condemned and forced from a job that he is doing very well because of one instance of something that we might describe as naive?

Mrs. Bottomley: My hon. Friend speaks for a great number of Members. The decision was not wise, but it has to be seen in the context of somebody undertaking his task extremely successfully and effectively. I should like to quote from a comment made by a former colleague of the director general. It said of Mr. Davis:

> "He is totally honest and of the highest probity. He is a very meticulous man who writes down everything and all of the expenses he incurs."

That certainly coincides with my experience of him.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): Will the right hon. Lady say whether the friendship of 20 years ago was continued, and whether it was known about at the time of the appointment of Camelot?

Hon. Members: McCarthyism.

Mrs. Bottomley: As my hon. Friends have said, this is becoming McCarthyism of the worst sort. Is the man fit to continue in his role or not? I have said that he retains my confidence, because I believe that he is a man of integrity and honesty. He has always been entirely clear about his past and present acquaintances. There is no evidence that I know of to suggest that the friendship affected his judgment in any way at all. I rely once again on the evidence of the National Audit Office, which gave such a thorough endorsement of his evaluation process of the eight people who bid for the lottery licence.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid-Staffordshire): My right hon. Friend has earned additional respect on the Conservative Benches for not taking the easy option. Does she not draw parallels with the visits of certain members of the National Heritage Select Committee, including myself and including the Chairman, the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), to Tattersall's, the Victoria state lottery in Australia, before the contract was awarded? That involved GTech too. There was no question of impropriety there, and there is no question of impropriety in this case.

Mrs. Bottomley: My hon. Friend makes an extremely good point.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Were the matters to which the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) referred a few moments ago known to those who advised Mr. Davis? How long before the visit was that advice given? Has the Secretary of State asked Mr. Davis why that advice was ignored? What was his reply, and why did she find it of overriding significance?

Mrs. Bottomley: Much as I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's question, the process of investigating GTech as a constituent part of the bid for the lottery was thoroughly and rigorously endorsed. I would have to refer back to the question by the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) to reply to the hon. Gentleman's question more thoroughly.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury): Despite all the innuendoes that have been levelled by Mr. Davis's critics, no one has come up with a shred of concrete evidence of corruption or malpractice. Is it not despicable that the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) should seek to smear an honest man's name in an attempt to bolster his flagging ratings with his party?

Mrs. Bottomley: The easy option is to find a scapegoat and make him or her carry the can to get a round of applause. That is always the Labour party's approach. Labour Members always look for a scalp when dealing with an issue. Some issues are more complex, and many factors are involved. We have looked at all the aspects of this case carefully and thoroughly. It would be unfair and poor judgment to take this incident out of context and say that, in spite of all that has been achieved, the director general should forgo his job.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): Does not the Secretary of State realise that Mr. Davis made a serious error of judgment and disregarded the advice given to him, in order to save peanuts compared with what the national lottery makes? The public expected him to resign or the Secretary of State to sack him. They now want to know whether he, she or the Government will go first.

Mrs. Bottomley: The incident involved no personal gain to the director general; only the British taxpayer benefited. He also took into account his need to return to work as director general in London as swiftly as possible. I have made it clear that it was not a wise decision, but the idea that it affected his judgment or integrity in any way is nonsense.

Mr. Simon Coombs (Swindon): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on her firm stand, both on her decision and in dealing with questions this afternoon? Does not the director general, Mr. Peter Davis, preside over the most successful lottery in the world, and should not that count in his favour? Can it be doubted that GTech's position in all this is simply that it has developed the most successful lottery technology in the world, which is widely used by lotteries throughout the world? Are not the Opposition today motivated by the principles of a McCarthyite witch hunt, aimed not so much at Peter Davis as at my right hon. Friend and the Government?

Mrs. Bottomley: My hon. Friend is right.

I urgently confess that I misled the House a moment or two ago. I announced that, earlier today, an extra 22 awards were made from the national heritage memorial fund for the lottery. The figure should have been 33, bringing the total to 4,625 awards. I apologise for that factual error.

My hon. Friend mentioned GTech, which is a well-known company involved in lotteries. But that was not the material factor in terms of the Camelot bid. The important factor was whether the group was fit and proper to undertake our national lottery, and whether its bid would maximise the return for good causes. As I have said repeatedly, the scrutiny of whether the group was fit and proper was undertaken very carefully. As for maximising the return for good causes, the result has exceeded expectations, as the House knows only too well.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): As one who voted for the Second Reading of the National Lottery etc. Bill, and who supported the lottery throughout and believes that it is a success, may I tell the Secretary of State that, for that success to continue, the director general of Oflot must be above all suspicion? I have reluctantly come to the conclusion that Mr. Davis is not, and that therefore he must go.

Mrs. Bottomley: I know of no one who has said that he is a subject of suspicion. I did not know that that was the issue involved. As far as I am aware, no one has suggested that he has been influenced or biased in exercising his decisions, but that is what the hon. Gentleman implied.

I also take the view that, because of the sensitivity of his job, the director general should act with propriety and be seen to do so on all occasions and that his decisions should not be the subject of misunderstanding. That is why I expressed my opinion that those incidents, which took place several months after the licence was awarded, were unwise. That is why I also sought an assurance from the director general that, in future, he would keep in even closer touch with officials from my Department, and would report back on any such matters.

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): Can the Secretary of State confirm that, at the time that the director general undertook the freebie flights from GTech, the contract for the scratchcards had not yet been awarded, and that he subsequently had a significant say in the awarding of that contract?

Mrs. Bottomley: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, he is correct that that took place before the scratchcard licences were awarded, but after the main on-line licence was awarded. The director general did have a part to play in that matter. His concern is to maximise the return to the good causes, and it is wrong for hon. Members to imply that his judgment was contaminated, particularly in the light of the National Audit Office's endorsement of his approach and process.

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): Conservative Members have said that the director general is not dishonest. I would not say that he is dishonest, but he is very stupid. It is also very stupid for the Secretary of State to say that it was all right for him to take those matters on board after the licence was awarded. How would she feel if chairmen of licensing boards accepted hospitality from public houses for which they had granted licences? She would be the first to condemn local authority people—[Interruption.] I let the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence) speak, and he should allow me to speak.

The people out there in our constituencies who are paying for the lottery think that this is a very strange situation. If the right hon. Lady is going to back the director general, they will be asking for her resignation.

Mrs. Bottomley: I made it clear that the director general retains my confidence, because, overall, he is competent to do the job, which he is doing effectively. He made it clear that he accepted the flight so that he could visit more lottery centres in the United States than he would otherwise have been able to do, as they are nowhere near the main airline centres. It was simply his wish to complete the task swiftly, and return to London to get on with his job here.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): Does not the Secretary of State realise that the answer that she gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) transformed the nature of these exchanges? It is not just the regulator but she herself who should go. [Laughter.] Conservative Members may well laugh—I suspect that they may soon laugh on the other side of their faces. Throughout these exchanges, the right hon. Lady has repeatedly emphasised the fact that the lottery licence was granted before the regulator took the flights. She misled the House by not acknowledging that—

Madam Speaker: Order. No, no. The right hon. Lady has not misled the House. Will the hon. Gentleman withdraw that remark, and rephrase it?

Mr. Wilson: I withdraw.

Has the Secretary of State not been in danger of inadvertently giving a false impression by suggesting that no pecuniary benefit was available to GTech in the period subsequent to the gifts and favours being taken, because a hugely lucrative business in scratchcards followed it?

Following on from the question of the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan), those of us who have followed the matter from the outside know that there were vast questions about the propriety of GTech—

Madam Speaker: Order. This is not how the House should respond to statements—hon. Members must ask questions of the Minister. I have allowed the questions to run for some time, as there is much interest in the subject. I now want the hon. Gentleman to ask a direct question, so that the right hon. Lady can answer it. Two more hon. Members wish to ask questions, and I ask them to have them ready, as I want them to ask them briskly.

Mr. Wilson: Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Apart from the scratchcard issue, how have even this Government ended up appointing a lottery regulator whose defence turns out to be that he has been a personal friend of the principals in GTech for 20 years?

Mrs. Bottomley: I have repeated at great length that, in all the circumstances, I have not found the director general to be no longer worthy to continue in office; I have confidence in his ability to continue to regulate the lottery. I set it out clearly in the letter to him, and I do not think that I can give the House any further help.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South): Is not the Secretary of State aware that, at the meeting between Richard Branson and Peter Davis to discuss the bribery attempt, a note was passed to GTech, not by the Treasury solicitor, as GTech's press release of 11 December states, but by Peter Davis or Oflot? Will the Secretary of State investigate that matter, and investigate what was received in return?

Mrs. Bottomley: I have already announced to the House that Miss Rafferty is establishing an inquiry into the allegations made by Richard Branson against an officer of GTech in an interview broadcast on 11 December, to consider the facts surrounding a meeting between Richard Branson and Mr. Guy Snowden in September 1993, and to report to the director general any bearing those allegations or facts may have on the exercise of his powers under the National Lottery etc. Act 1993.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): As the Secretary of State said that Mr. Davis took the free flights to save the taxpayer money, will she explain why her officials advised Mr. Davis against taking those free flights?

Mrs. Bottomley: I did not say that he did it "to" save the taxpayer money; I said that the taxpayer was the beneficiary, rather than Mr. Davis personally. I said that he took the flights for operational reasons in order to be able to complete his visits to a great number of lottery centres and return to the UK at the earliest opportunity. Officials, in general terms, advised the director general to be responsible for his travel and hospitality costs, because of the normal rules on such matters. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Let the right hon. Lady answer the questions.

Mrs. Bottomley: The director general, Oflot and the British taxpayer funded the vast sums involved in the visit—for the flights and the basic accommodation. Mr. Davis took the view that, in this particular incident, it would not be appropriate for him to hire a jet independently, and he accepted the offer in order to complete the task faster and return to England. There is no question that the incident affected his judgment, integrity or honesty.

I made it clear, however, that I believed that it was unwise, which is why I asked the director general in the letter to ensure that he keeps in closer touch in future. It is not my judgment that that incident should deprive him of the job that he has so evidently carried out successfully and effectively, to the great benefit of the British people and the good causes that have received extra funds from the lottery.

Business of the House

4.13 pm

Mrs. Ann Taylor (Dewsbury): Will the Leader of the House please give us the details of future business?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): The business for the period after the imminent recess—at least I hope that it is imminent—will be as follows:

TUESDAY 9 JANUARY—Second Reading of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Bill.

WEDNESDAY 10 JANUARY—Until 2 o'clock, there will be debates on the motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Second Reading of the Security Service Bill.

THURSDAY 11 JANUARY—Remaining stages of the Rating (Caravans and Boats) Bill.

Debate on progress on business links on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 12 JANUARY—The House will not be sitting.

More provisionally, the business for the second week back which I expect to include is as follows. On Monday 15 January, there will be the Second Reading of the Finance Bill; on Tuesday 16 January, the first allotted Opposition day, there will be a debate on an Opposition motion, the subject of which will no doubt be decided nearer the time; I am not yet in a position to give details of the business on Wednesday 17 January; on Thursday 18 January I intend to have a debate on the Army on a motion for the Adjournment of the House; and Friday 19 January is the first day for Second Readings of private Members' Bills.

Mrs. Taylor: May I thank the Leader of the House for that information? He knows from business questions last week that we were pleased that he decided to withdraw from debate the regulations that would withdraw benefit from asylum seekers. We advocated the withdrawal of the regulations because we thought it was wrong that such measures should be activated before a debate had taken place in the House. The Leader of the House will be aware that the Select Committee on Social Security is also considering that issue, and I wonder whether he can give an assurance to the House that the debate on those regulations will not take place before we have the benefit of the Committee's report on them.

Is it possible to have an early debate on the conditions in Holloway prison, which so alarmed the new chief inspector of prisons? In particular, it would be useful to have a debate so that Ministers have an opportunity to tell the House how long they have been aware of that appalling situation.

Do the Government intend to publish a White Paper setting out Government policy on the issues to be discussed at the intergovernmental conference of the European Union, which will start at the end of March? That would be very useful, because it is important that the House has ample opportunity to debate such issues before those negotiations and discussions get under way.

Will the Leader of the House ensure that there will be a ministerial statement and report to the House on the Fisheries Council, which starts tomorrow, so that

Members will be able to judge to what extent the Government have taken on board the concerns that led to ast night's defeat for the Government?

Mr. Newton: I cannot give an assurance that the Government will not propose a debate on the regulations on benefits for asylum seekers until the intended report is eceived from the Social Security Select Committee: not east because I think that urgent action is needed, for easons that have been explained to the House. I do not know when the Select Committee's report might arrive. I repeat what I said last week—the undertakings that the Deputy Prime Minister and I gave should provide an opportunity for the Social Security Select Committee to complete its deliberations. We would welcome sight of the report before any debate takes place in the House.

The hon. Lady left it to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker)—I make no complaint about that—to deal with this morning's debate. Therefore, she will not have had time to receive a report on it, and still less to study it.

Mrs. Taylor: Yes, I have.

Mr. Newton: If she has been able to see a report, it must have been by mysterious means into which I will not inquire. In that case, she will be aware that I made some observations on the subject of Holloway in my speech this morning, to which I refer her.

On the subject of a White Paper on the IGC, I am not in a position to add to what has been said by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary in the recent debate, and in other exchanges that have taken place.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food would expect to report to the House, in the usual way and at the appropriate time, on the outcome of the Fisheries Council.

Mr. David Congdon (Croydon, North-East): Will my right hon. Friend find time when we return from the recess for a debate on waste in local government so that hon. Members have a chance to consider the £200 million being wasted by Hackney council on paying 100 employees who should be made redundant but for the council's no compulsory redundancy policy?

Mr. Newton: As I have observed on several recent occasions, I am glad to say that there will be further opportunity to debate local government matters. For example, my hon. Friend may be fortunate in catching the eye of the Chair during the debate on the local government finance orders, which normally come before the House towards the end of January or early February.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I support the plea for an urgent report to be made early in the new year on the result of the discussions in the Fisheries Council meeting to be held later this week. The business has yet to be announced for 17 January, and it would certainly be of benefit to some of us who have fishing interests in our constituencies to know what chance there is of a sensible reform of the common fisheries policy at next year's IGC. Does the Leader of the House also accept that there is a need for a debate in Government time on the privatisation of the railways?

Mr. Newton: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman would expect me to respond with an immediate acceptance of the latter request in his question, given the amount of discussion that there has been just recently about the railways. However, the franchising process is now going ahead extremely well, so I see some attractions in such a debate. I might even be able to satisfy the hon. Gentleman in due course.

On the first half of the hon. Gentleman's question, obviously he can and has supported the representations about the common fisheries policy, and in my characteristically reasonable way, I have taken note of his support for the representations made.

Mr. Roy Thomason (Bromsgrove): Will my right hon. Friend consider trying to give time for a debate on exports, so that we can review the considerable achievements in recent months of British industry in the export market, in particular the engineering industry of the west midlands? Does my right hon. Friend also agree that such a debate would give us the opportunity to expose those Labour party policies that can be found and the damage that they would do to our exporting record?

Mr. Newton: I might venture to suggest to my hon. Friend that the debate that I have announced for Thursday 11 January on progress on business links might provide an opportunity to make some reference to exports because the purpose of those links is to improve all the supporting services to firms, not least small firms, which are contributing greatly to our export performance.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): May we have a debate on child labour laws in Britain and the totally inadequate consultation exercise that the Government are carrying out, which will conclude at the end of January? It is proposed to deregulate further child labour so that children in Britain will be less protected than any of their counterparts in the European Union. It is important that we have a debate on that instead of the Government introducing further deregulation through the back door.

Mr. Newton: I note the hon. Lady's request, and she would expect no less. I wonder whether people who raise such issues have contemplated how much unnecessary upset would be caused, for example, if we followed the path that some advocate, which would prevent a large part of the British population from making newspaper rounds, which help the community and those making them, and which seem entirely reasonable to me.

Mr. Michael Stephen (Shoreham): Can my right hon. Friend find time for another debate on legal aid? He will be aware that many of our constituents are concerned that the Lord Chancellor continues to make civil legal aid available to persons from overseas, who have no real and substantial connection with this country. He will be aware that the funds available to the Legal Aid Board are limited. How can we explain to our constituents who are just above the income or capital limit that there is no money available to give them legal aid, but money is available for persons coming from abroad?

Mr. Newton: I would not rule out further discussions on that matter in due course, but I cannot promise them in the first fortnight back after the recess.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): I am sorry to hear that the Leader of the House does not have the modern facilities that I have in my office, which enable me to watch what is going on in the Chamber while I do constituency work. Some weeks ago, he may recall that I asked him for a debate on Ordtech and the result of the Court of Appeal judgment in that case. I am still waiting for an answer, and I note that 17 January is available for such a debate. Should we not have that debate before the Scott inquiry reports at the end of January, so that we all know what has been going on?

Mr. Newton: I shall examine what the hon. Gentleman has said. I must admit that I was still thinking about his comment about the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor). I understood that she had other commitments elsewhere; I did not realise that they were with the television. My response was directed at my interpretation of her remarks that she had seen an account of this morning's proceedings in the House. But perhaps she has merely talked to the hon. Member for Perry Barr, who I am sure gave her a very accurate account of events.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Last week I raised with my right hon. Friend the matter of the adverse impact of road construction programme cuts upon business in my constituency. My right hon. Friend referred to the business links debate that is to occur on Thursday 11 January. Would it be appropriate for me to raise during that debate the matter of the adverse impact that those cuts are having upon Macclesfield and its links with the excellent and growing Manchester international airport?

Mr. Newton: That would be for the Chair to decide. As I suspect my hon. Friend knows, the links in the phrase business links refer to the flow of information rather than the flow of goods. I am not sure whether I am allowed to refer to his presence as he is below the Bar of the House, but it must be within the knowledge of the House that the Secretary of State for Transport has heard what my hon. Friend has said. Therefore, I think that we can assume that his remarks have found the right target.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Has the Leader of the House considered the request that I made last week for a debate on the textile and carpet industry? Since then, I have received a letter from the British Carpet Manufacturers Association expressing concern about the grant that the French Government are to give to the Beaulieu carpet group in Belgium to establish a plant in northern France and the alleged unfairness of the grant under European Union rules. That is one of many issues that could be considered during such a debate. Many people are concerned about the state of the textile and carpet industry and I think that hon. Members on both sides would welcome an early opportunity to debate the matter.

Mr. Newton: I was not aware of the particular point that the hon. Gentleman raised in his question, but I shall ensure that it is brought to the attention of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. I keep a little list—if I can put it like that—of matters for debate. I cannot promise that I shall be able to strike the hon. Gentleman's name off that list, but I can promise him that he is still on it.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Could we have a debate on law and order early next year so that we can highlight the way in which the Criminal Justice Acts are beginning to hit the villains? Is my right hon. Friend aware of the sentence of 27 years' imprisonment passed today on a burglar whose practice was to threaten to poke out a pensioner's eye with a screwdriver? Is that not a disgraceful crime and is it not jolly good to see that such villains are increasingly being dealt with?

Mr. Newton: By happy coincidence, a photocopy of the front page of the Evening Standard happened to fall into my hands on my way into the Chamber, so I am aware of the story. I think that many people will welcome the length of the sentence in that case. As my hon. Friend says, that sentence results from criminal justice legislation passed by the Government: section 2 of the Criminal Justice Act 1991.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): I was the only hon. Member present who was unable to participate in this morning's debate—such debates used to have short speeches, but they were often long speeches today. I wished to raise the matter of the democratic deficit in local government, Northern Ireland, this country and the European Union. Would it not be a good idea to have an early debate on that subject, to which the Leader of the House could respond?

Mr. Newton: We have had a number of opportunities in recent weeks to debate matters relating to the European Union, and no doubt there will be more in due course. I felt sorry for the hon. Gentleman this morning: it was unfortunate that he was here for three hours and did not manage to participate in the debate. I had harboured hopes that he would be the only person to wish me a happy Christmas—I shall assume that he meant to do so when he rose this afternoon.

Mr. Simon Coombs (Swindon): I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to the recent publication of the Committee on Public Accounts on the Child Support Agency's continuing problems. If, as I suspect, those problems continue to dominate his postbag and surgeries as they do mine, would it be appropriate to have a debate on the Child Support Agency early in the new year?

Mr. Newton: I still have a number of cases in my own surgery. The most recent was last weekend. I acknowledge the point that my hon. Friend makes, and I hope that in return he will acknowledge that the report was based on the agency's operation in its first year—1993-94—which is some considerable time ago. At the very least, we should acknowledge that much has been done since then to improve the accuracy and performance of the agency, although of course my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will give careful consideration to the report's recommendations and respond in the usual time in the usual way.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I sat through the fisheries debate yesterday, but was unlucky enough not to be called; does the Leader of the House agree that the ministerial report to the House on the decisions taken by the Council of Fisheries Ministers meeting should form the introduction of a debate on the practical implications of such decisions? Members who represent fishing interests would then have time to assimilate those decisions and their consequences. In addition, such a debate would allow us to put to the Minister the concerns of the fishermen whom we represent.

Mr. Newton: In view of the hon. Gentleman's frustration—which I had not previously realised—in respect of the first part of yesterday's business, I am glad that he managed to get in several times during the second debate. However, even with my natural desire to please everyone before Christmas, I cannot promise him an immediate further debate on fisheries.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid-Staffordshire): While wishing my right hon. Friend a happy Christmas, I hope to influence him to have a debate on how we can attract people into public life. Is he aware that the appalling display earlier today, when the Opposition attacked a perfectly honourable person, will discourage anyone from entering public life when they might be prone to such witch hunts?

Mr. Newton: I shall not add to what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage said on a number of occasions, but the exchange had an unfortunate flavour of wishing to disregard all the considerations of what had actually happened and the judgment as to how the director general was doing his job and, as my right hon. Friend said, of simply finding a scapegoat and taking the easy way out. That is not the way that any of us ought to behave on anything.

Sir Anthony Durant (Reading, West): May we have a debate after Christmas on the Crown Prosecution Service, bearing in mind press reports that the Lord Chancellor is looking at the effectiveness of the Crown Prosecution Service?

Mr. Newton: Of course, I shall add that to my list of issues for consideration. The Criminal Procedure and Investigations Bill that is currently being discussed in another place will arrive here in due course. As that is concerned with procedures, it might just possibly provide some opportunities, but in any event, as I have said to my hon. Friend, I shall put his request on my little list.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): In view of last night's defeat, would not it be a good idea in the new year—perhaps the Leader of the House could study it over the holidays—for the Government to introduce a system so that we could have a confidence motion once a month, so that the Government could be ready, just in case, for all the subsequent defeats that might happen? In other words, they could programme it in and perhaps they might get their people to turn up more often.

Mr. Newton: That seems a long way from wishing me a happy Christmas. I shall put that thought out of my head for a while.

Madam Speaker: I will wish the right hon. Gentleman a happy Christmas.

Mr. Newton: Thank you Madam Speaker. I reciprocate that wholeheartedly.

Mr. Fabricant: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: It would be a day when I did not get a point of order.

Mr. Fabricant: Has anyone wished you a happy Christmas, Madam Speaker?

Madam Speaker: Yes—the Leader of the House, on behalf, I hope, of the entire House.

BILLS PRESENTED

NORTHERN IRELAND (EMERGENCY PROVISIONS)

Secretary Sir Patrick Mayhew, supported by the Prime Minister, Mr. Secretary Howard, Mr. Secretary Portillo and Sir John Wheeler, presented a Bill to re-enact, with omissions and amendments, the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1991; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Tuesday 9 January and to be printed. [Bill 37.]

SECURITY SERVICE

Mr. Secretary Howard, supported by the Prime Minister, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Rifkind, Secretary Sir Patrick Mayhew, Mr. Secretary Forsyth and Mr. David Maclean, presented a Bill to give the Security Service the function of acting in support of the prevention and detection of serious crime, and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Tuesday 9 January and to be printed. [Bill 38.]

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 102(9) (European Standing Committees),

IRISH STEEL (STATE AID)

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 10836/95, relating to the restructuring of the Irish steel industry; considers that the proposal in the Document is unacceptable as it stands; and judges that any package that provides for aid for Irish Steel could only be agreed if further stringent conditions are attached in the interest of safeguarding employment in the United Kingdom.—[Mr. Wells.]

Question agreed to.

Humber Bridge (Debts) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

4.34 pm

The Minister for Railways and Roads (Mr. John Watts): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill provides an exceptional solution to an exceptional problem. For parts of the Humber Bridge Board's debt due to the Secretary of State, it provides the power to suspend interest payments and to write off debt. It will enable both parties to secure a long-term solution to the problem of managing the debt. Its two clauses implement an undertaking given to Parliament in July 1991 that the Government would, at an early opportunity, promote legislation to provide express powers for the writing off and suspension of parts of the Humber bridge debt.

The Humber bridge was promoted by the local authorities of Humberside through the Humber Bridge Acts of 1959 and 1971. They established the Humber Bridge Board with a preponderance of members from Hull but also with representation from other local authorities which supported the building of the bridge. Those Acts empowered the board to borrow but did not provide express powers for the Secretary of State to pay grant to meet unpaid debt or interest, or otherwise to write off debt or suspend payment of interest on it.

The local authorities of Humberside promoted the Acts of 1959 and 1971 to provide powers for the construction of the bridge—but it still had to be financed. The Government view at that time—1965—was that the bridge was not needed; but in 1966 the Government executed a U-turn. I cannot begin to speculate as to the motives for such a sudden change of policy.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): May I tell my hon. Friend that if I catch the Speaker's eye, I shall seek to explain the reason for the sudden change of policy?

Mr. Watts: We await my hon. Friend's contribution with interest.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): Would the Minister be kind enough to tell the House the opinion of Her Majesty's Opposition at the time?

Mr. Watts: I shall certainly come to that. The more cynical among us—perhaps I should say, behind me—might say that it was the looming by-election in Kingston upon Hull, North that tipped the balance in favour of the project; for it was on 18 January 1966, shortly before the election, that the then Secretary of State for Transport—now the Baroness Castle—announced from the hustings that the Humber bridge would be built. The late lamented Iain Macleod said at the time that this was not a sensible project. The history of the financial difficulties of the project suggest that he was probably right about that, as about so many other things during his distinguished career in public service.

In 1971, the Government confirmed that they would provide loans for the Humber Bridge Board to finance the costs of constructing the bridge. It opened in 1981, plagued by the industrial disputes that were a feature of the era in which it was built.

Mr. McNamara: Will the Minister be kind enough to say which Government were in power in 1971, and whether any binding contracts had been entered into before June 1970?

Mr. Watts: It was of course the Labour Government in 1965 who said that the bridge was not needed and who executed a U-turn in 1966, promising, for whatever motives, that the bridge would be built. In 1971, a Conservative Government led by my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) came to the rescue of the promoters of the scheme by agreeing to provide loans—

Mr. McNamara: Answer the question.

Mr. Watts: When the hon. Gentleman reads the record he will see that I have answered his question—and given him rather more information than he wanted.

Mr. McNamara: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Watts: Not again. I want to make progress. The bridge took nine years to build. How times have changed! The new Dartford bridge was built in just over three years and the new Severn bridge should be built in less than four. In both cases, it is the private sector, not the taxpayer, on which the costs of construction and debt fall. The bridge took a long time to build and the cost was greater than originally planned. Above all, it has carried less traffic than expected. It was built to promote the regeneration of South Humberside but the expected economic growth did not occur.

Sir Anthony Durant (Reading, West): The building of the bridge represents a public scandal of the time. The losses are about £14 million a year. What contribution has been made by Hull city council? Has it paid anything?

Mr. Watts: Local authorities' contributions have not been significant. A substantial amount of toll revenue is generated but it is nowhere near enough to provide the necessary funding. In recent years, the national taxpayer has been contributing £40 million a year as grant in aid pending legislation.

It was always envisaged that toll income would be insufficient to service the debt in the early years. Legislation therefore provided that unpaid interest could be capitalised. That led, however, to an exponential growth in the board's debt, which rose from £151 million in 1981 to £439 million in March 1992.

After tolls were set at their present levels in August 1989, the board formally presented my Department with a case for financial assistance in July 1990. The board undertook to promote a private Bill to index its tolls from the date of the last toll increase in 1989. For their part, the Government undertook to promote a Bill to provide express powers for writing off and suspension of some of the debt. The promise to legislate has enabled the Government, since February 1992, to meet unpaid annual interest charges of about £40 million by grants under the appropriation Acts. It is a temporary expedient and it cannot be allowed to continue much longer. We need a restructuring of the debt that will enable as much of it as possible to be repaid over the maximum 60-year period that legislation provides for repaying the debts.

The bridge board's Bill, by which it sought to index its tolls, was introduced in another place in November 1991. It did not make progress and it was lost at the end of October 1994. Unfortunately, the board has done nothing in the meantime to increase tolls from their 1989 levels. It is now at last preparing an application to increase tolls under current legislation.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): Was not the system of funding wrong or flawed? The interest charges were £15 million a year and revenue from tolls was £10 million. Surely it is common sense that the system was flawed. It was clear that those using the bridge would not provide the necessary finance.

Mr. Watts: The assessment of the project that took place before the bridge was built must have been flawed in many instances. If such a project had been presented to a Conservative Government—I explained this by quoting the remarks of the late Iain Macleod—it would not have been given a green light, as it was given in the circumstances of a by-election in 1966.

We shall be continuing our discussions with the board on its financial position as we prepare to implement legislation, should the House approve the proposed legislation.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): I shall seek to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, so that I might speak in support of the Bill. I am sure that my constituents will welcome the Bill, and they have only two questions—I suspect that that applies to the constituents of all hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber. My constituents want to know how much of the debt the Government will write off under the powers of the Bill, and by how much tolls will increase in the event that the board comes before the Department with a request to increase tolls. Those are the two questions that everyone is asking, on both sides of the bridge.

Mr. Watts: The board must decide what level of toll increase it wishes to promote. Once it has made that proposal, there is a period during which those who are affected by the proposed increase can raise objections. If required, there can then be a public inquiry. At the end of such an inquiry, it would fall to my right hon. Friend to decide whether to confirm the order promoted by the bridge board. Because that decision is of a quasi-judicial nature, I cannot anticipate either what level of toll the bridge board might promote or what level of toll my right hon. Friend might be prepared to approve after the proper authorisation procedures have been carried out.

As for the way in which the powers will be exercised, before I can give a clear answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) and others who are interested, we must first have further discussions with the bridge board to ascertain what level of debt can reasonably be serviced from tolls and how much it is reasonable to place as a continuing burden on national taxpayers to bail out this disastrous project.

The exercise of powers under the Bill requires an order to be laid before the House with the consent of the Treasury. It would be subject to the usual negative procedure, so there will be an opportunity for parliamentary scrutiny of the way in which the powers are exercised.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): I apologise to the Minister for missing the first minute or so of his speech. Will he reflect on the fact that many of my constituents, who live a long way from the bridge in question, have identified what they perceive as an inconsistency in Government policy? A monopoly has been established in relation to access to the Isle of Skye over the bridge that has just been built, and tolls are very high. When one considers the cumulative sums from the public purse which have been poured into the Humber bridge project for 30 years, the injustice visited on a low-income, fragile part of the UK economy seem even more outrageous. Will the Minister reflect on that fact and perhaps have a word with his Scottish Office colleagues about it?

Mr. Watts: The hon. Gentleman will know that I am responsible for railways in Scotland, not roads. I am sure that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, would not wish me to deviate too far from the specific issue of the Humber bridge. However, I have no doubt that the people of the city of Hull will have noted the hon. Gentleman's suggestion that they should presumably be burdened with the extra cost of £40 million a year, all in the interests of ensuring equity with his constituents.

Mr. Jessel: Although my hon. Friend referred to putting some of the cost on to the users of the bridge—everyone accepts that they cannot cover all of the interest losses—and, although he said that part of the cost will have to be paid by the taxpayer, does he accept that there is a case for putting even a small part of the cost on to the city of Hull?

Mr. Watts: According to the legislation under which the bridge was promoted, any part of the debt that is not paid from tolls is a charge mainly on the taxpayers of Hull, although two other authorities have a smaller obligation. Clearly, it is not the Government's intention that the whole of that burden should so fall. Whatever the errors of the past, we do not consider it reasonable that such an extra burden—a burden presumably wished on the people of the city of Hull for several decades by their elected representatives—should fall on them.

Equally, I must have regard to what is equitable for national taxpayers. In assessing how the powers should be exercised, we shall therefore have to consider what level of debt cannot possibly be paid from tolls, even on the most optimistic assumptions. We shall then consider what cannot, in the medium term, be so funded and determine a suitable amount to be covered by the suspension of interest payments. There will then remain an amount of debt that we expect to be funded in other ways. That would be through a mixture of tolls and, possibly, burdens by precept; the bridge board has precepting powers. It will be for the bridge board to propose how that funding should be arranged. If it involves a large increase in tolls, as I explained to my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes, a procedure allows for objections, appeal, public inquiry and, ultimately, a decision by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

I referred earlier to the lack of action by the bridge board to maintain the value of its tolled income. In our continuing discussions with the board on the financial position and how we may implement the proposed legislation, I will bear in mind the fact that the failure of its Bill and the board's failure to make use of other procedures that are available to maintain toll increases in line with inflation since August 1989 resulted in the forgoing of at least £10 million to £11 million of revenue. For an average council tax payer in Hull, that would be, roughly, an additional £37—or 7 per cent. each year.

Clause 1 confers powers on the Secretary of State for Transport to write off sums and suspend payment of interest on sums payable to him by the bridge board. It provides that that power to remit debt should be exercisable by an order, subject to the negative procedure in the House. Before my right hon. Friend can make such an order, Treasury consent is needed.

In seeking to provide a long-term solution to the problem of managing the Humber bridge debt, we shall seek to safeguard the national taxpayer from any unnecessary contributions. It should be clear to the House that the national taxpayer's existing contribution of £40 million a year is already substantial. It will also be our aim to ensure that the local taxpayers of Hull, and Humberside generally, are rid of the threat of an intolerable long-term burden of debt. The bridge board is able to issue precepts to meet deficits in its accounts, but the liability to precept is not spread evenly among the local authorities of Humberside.

Sir Anthony Durant: Who appoints the bridge board? Who are the appointees?

Mr. Watts: It is appointed by the authorities and the successor authorities to those that promoted the bridge in the first place. It is a local authority bridge that is promoted by local authorities and managed by a board on their behalf.

Two small areas—Barton-upon-Humber, which is now part of Glanford, and Haltemprice, which is now part of Beverley—are liable to the current value of an old fourpenny rate. There is, however, unlimited liability for the city of Kingston upon Hull. A precept levied by the board would therefore fall mainly on the council tax payers of Hull. As I have said, if they had to meet current deficits, they would face an additional council tax charge of something in excess of £200 per taxpayer per annum in perpetuity.

Mr. Michael Brown: My hon. Friend should be wearing a red outfit and a white beard today, because he is really playing the role of Father Christmas to the city of Hull, is he not? The city of Hull has the largest share of members of the board. It wanted the bridge more than anybody else. It drove the legislation through the House. There is only a small representation from the old Glanford borough council, Barton-upon-Humber urban district council and Haltemprice urban district council. The vast majority of the liability for the bridge lies in the legislation that Hull city council, more than anybody else, drove before the House. Why is my hon. Friend playing Santa Claus to the city of Hull?

Mr. Watts: I suppose it is because we are not very far from Christmas, and I would rather be in the role for which my hon. Friend suggests that I may be auditioning than the role of Scrooge. I am sure that the people of Hull will have recognised that they should be wary in future of the false Father Christmases who gave them this present, which has turned out to be such a heavy liability.

We have not ruled out precepting, and it could, for example, be a useful safety net to cope with short-term fluctuations and any special items of expenditure for a limited time. At the end of the day, it is the board's responsibility to decide whether any deficit is best met by precepting or by tolls.

Our objective would be to encourage the bridge board to set and maintain a high but realistic level of tolls; however, it must be borne in mind that, under the current legislation, the Secretary of State has a role in considering toll applications fairly following a public inquiry. As I have said, that role could be prejudiced if he required a specific level of tolls, or if I gave an idea of what I thought that level should be.

At this stage, I cannot be specific about the proportion of debt that would be written off, and the proportion on which interest payments would be suspended. We shall need to discuss that in detail with the Treasury and the bridge board. We do not propose to write off all the debt that is not currently serviceable. Given the long time scale over which debt may be repaid, it is possible that some could be reactivated in the future, so we shall seek to write off only debt that is clearly irrecoverable for ever. We envisage that a proportion of debt not written off but on which interest payments will be suspended will provide a cushion—a safeguard for the national taxpayer against the possibility of writing off now debt that could be serviced in future.

In reaching a decision on the amount of debt owed to the Secretary of State for Transport that can be serviced, we shall have regard to a range of financial projections that reflect different estimates of traffic growth, operating and maintenance costs, inflation and interest rates. In making use of the Bill's provisions, we shall monitor the board's performance very closely.

After the initial discussions, we shall conduct major reviews of the bridge's finances at least every five years. In those reviews, we shall consider whether the existing arrangements for suspending debt need modification—for example, by reactivation of debt that has been suspended, requiring the reactivation of interest payments. My Department and the Humber Bridge Board will have a great deal of work to do to make the best use of the powers conferred by the Bill. I do not think that there should be any doubt about the need for those powers: they give my Department and the bridge board the tools that they need to sort the matter out.

I very much regret that the Bill is needed; but Conservative Administrations have always had to follow Labour Governments with a bucket and shovel.

Mr. McNamara: Will the Minister now answer the question that he refused to answer earlier? Will he confirm that no contracts had been let and no tenders accepted up to June 1970; that those that were accepted were accepted with the full knowledge and consent of the then Conservative Minister of Transport; and that they could not have gone ahead if a Conservative Government had not provided the money? Far from a Conservative Government having to tidy up a Labour mess—if there was a mess, an idea that I do not accept—the arrangement was countenanced and approved by a Conservative Prime Minister and Minister of Transport, and the ordure had the seal of approval.

Mr. Watts: I understand from what the hon. Gentleman has just said that the promise given on 18 January 1966 was an empty promise which the Labour Government of the day had no intention of fulfilling, and certainly did not fulfil until they were reaching the end of their term in office at the time of the 1970 general election.

The need for the Bill is a testament to the failure of the Humber bridge to meet the financial objectives originally set for it. It is a monument to false expectations of traffic growth that would finance the bridge. It may have been a bridge too far, but it was built, and we must now deal—however reluctantly—with the consequences. I commend the Bill to the House.

4.58 pm

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): I do not know whether the Minister shares my sense of intruding on a family reunion, or even an old family feud. I hesitate to talk of the family feud involving the Beverley Hillbillies in the presence of the hon. Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran). Who would play the parts of Ma and Pa? I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) and the hon. Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) would fit the roles. We certainly have a sense of having been here before, although I cannot trace many debates on this subject on the Floor of the House. It seems that we will be here again, because there will be a negative order before the House. I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House will relish the opportunity to discuss that order, if and when it is finally put before the House.

Before we get into the Bill's nitty-gritty, it is worth putting on record the achievement of building the bridge. Mr. Roger Evans, the bridgemaster and engineer, always quotes it as "imposing proof of British engineering skill."

It is genuinely a world wonder, with two 533-ft towers, which are set almost two inches out of parallel to allow for the earth's curvature. It is the longest single-span suspension bridge in the world, although that record may soon be challenged by bridges being built elsewhere. I understand that 50 million vehicles have used the bridge since it was built. There are therefore some clear concrete, one might say, things to say about the bridge, which are worth saying to put some perspective on the debate.

The latest review that I have read of the financial position of such crossings was undertaken by the Select Committee on Transport in 1983-84. It said that only three of the 11 major estuarial crossings—the Forth, Tamar and Tay crossings—were in a position to meet their interest payments, capital amortisation and other charges. The other eight crossings failed to generate sufficient income to meet interest charges and were borrowing to meet them, thus leading to a continuing rise in outstanding debt, which amounted to £516 million.

Let us not forget that that was 10 years ago. The Committee added that the Humber bridge accounted for 40 per cent. of the total debt. This is not, therefore, a unique case, although it may be an extreme one, so I concur with the Minister's view that special reasons exist for viewing the Humber bridge in the way we do.

It is worth briefly going over the history; I do so not to provoke any challenge from colleagues who have been more intimately involved in the matter over the years. As a Labour Member of Parliament, I take my full share of the blame for the bridge's initial construction being granted in 1959. I was six years old at the time, and gladly admit to my full part in that decision, with the passing of the Humber Bridge Act 1959 and the creation of the Humber Bridge Board in 1959.

Construction, however, was not begun until 1973, during the Government of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath). At that point, the bridge and approach roads cost £98 million to build, but by the time the bridge opened, under another Conservative Government in 1981, the debt had already risen to £150 million as a result of interest charges during construction. I am sure that we are all aware of the high interest and inflation rates of the early 1970s, when Tony Barber was Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Construction costs were originally estimated at £29 million. The Humber Bridge Board attributes most of that cost increase not only to high inflation rates during construction, but to the fact that the bridge took nine years to build, instead of the proposed four or five. There were, I understand, technical difficulties, labour relations problems and unusually poor weather.

The bridge's construction was funded, as the Minister has said, by way of loans from the Department of Transport and the Public Works Loans Board, which were to be repaid out of toll income, with the Humber Bridge Board being given powers under section 74 of the Humber Bridge Act to make up any deficit via rate precepts. As I have pointed out with the Select Committee on Transport's review of river crossings, it is unusual, although not unique, for a bridge to be able to pay out such money through toll revenues.

Since the bridge's opening, income from tolls and charges has been more than sufficient to cover the operating and maintenance costs, but has not created a surplus large enough to cover the interest charges. The Secretary of State for Transport and the board entered into an agreement, again referred to by the Minister, on 29 March 1972 to capitalise the interest on borrowed money for 13 years from the opening of the bridge until 1994. That has since been extended to 1999.

At the same time as agreeing that, the then Minister for Roads and Traffic, Mr. Chope, reconfirmed that the Government intended to lift the prospect of a burden of debt falling on local Humberside taxpayers by promoting a Bill to write off or suspend debt, and instituting a five-yearly review period.

The precise amount of debt that will be written off arising from an agreement between the Government and the Humber Bridge Board will be the subject of negotiation—that much we have been told today. The Bill contains no specific amount, and we will need to revisit that when and if a negative instrument is brought before the House.

Mr. Michael Brown: As the hon. Gentleman is speaking in the name of Her Majesty's Opposition, will he say what sort of figure, between zero and £435 million, he thinks the Government should write off?

Mr. Allen: I would be happy to allow the Minister to make that decision while he remains on the Government Front Bench, and perhaps to come to a similar or dissimilar decision when we change places.

The Department of Transport has remitted part of the interest falling due since 1991-92 under the Appropriation Acts to stabilise the debt. The grant to the board was £7.6 million in 1991-92, and provision was made for £43.5 million to be repaid in 1992-93. That has stabilised the debt at around £435 million.

[Mr. Allen]

A number of further questions arise from the way in which the Bill has been introduced, which I hope the Minister will note and perhaps, if he speaks again in the debate, be in a position to answer.

First, is the Bill the forerunner of other Bills on other estuarial crossings? The Minister may feel that a number of other crossings merit further consideration, either by Bill or by announcements on further works or debts.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Will the hon. Gentleman please tell us what estuarial crossings, anywhere in Britain, arose from a political bribe, for which the electorate must now pick up a bill for £435 million?

Mr. Allen: The hon. Gentleman should not make such disparaging remarks about the Macmillan Government in 1959 and the Heath Government of 1971, who initially approved the bridge's construction and then approved the moneys to create the bridge. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman seeks to attack distinguished former Conservative Prime Ministers in that way. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. These conversations across the Chamber are interesting, but it would be more useful to have them outside. Let us stick to the debate on the Bill.

Mr. Allen: The second question that I should like to ask the Minister involves the level of tolls. He was a little unkind about the Humber Bridge Board and its attempts to review the tolls level. He criticised it for being slow in making proposals. Will he therefore be a little more forthcoming about whether he would be prepared to support whatever emerged from a public inquiry launched by the Humber Bridge Board, which would review the bridge toll levels being and to be paid?

Mr. Watts: I think that I made it clear that I expect the Humber Bridge Board to make proposals for updating tolls, but, as I also explained, because the decision that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport would have to make following any inquiry is a quasi-judicial one, it is not possible for me, before I have seen the board's proposals, and considered any objections to its proposals, or the public inquiry's recommendations, to give an indication in advance of what level I would think reasonable, or that I would wish my right hon. Friend to consider reasonable.

Mr. Allen: I fully accept the quasi-judicial nature of the decisions that the Minister or the Secretary of State may need to take. Perhaps he would extend that quasi-judicial caution to attacks on the Humber Bridge Board over its efforts to present proposals on tolling. If he does that, perhaps he will be seen to be even-handed in carrying out his quasi-judicial function.

My third question relates to the deregulation of the tolled river crossings. I understand that, in the past year, the Department of Transport issued a consultation document on this matter, and that it has suggested three options. The first is the continuation of the current regulation; the second is partial deregulation, with tolls rising annually to a prescribed limit, under which key groups of users would have a right to object; and the third is full deregulation, with undertakings setting their own charges. How has that consultation gone, and how will it affect the bridge and the other river crossings in the United Kingdom?

I am sure that my suspicions about privatisation will be quickly allayed by the Minister. Is there any connection whatever between the Bill examining the debts— [Interruption.] Conservative Members seek to cast doubt on whether privatisation could follow. As a former member of the Public Accounts Committee and a mere reader of newspapers, I know that cancellation or elimination of debt was followed by the privatisation of a number of industries. That happened as surely as night follows day.

It is not beyond the wit of the Government to devise ways to pour money into the open pockets of those in the private sector, and they could do that from the most unlikely starting point, which may be the Bill. Perhaps the Minister will reassure us that there is no connection, however tenuous or long term, between the Bill and privatisation.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Allen: I have already given way to the hon. Gentleman, and he rather abused the privilege.

My final question is about roads. The Minister and his colleagues were characterised by the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) as like Santa Claus. Yesterday, local authorities did not regard the Minister as Santa Claus, because he and his colleagues cut by 17 per cent. the grant to local authorities for transport needs. That cut is in addition to the cut in the Budget settlement for roads. Has the Minister any proposals to enhance the north and south road links to the bridge?

The issue of the Humber bridge comes before us every so often, and I have a feeling that this will not be the last time that we shall discuss its importance. We fully support the Bill, and wish it speedy progress.

5.13 pm

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Thank you for calling me, Mr. Deputy Speaker. So far, the debate has been much too low key. There is a serious scandal, in that a bribe by the Labour party for the Hull, North by-election in January 1966 is crystallised in the Bill, so that taxpayers will permanently have to pay for it. That matter should not be allowed to pass without comment. Of course, many waters have flowed since January 1966.

Mr. McNamara: Particularly under the bridge.

Mr. Jessel: Yes—and probably sleaze as well. As a matter of courtesy, I notified the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) that I intended to speak in the debate and I am glad to see him here recovered from his flu. I ought to declare a sort of interest, because I was the defeated Conservative candidate in the Hull, North by-election on 25 January 1966. I feel no rancour about that because, had I got in, it is highly likely that I would have been out again by 1974, if not sooner.

My defeat paved the way for me to stand in Twickenham in 1970, and it has been a tremendous honour and privilege to represent that constituency ever since. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North did me a good turn, because my defeat in that by-election was one of the best things that ever happened to me.

As I have said, this matter cannot pass without comment. I should have liked the Minister to comment with even more force and I shall add some comments of my own. We are supposed to be the guardians of taxpayers' money, but, as a result of that by-election bribe, taxpayers will have to pay several hundred million pounds.

It is not clear exactly how much is to be written off, but let us be in no doubt about what "writing off" means. It does not mean that the loss just disappears: it means that we have given up hope of recovering the money. But the money has gone, and £456 million has so far gone down the drain for this no doubt highly architecturally impressive, but greatly under-used bridge.

That means that £456 million less is available for our health services, education, social security, national defences or other useful purposes. It follows that people who might want to be treated sooner by the national health service, for example, have a direct interest in the fact that several hundred million pounds have been written off as a result of the bribe in that by-election.

The bribe occurred because, in the general election of October 1964, Hull, North, which was a marginal seat, was gained by the Labour party; unfortunately, the newly elected Member, Mr. Solomons, died about 13 months later, in November 1965; the by-election was fixed for two months later, but his death reduced Harold Wilson's majority from three to two; if the by-election had gone the other way, it would have been reduced to one.

At the time, there was enormous interest in the by-election. There were very big public meetings. I remember one that was addressed by the late Lord Home, at which 1,200 people were present in Hull city hall. On 18 January, Mrs. Barbara Castle, the then Transport Minister, pledged to construct the Humber bridge, and that led to the debt which is the subject of the Bill. On page 95 of the Castle memoirs, she wrote:

> "Off to Hull to speak in the by-election. Photographers at the station. Standing room only at meetings. I told them categorically they would have their bridge. Speech went down well."

She wrote that in her diary. The day before yesterday, I had it on the authority of my hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Sir K. Speed), who cannot be present, that he was at Mrs. Castle's meeting on 18 January 1966, that she said, "You will get your bridge," and that there were loud cheers. The Minister has already quoted the words of the shadow Chancellor of the Exchequer at that time, that great man Iain Macleod, who referred to the plan for the Humber bridge as a pre-election bribe. He went on:

> "'First one of the junior Transport Ministers said that one was not needed. Then came the by-election. The same junior Minister promptly became much more enthusiastic about a new bridge.
> 'But the by-election continued to turn . . . and something more was needed. So Mrs. Castle says in Hull that . . . there will be a new bridge.'"

Mr. Macleod was quoted as saying that in The Times on 22 January 1966.

Anyone could predict—and many people did at the time—that the bridge would never pay. If the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) drove from Nottingham to Hull, regardless of whether he used the M1 or the A614, he would go along the motorway that skirts the southern side of Doncaster. The shortest way from there to Hull—well, the quickest way—is by using the M62 and not to go south of the Humber and then across the Humber bridge. With a toll, it will be more expensive as well as slower. From looking at the map, one sees that there are no large cities to the south of Hull.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): As someone who regularly drives from Scunthorpe, which is not very far from the Humber bridge, to London, I can tell the hon. Gentleman that it is 177 miles exactly from Scunthorpe to Westminster via the A1. It is 200 miles via the M62 and the M1. The route is shorter and saves money to go south to London, crossing the bridge at Hull, contrary to what he is saying.

Mr. Jessel: But one would have to pay to go across the bridge. Across Lincolnshire, one would travel a long way along A-class roads, which are not of dual-carriageway standard on the whole. Therefore, although it is a squeak shorter, it is slower. That is why the Humber bridge will never pay. The losses on it are absolutely enormous.

I accept that one cannot put the whole of the cost of the bridge on the people of Hull.

Mr. Michael Brown: Why not?

Mr. Jessel: Because it has escalated with accumulated interest to between £400 million and £500 million, and would cost every man, woman and child in the city of Hull about £2,000. The interest on it is not far short of £200 a year a head. It would therefore be impossible to put all that on the ordinary householders in Hull without it having a large impact on their welfare. The cost is so vast that it is simply too much now for them to pay.

I do not see why, however, beyond what comes in in tolls, the whole of the rest of the cost should be shouldered by the national taxpayers, who are thereby being made to pay for the Labour party's by-election bribe. A token amount ought to be borne by the council tax of Hull city council—perhaps only 1, 2 or 3 per cent. of it—just so that people are reminded of the expense that was incurred in their name. Perhaps the Bill could be amended so that part of the cost was attributable by law to be paid by the Labour party via Transport house. It would thereby have to pay part of the cost of the bribe with which it sought to distort the decision of the electors of Hull.

Mr. Watts: My hon. Friend makes an intriguing suggestion, but I fear that it would probably hybridise the Bill.

Mr. Jessel: Where there's a will, there's a way. It could be done if the House really wanted it to be done. Indeed, I hope to have some support from my hon. Friends in wanting it to happen.

We cannot go on letting Opposition Members bribe their way through elections when the cost of their bribe comes to 12 times the figure of £29 million in the 1960s, as stated by the hon. Member for Nottingham, North. Labour Members should be made to pay a part of the cost of the bridge, and we should remind them of it day in, day out, week in, week out and month in, month out, for the rest of next year, so that the whole country can see what they are up to.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): I am very pleased that the Government are introducing this important Bill. I support the important point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen). Whatever chaff goes from one side of the House to the other, we should realise that we are talking about one of the most stupendous examples of civil engineering in Europe, which is of enormous credit to British builders, designers and workmen. It was built on the most difficult terrain over a very wide estuary.

The building of the bridge was delayed because of problems on the south bank of the river—in a Tory constituency, but I do not hold that against the hon. Member responsible—when the south towers were being built. In addition, it is one of two very important bridges in the area. There are two great examples of civil engineering; the other is the bridge over the River Ouse. It was built on a bog, it has no bottom, it carries the M62 and has no toll at all.

The point that we should be addressing is what is the difference in principle between part of our transport infrastructure—the M62 bridge, a great engineering feat in itself—which carries no toll, and the Humber bridge? That is of the utmost importance.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: On that point—

Mr. McNamara: I shall not give way. I will let the young man chat later.

The hon. Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) said that the bridge was the crystallisation of a bribe. I must make a confession to the House. I did not know on the night that Barbara Castle was going to make that statement. The advice that I gave throughout the campaign had been, "Don't. You don't need to."

In many ways the campaign for the bridge at that time was media-led by the Hull Daily Mail. The demand for the bridge emanated from that newspaper, which had long campaigned for it. It saw a Government whom it felt might be vulnerable on that point, and led a very strong and powerful campaign for the bridge. I salute those at the paper for their effort, especially Charles Levitt, who was political correspondent at the time. Mr. Levitt was in fact—and still is, I understand—a Liberal.

I agree with the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) that it is outrageous that private money had to fund the building of the bridge to Skye. The tolls that are to be levied make it even worse. There should not be any tolls.

The campaign for the Humber bridge was media-led, as I have said. Indeed, I have been since told by those who conducted in-depth polls at the time among groups of people who discussed such things, that the Humber bridge scarcely appeared in the list of priorities of people in the Kingston upon Hull, North constituency who were seeking to re-elect a Labour Member of Parliament.

I turn to the history of the bridge and the myths surrounding it, especially those that have been put forward by the hon. Member for Twickenham. He says that he is grateful that I beat him and thereby enabled him to get his seat in Twickenham. I do not think that the people of Twickenham are particularly happy about it, since over the years his majority has gone down—he might well be out next time—whereas, on the contrary, mine has gone up and up. The hon. Gentleman said that the bridge crystallised the bribe, but let us consider the situation.

In 1959, a private Member's Bill was introduced with the approval of the then Conservative Government to establish the bridge board. In 1965, the House debated the Humber bridge and some of us listened from the Gallery. The Minister of Transport—the late Stephen Swingler, a very fine man—poured cold water on the idea and wished that my former colleague the late Mr. James Johnson had not introduced it.

We then had a campaign in Hull, which Lady Castle attended. Her words at the meeting in Lambert Street school were:

> "When the planning is completed, then you will have your bridge."

I did not attend that meeting because I was at a meeting at Endyke school. In those days, great election meetings were held.

Ian Macleod, to whom the hon. Member for Twickenham referred, was Chancellor of the Exchequer for part of the time when the Conservative Government gave the go-ahead, allowed the contracts and tenders to go out and voted the money, and the noble Lord Peyton was Minister of Transport. They could have stopped the building of the bridge. I understand that the Tories' complaint is that the Conservative Government fulfilled a Labour election promise. I wish that the Tories would keep some of their own promises, too, such as lowering taxation. The issue is that the building of the bridge was agreed then.

Mr. Michael Brown: I understand what the hon. Gentleman is trying to say. I do not dispute the fact that the bridge was given the "go-ahead" in 1971 following Lady Castle's commitment in 1966, but does the hon. Gentleman accept that the then Conservative Government made it clear that they were not giving but lending money? I have the copy of Hansard before me that shows that.

Mr. McNamara: Yes, but the building of the bridge could not have gone ahead had the money not been lent. The hon. Gentleman has said far more than the Minister of State was prepared to admit. He dodged the question every time that I asked it, and it is important that the House knows the answer.

The original cost was to be £19 million. By 1973, after two years of Barber and hyperinflation, it had risen to £35 million. It was escalating all the time that the Tories were in power because of their inability to control interest rates and inflation. Those are the reasons for the debt and people should be prepared to accept that. I do not blame the Tories for it completely. I blame them only for winning the 1970 election; otherwise sound finance under the then Mr. Jenkins would have continued. The only thing to his credit is that he was a successful Labour Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Last week, the hon. Member for Twickenham said:

> "As to next Wednesday's debate on the Humber Bridge (Debts) Bill, I was the defeated Conservative candidate in the Hull, North by-election in January 1966, nearly 30 years ago."

He went on to ask:

> "Will there be time in Wednesday's debate for us to discuss whether the amount—nearly £500 million—should be charged to the Labour party and not to the unfortunate taxpayer, as a consequence of Labour's disgraceful electoral bribe?"—[Official Report, 14 December 1995; Vol. 268, c. 1105.]

Everything that the hon. Gentleman said in the House last Thursday and today was incorrect, apart from the fact that he was a defeated Conservative candidate in 1966.

My constituents and the area have benefited from the Humber bridge.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: So have you.

Mr. McNamara: The hon. Gentleman says that I have benefited. All the polls at that time showed that my constituents regarded the Humber bridge as a less important issue in the by-election than the media made it out to be. I do not hesitate in saying that I welcome the bridge and every hon. Member should be proud of it. It has the additional merit of joining Yorkshire with Lincolnshire and thus bringing the opportunity of civilisation to Lincolnshire. We should be happy about that, too.

But for the almighty debt, the bridge has an operating surplus. It can pay its maintenance costs of £1.7 million to £2 million a year and make a profit, but the debt is dragging it down. The debt has arisen because of what has happened over time. I do not seek to blame the debt entirely on the Conservatives; I simply ask them not to shirk their part of the responsibility for what has happened. We can then all join in welcoming the Bill.

Mr. John Hutton (Barrow and Furness): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This afternoon, I learned that the Ministry of Defence has decided to award a contract for the design and building of up to three Trafalgar-class submarines to a team led by GEC-Marconi in preference to a bid by Vickers Shipbuilding and Engineering Ltd. in my constituency. The total value of the contract exceeds £2.5 billion.

Involvement in the contract is essential for the future of VSEL and the jobs of thousands of my constituents. The Government's decision today will, at the very least, create unwelcome uncertainty about the future of VSEL, where nearly 10,000 jobs have already been lost—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. What is the point of order for the Chair?

Mr. Hutton: The fact that no statement has been made in the House on that major contract is an insult to my constituents and denies me an opportunity to raise my concerns about the contract in the House. Have you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, received a request from a Minister of the Crown to make a statement to the House about that major contract decision?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am not aware of an intention to make such a statement. This is not a matter for the Chair. The hon. Gentleman is aware that there are other avenues that he can take to air his concerns.

Mr. John Spellar (Warley, West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the same point of order?

Mr. Spellar: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have now ruled on that point of order. The hon. Gentleman cannot raise a point of order further to a point of order on which I have ruled. Is it a different point of order?

Mr. Spellar: It is a different aspect of that point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In that case, I shall listen to it.

Mr. Spellar: Is it not a great discourtesy to the House and individual Members that, at this late stage, just before the Christmas recess, that announcement has been sneaked out and therefore—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is taking advantage. I have already ruled on that matter and told the hon. Gentleman so. He assured me that his was a different point of order. It was not. I call Mr. Michael Brown.

5.37 pm

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): We have had an interesting and entertaining afternoon, being reminded what used to go on in politics in the 1960s, when Labour was in power and trying to cling on to power. My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) and the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) were protagonists in the events of January and February 1966, when I was 14 years old. I recall the night of the sad defeat of my hon. Friend and the election of the hon. Gentleman. I remember staying up and listening to the wireless—we did not have a television in my home in those days—because I was interested in politics and knew that, if Mr. Wilson succeeded in holding that seat, there would probably be a general election and a Labour win. I was anxious that that should not happen. I remember the events from the perspective of a boy still at school. Little did I realise that, 15 years later in 1981, I would welcome Her Majesty the Queen to my constituency when she was the first person to drive over the Humber bridge.

I do not dissent from what the hon. Members for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) and for Kingston upon Hull, North said: the bridge is a magnificent sight. I can see it from where I live some eight miles away in Ulceby. It is wonderful. It looks good. And so it jolly well should when we consider how much it has cost for one reason or another.

Let us not get away from the fact that the bridge was not proposed by the Labour Government until a by-election occurred. My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham told the House that the first intimation of a Government go-ahead came at the point of a critical by-election. The Humber Bridge (Debts) Bill should indeed be sent as an election expenses bill to the Labour party, if not to the agent for the Kingston upon Hull, North constituency Labour party. I am prepared to put the burden on Walworth road, rather than the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. McNamara: If the hon. Gentleman is going to send the bill to my agent, we are not certain where it should go, but I am sure that he would give him the benefit of the doubt.

Mr. Brown: In that case, as my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham proposed, there should be a clause suggesting that part of the bill should go to Walworth road. I accept that we would then have a hybrid Bill that would suffer all the difficulties that the Humber Bridge Bill—a private Bill—suffered the year before last.

My hon. Friend the Minister has come here as Santa Claus on behalf of the British taxpayer. My constituents and I will benefit from this wonderful deliverance, which other hon. Members on both sides of the House are going to give us by supporting the Bill. Why should I object to the possibility of up to £435 million of taxpayers' money being spent, which may rule out a bypass in Twickenham, north Kent or anywhere else? I have an interest to declare—that of my constituents. I cannot believe their luck; they are to have the privilege of the Bill.

Mr. Allen: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way; he is very generous. Although, like myself, he was probably still a small child in short trousers at the time, can he tell us why the Conservative Government gave a fair wind to the Humber Bridge Act 1959 and to the creation of the board?

Mr. Brown: Yes, I can easily do so. When I was still having to be convinced of the merits of the Bill, I got a copy of the Humber Bridge Act 1959 and I have here all the yellowing pages of the proceedings. It was a private Bill and, as the hon. Gentleman knows, Governments usually do not take sides on private Bills. There was no debate in the House of Commons on any of the Readings, which all occurred after Prayers and before the start of public business.

Presumably, the Government had no problem with the 1959 Act because not a penny piece of taxpayers' money was involved in that Act, which is now on the statute book. I presume that the Macmillan Government took the view that, because section 77 of the Act states that, in the event of any unpaid debt being outstanding to the Secretary of State for Transport, the corporation of the city of Hull and the urban district councils of Beverley and Barton-upon-Humber would pay back every penny, there would be no taxpayers' involvement and, for that reason, they allowed the legislation to go through.

I expect that the hon. Gentleman will want to turn to the Humber Bridge Act 1971, when the Tories were in power again, and ask the same question. Why did they allow the 1971 Act to go through without objecting to it? For the same reason. Because that Act of Parliament also made it absolutely clear that, despite all the powers sought by the Humber Bridge Board, there would not be one penny piece of taxpayers' money for the venture. All the taxpayers' money that was to be lent to the Humber Bridge Board would be repaid to the Secretary of State. That is why neither Conservative Government of 1959 or of 1971 had any objections to those Acts.

It has been patently obvious to those of us who have had anything to do with politics and with the debate surrounding the Humber bridge in the past 10 years and, indeed, since the day it opened—to all of us locally, whether Labour or Conservative Members of Parliament, whether from North Lincolnshire or the East Riding of Yorkshire, or from what will be called Humberside for just three more months until next April—that the traffic that was forecast in the 1960s and 1970s and that justified the repayment of the debt, would not materialise.

If the Minister wants to take full advantage of the legislation that is available to him on the statute book, a mechanism is available. My hon. Friend did not need to come here today. In future, when bodies come to this House—be they local authorities or private organisations—with private legislation and make it clear that there are no financial implications for the taxpayer, we have to be much more careful about the viability of the projects involved.

In 1959 and 1971, the House was clearly somewhat tardy in considering those pieces of private legislation. In the past 10 years, it has been patently obvious to all concerned that none of those provisions could be achieved. If my hon. Friend the Minister wanted to do nothing, he could empower the local authorities, through the Humber Bridge Board, to take the necessary action under those Acts of Parliament, which would bankrupt the city of Hull.

No Labour Member has any cause to be critical of my hon. Friend the Minister. The only people who might be critical are Conservative colleagues who might yesterday have been reflecting with sadness on the announcements relating to capital programmes throughout the country made by the Department of Transport. At the end of the day, my hon. Friend has to take this money out of his Department's budget—with Treasury approval. He is to be congratulated by everyone on Labour Benches. In so far as there is any criticism, it is likely to come from the Conservative Benches.

Locally, we recognise that the bridge is wonderful, but the blunt truth is that there are not the traffic figures to justify it. What concerns me about the possibility of an increase in the tolls is that some of my constituents have to use the bridge, whether they like it or not. If one has a heart attack or a brain tumour in my constituency, one has to go to Hull hospital and one has to use the bridge. We do not have the option of going to Grimsby, Scunthorpe or Lincoln hospitals. If one suffers from certain diseases, the health authority requires one to cross that bridge.

I am concerned that there is no price on the face of the Bill to show the extent to which the Department will wipe off the irrecoverable amounts, because I want to know what the balance will be between toll increases and the amount of debt that the Minister says is irrecoverable. For those of my constituents who have no choice but to use the bridge, the level of the toll is very important. I accept that the Humber Bridge Board has been tardy since 1989, in not seeking to be responsible for making regular increases in line with inflation. Unfortunately, to the ordinary citizen in my constituency faced with paying £1.60, an increase in the toll to £2 or £2.50 will seem a massive hike.

I am glad that my hon. Friend the Minister is not trying to change the system whereby my constituents and I can go to a public inquiry to present our case in the event of the board increasingly the toll unreasonably. In 1989, I attended the public inquiry and gave evidence on behalf of my constituents.

I acknowledge that the bridge is a convenience for many people, including my constituents who choose to work in Hull rather than in Grimsby, Lincoln or Scunthorpe. They choose to take advantage of the bridge and they gain the benefits of travelling shorter distances and saving time. That is an economic choice that they must make. Those of my constituents who, while the county of Humberside remains, have to go to county hall to transact business, have no option but to use the bridge.

I hope that many of my constituents will not have to use the bridge so often after 1 April, when the local authority boundaries will be changed, Humberside will be expunged as a local government authority and we shall have, instead, North Lincolnshire and North-East Lincolnshire. But at present, some people have no option but to use the bridge and they look to their Member of Parliament to be able to attend the public inquiries to put their case. I am glad that my hon. Friend the Minister is not seeking to alter that system—at least for now—although, as the hon. Member for Nottingham, North said, consultation proposals are being discussed about the future of toll crossings.

The hon. Member for Nottingham, North suggested that if all the debt was wiped off, privatisation would be terrible. If I were the shadow Chancellor and somebody said to me, "Is there no debt left on the bridge because of that wonderful Minister whom the Tories had? I understand that you are against privatisation, but I should like to buy and operate that bridge," I can assure the hon. Gentleman that, as shadow Chancellor, I would jump at the offer like a shot. There will be no such offer because I do not accept—as the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North said earlier—that, if the debt is wiped off, the traffic will justify the operation of the bridge. Some sort of support system will always be needed, if not from the general taxpayer, certainly from the local authorities.

The local authorities have a part to play, and the Humber Bridge Board will have to be much more imaginative than it has been. I regret that the Humber Bridge Board has not increased toll traffic using the bridge by introducing a more imaginative discounted ticket scheme. Many of my constituents would be prepared to use the bridge more often if there were discounts on some occasions.

There are leisure opportunities, including the leisure centre, on the north bank. My constituents pay council tax to support the leisure centre, the Hull ice arena—they are shareholders in it—but they do not use it because they have to pay a toll to travel over the bridge. If the board were prepared to introduce a system of discounted tickets at weekends to encourage greater use of the bridge, it could generate more income. The board is trapped in a local authority style and has not shown imagination in trying to make more of the circumstances.

The bridge exists; in retrospect, if the Governments of either 1966 or 1971 had known what the future would bring in terms of the national motorway network, neither of them would have gone ahead with such a proposal. If there were no Humber bridge today, I cannot believe that either the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the shadow Chancellor would go ahead with such a proposal. But the bridge exists and, short of knocking it down, we can do nothing but make something of it.

We obviously have to do something about the problem of increasing debt. I am aware that my constituents benefit to a considerable extent from the revenues of the rest of the taxpayers. The bridge is surrounded by far too much politics and does not have enough to do with the local economy. I accept that there has been some economic investment around the area, both north and south, which might have been partly due to the good communications in the area generally. But I do not believe that when expanding industries come to my constituency, as dozens of them do, they want to locate their factories there because of the Humber bridge. They locate their factories in my constituency because of the national motorway network, the airport, the skilled labour, the good industrial relations and for a host of other reasons. The bridge is certainly part of the local infrastructure and will be there for ever; we cannot let it fall into disrepair.

The Humber Bridge Board must recognise that it has failed in its attempts to increase the tolls in a sensible way, in line with inflation. If we are not careful, we shall face a gigantic increase in tolls that will cost some of my constituents far too much. I press my hon. Friend the Minister—if not today, when the order comes before the House—to say precisely how much of the £435 million will be irrecoverable. I appreciate that he cannot tell me today.

I also want to press my hon. Friend the Minister and the board on the precise toll figure that we can expect. We could fall into a terrible trap: if the toll is increased too much, many of my constituents who have the opportunity not to use the bridge will decide not to work in Hull as it is not worth their while because of the costs of travelling over the bridge. They may decide that it is better for them to take a job with lower wages in Lincoln, Scunthorpe or Grimsby, because after they have paid their return tolls, they may have spent £40 or £50 a week. We could find ourselves in a spiral of decline and the debt could begin to increase again.

The Government and the Humber Bridge Board must be careful: if they decide to let the local user pay as much as possible and to milk the local user with no option but to use the bridge, they may find that local users—other than those poor people who have no choice but to use Hull hospital—will make alternative arrangements. The Government and the board must be wary of a dramatic leap in the toll rate.

We are now just four or five days from Christmas and my hon. Friend the Minister has come here as Santa Claus. If I did not represent Brigg and Cleethorpes as a Conservative Member, but represented another constituency elsewhere in the United Kingdom, and if I had not been able to obtain a bypass for my constituents, I would probably vote against the Bill. However, I shall certainly support the Bill today.

5.57 pm

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): Much of today's Second Reading debate has involved the history of the Humber bridge. As we are near Christmas, I shall let the House into a little secret: at the back end of 1981, when I was selected to represent Kingston upon Hull, West, I was given some advice before I attended the selection meeting. I was told to mention the Humber bridge because the people of the area were proud of it. I do not think that that tip swung the contest my way—I won it with a great landslide—but I record the incident as it reveals people's attitude towards the Humber bridge then.

I shall not stray too far back into the history except to say that, before the 1966 by-election in Kingston upon Hull, North, there had been much discussion for many years about modernising the Humber crossing. It would be outrageous for the House even to suggest that we—a major industrial country—should have retained a ferry crossing at one of our most important estuaries.

After the boundary changes, my new constituency border will probably be within a mile of the Humber bridge. The area that I represent—I say this as a worried person—has a lot of economic and social deprivation, and we need to modernise. We need a mechanism to improve the development of the area and to gain economically and socially.

The bridge itself is a fine piece of work. I have always regarded the Minister as a competent person, but I will not follow the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) in describing him as Father Christmas. We do not know whether he will be Father Christmas, because we do not know the figures. Until we know, we shall not be able to respond to the very uncharacteristic comments by the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes and by the hon. Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) that the cost should be dumped on to the people of Hull. That kind of comment is not very becoming just before Christmas.

Funding is at the heart of the matter. The project escalated in price because it was advanced, there were problems with subsidence on the south side of the river, and there were changes in the specification. However, the funding of the project was based on loans, at a time of high inflation and when interest rates were very high. The system of funding for that magnificent project was not viable. There was no possibility, in the economic circumstances that prevailed at that time, that the project could be viable.

I welcome the Bill in principle, because I believe that it will offload much of the debt that is interest-rate linked and will enable the books to be balanced. That is just plain common sense. The Bill will be good for Hull, as long as there is no massive offloading of the financial problems on to the people of Kingston upon Hull, West, which will include Hessle under the boundary changes.

The escalation in cost was horrific. My figures show that in 1970, the cost was £19 million; that rose to £35 million; to £67 million; to £98 million; and finally to £151 million. Those figures are horrific, but we had huge inflation rates at the time—11 per cent. for a long time. We were also capitalising the debt, which resulted in the loan rising as it has.

Traffic levels have been acceptable. Some people say that the bridge is not used, and hon. Members have said that today. That is absurd. The bridge is used extensively. The problem of financial viability is not related directly to the traffic. The mismatch between the debt arising from the interest rates and the income from the tolls is so great that it is impossible to solve the problem from the tolls. The Minister's speech alluded to that.

The main problem has been the Government's inaction. It is clear that the funding arrangements were not viable, and I regret that we have not taken action sooner. There has been a regrettable amount of procrastination. I also regret that the Humber Bridge Board was not aware that the Bill was going to be published. The board had no forewarning of the Bill, and in May it decided to increase the tolls by 32.5 per cent. to try to balance the books.

I wish to ask the Minister about privatisation. There is rumour whizzing around that the Bill is part of a devious scheme to prepare the ground, and to get rid of the debt so that the project can be become viable and ready for privatisation. I would also like to know more about the deregulation. At the moment, the bridge board has powers, but are there plans to change the system of regulation to total deregulation? Specifically, is there a plan to allow the tolls to be changed at any time rather than annually? An answer to that would be helpful.

I have focused on viability, and the failure to get to grips with the financial arrangements. The debt is now running at the stupid and absurd figure of £439 million. That is the latest figure I have. It is unacceptable to allow that to continue. As I said earlier, the interest charges on the long-term money have gone up by £50 million per annum. The toll income is about £10 million, of which about £1.75 million is used in operational costs. We are a long way from achieving balance in the books, so I welcome in principle the idea that at last we shall wipe out some of the debt.

We must make the Humber bridge operate viably, because that is important for economic regeneration. We do not want high tolls, because they stifle use, and that is wrong. Many man hours and years have been spent tackling the problem of debt, and nobody likes that. I hope that, when my constituents ask me whether the Minister will be a Father Christmas, I can say that I think he will. However, we need to see the impact on the council tax payers in Hull. I hope that the Bill will be good news.

6.8 pm

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Earlier this afternoon, at the request of the Labour Opposition, we spent 42 minutes on allegations of sleaze against a public official—the director general of Oflot, Peter Davis. He was accused because he had tried to save the taxpayer the cost of his travelling expenses on official business. There was a busy House then, but look at the House now. This debate is about perhaps the biggest political sleaze scandal of all time.

We are being asked to write off £435 million because of a political and electoral bribe by the Labour party some 30 years ago. Let us be clear what that was about. In the other place, when he was replying for the Labour Government, Lord Lindgren said about the Humber bridge:

"at the present time our limited resources do not allow us to give construction of such a bridge the highest priority."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 30 November 1965; Vol. 270, c. 1136.]

Yet two months later, the then Minister, Mrs. Barbara Castle, made it clear in her diaries, which my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) so aptly quoted, that the Labour Government intended to offer a clear electoral bribe. She wrote in her diary:

> "Off to Hull to speak in the by-election; photographers at station, standing room only at meetings. I told them categorically that, as soon as the development plan was decided for Humberside, they would have their bridge. Speeches went down well."

I bet they did.

I have been absolutely amazed, and perhaps have felt a tinge of admiration, at the brass face of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), who has been the beneficiary of what is perhaps the biggest political bribe in history. The cost of it is far more than his own weight in gold. The taxpayers have paid for that gold. The hon. Gentleman has stood up today, however, and said it was quite wrong to set tolls on the bridge in the first place. We are passing on to the taxpayer a debt of £435 million, but he now wants to pass on even more debt. He is about to get up and tell us how much the debt would be if no tolls had been set.

Mr. McNamara: I just want to ask the hon. Gentleman what proportion of the development costs of Concorde were written off in order to make it a suitable object for Lord King and privatisation. What about the debts of British Steel, British Rail and all the other debts that have been wiped out to enable the hon. Gentleman and his friends in the City to line their pockets from privatisations?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I want to stop this once and for all. It serves no useful purpose in a debate to exchange insulting remarks across the Chamber. Responsible and good debate can well do without insulting personal remarks, whoever they come from and whoever they are aimed at. I hope that we will not hear any more insults.

Mr. Arnold: I do not recall a by-election at Heathrow, east or west or north. I notice that the hon. Gentleman did not even try to quantify the cost to the taxpayer had no tolls been set for 30 years. Now we are being asked to pass on to the taxpayer a debt of £435 million.

I noticed earlier that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North accused Peter Davis of sleaze because his wife and the wife of an American business man had been friends for 20 years. The hon. Gentleman has been friends with the bridge for 30 years because it started his political career.

The brass face of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North is exceeded only by the contemptuous dismissal of the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), who has not even bothered to turn up. He is usually ready to throw around wild allegations of sleaze, but when the Labour party is on the receiving end of such allegations, he is not here. Perhaps that is a commentary on how any future Labour Government would deal with difficult questions.

Was the bridge an electoral bribe or was it not? The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North denied that the project had any electoral impact, but the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) well and truly let the cat out of the bag when he said that at his first election to the western division of Hull his agent said, "Don't forget to mention the bridge. It will go down awfully well."

Mr. Randall: It is important for me to clarify the matter. I was advised that the people of our area are very proud of the bridge. That is perfectly reasonable. That pride has nothing to do with bribery.

Mr. Arnold: If they are delighted with the bridge, obviously they are delighted with the people who ran up the bill, which everyone is now having to settle, including my constituents in Kent.

The people of north-west Kent particularly resent paying that bill because for many years our roads by the two Dartford tunnels were clogged up every morning. We waited and we waited, but the Labour Government never gave us a Dartford bridge to solve our problems. Perhaps it was because we did not have a by-election in the immediate vicinity. We had to wait for a Conservative Government to introduce a scheme to raise private investment to build a far more beautiful bridge than the Humber bridge, the Queen Elizabeth II bridge on the Thames. My constituents resent paying a proportion of the Humber bridge debt.

When my hon. Friend the Minister finally works out on whom the enormous debt will land, I hope he ensures that the city of Hull jolly well pays a considerable proportion of it. Let the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North, who was a beneficiary of the bridge, explain that to the people of Hull.

I must confess that I felt a certain amount of irritation throughout my hon. Friend the Minister's speech. I sometimes think the Government commit the cardinal sin of being too responsible. They work out the accounts of our country far too responsibly. If a bill is run up, and is then to be written off, I would prefer it if my hon. Friend came to the Dispatch Box, put the Humber Bridge (Debts) Bill on it and said to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, "I propose this formally, and I expect the people who incurred the debt of £435 million to stand at the Dispatch Box and justify why we should impose that enormous debt on the people of this country."

Mr. Watts: I am not quite ready to change places with the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen).

Mr. Arnold: That was not my point. As a Minister, my hon. Friend had to draft the Bill—he acted responsibly—but the Opposition incurred the debt for the British public and they should come to the Dispatch Box to justify it.

The speech of the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), the Opposition spokesman, was uncharacteristically subdued, as well it might be. He was quite happy to shelter under the skirts of the Minister and let my hon. Friend bear the weight of explaining the Bill's purpose.

Who were the beneficiaries of the Humber bridge project? The answer is the Labour party. Where is it today? There is not a single Labour Member here other than those from the immediate vicinity of the bridge, and what a lot of apologies we have heard from them.

Our taxpayers have been treated with contempt. One does not need to raise one's eyes particularly high to notice that the press do not seem to give a damn about the taxpayer either.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) was right when he said that the £435 million is coming out of the capital programme of the Department of Transport. Many of us were in the Chamber yesterday to discover what will become of our capital programmes, and the allocations for them were far lower than we might otherwise have hoped. My constituents in Gravesham did not get their Northfleet bypass. I can blame the Labour-Liberal council for making that a secondary priority, but—

Mr. Allen: It is because the Government grant is down 17 per cent.

Mr. Arnold: I note that sedentary intervention from the Opposition spokesman. I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman knows that 17 per cent. is part of the impact of swallowing £435 million in one go. Has he quantified that? It is disgraceful that because of the Labour party's political sleaze taxpayers across the country will have to foot a bill of £435 million.

Mr. Allen: Let me just reply to the hon. Gentleman's tirade. If he continues to support ever-larger tax cuts in the basic rate of income tax—taxes are increased in other areas—he must accept that that money must be found from somewhere. Yesterday's announcement of a 17 per cent. reduction in local transport projects, which are funded by central Government, must be found from some source. Of course the hon. Gentleman cannot disguise that fact. He cannot have his cake and eat it. If he votes for reductions in income tax, I am afraid that he must realise that they need to be paid for.

Mr. Michael Brown: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The problem may have been solved, but my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) says that he had sat down.

Mr. Allen: No, he gave way.

Mr. Arnold: No, I did not.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair was under the impression that the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) had given way. However, the Chair was deceived as the hon. Gentleman had sat down.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): During this very interesting debate we have explored the history of the Humber bridge and people's attitudes to it. However, the hon. Members for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) and for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) are on very dangerous ground when they comment on the cost of the Humber bridge. In response, we can easily ask: what about the poll tax and the £3 billion that was wasted on it? Will that cost be borne by the Conservative party?

If the same rules applied to local government, Conservative Members would face surcharges for the poll tax and for selling public assets at below their book value as election bribes. They would be surcharged for the give-away Budgets in the 1980s, which caused tremendous damage to industry and to this country's economy. Conservative Members are in no position to talk about the Humber bridge. The hon. Member for Gravesham talked about brass necks, but we have seen brass cheek from Conservative Members in this debate.

Let us return to the issue of the Humber bridge and the importance of it. To be fair, hon. Members on both sides of the House mentioned the tremendous engineering achievement that the bridge represents and to the pride that local people take in it. The bridge is a wonderful showcase for British engineering and the engineering industry has benefited from that experience. It has gone on to build bridges abroad, which has had a beneficial impact on our exports and on British Steel, in which I have an interest.

There is also the question of need. I have no doubt that the Humber bridge meets a vital infrastructure need in Humberside. Without the bridge, Humberside's economic development would have been constrained. I remember what it was like before the bridge was built. My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) referred to the ferry service. Although it was a very inefficient service, I used it regularly. As a student, I did teaching practice in Cleethorpes in the winter—the digs in Cleethorpes were very cheap in winter—and I would catch the ferry every Monday morning. In those days, the journey across the Humber was a long and complicated affair, but many people made the journey even then. Many of them hoped that the ferry would run aground in the middle of the river, as it often did, so that the bar would be open for a few hours before the ferry eventually reached Barton-upon-Humber.

The construction of the bridge reduced the 100-mile journey between Grimsby and Hull to a convenient, short crossing and it allowed the economy to develop on both sides of the Humber. I am surprised that hon. Members who have spoken in the debate—particularly the Minister for Railways and Roads—did not refer to the haulage industry and the importance of the Humber bridge to it. The introduction of tolls has had a major impact on the haulage industry. Has the Minister met representatives of the Road Haulage Association recently? I have met them to discuss their concerns about the impact of tolls on their members in my constituency.

The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) mentioned the impact of the Humber bridge on his constituency. We have very good communications and an airport in the area, but when I talk to people in South Humberside, including some very large investors, they all emphasise the fact that the Humber bridge provides access to the deep-water ports of Hull and the daily roll-on, roll-off ferries to Holland. That is very important to many local businesses. The Humber bridge is a vital part of the local infrastructure.

There is no denying that the Humber bridge has not been able to cover its debt. It was never going to, and in that respect the Government have recognised the inevitable and introduced the Bill to deal with that debt. Labour Members welcome the legislation as a recognition of the real situation, as the problem can by solved only by writing off the debt in that way.

As to the cost of the Humber bridge, I draw the House's attention to the cost of other road developments, which will not be recovered. One development that springs to mind is the recent Limehouse link construction in north London. The construction of the road link tunnel cost £360 million and it cost a further £89.2 million to relocate people whose houses were demolished to make way for the link. The Limehouse link—a road of only 1.8 km—cost the taxpayer a total of £449.2 million.

Tonight we are talking about a total debt of £435 million for the Humber bridge. The cost of the Limehouse link at only 1.8 km is far more than the debt that we are talking about in this debate. The Humber bridge will continue to contribute towards its cost through its tolls, while the Limehouse link will have no such tolls and is part of the national road network.

Many of my constituents are confused by that logic. They ask why such a big fuss is made about the Humber bridge when the motorway network—including the Limehouse link—is simply regarded as part of infrastructure investment in this country, although it is just as costly. Let us put the debate into perspective. Yes, we re writing off debt on the Humber bridge; I believe that we are correct to do so. The Humber bridge is an mportant piece of infrastructure and its cost pales into nsignificance when compared with other major road and communications infrastructure investments in this country.

I echo some of the comments of the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes regarding the people of Humberside. My constituents have no choice but to use the bridge regularly, particularly when travelling to Hull royal infirmary. The infirmary provides medical treatment that is not available in any other part of the region. The only other hospital is at Cottingham. When people are hospitalised at the infirmary, their relatives must travel across the Humber bridge regularly and the costs can be very high. People who live and work on different sides of the Humber must also bear that cost.

I was such a person. When I was selected to contest the Glanford and Scunthorpe seat in 1985, I travelled across the bridge daily. My family moved to Winterton and I travelled to work in Hull each day. My wife and I had to pay the toll daily, and sometimes twice a day.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: The hon. Gentleman referred to the Limehouse link. A proportion of the cost of that link was paid for by the developers of Canary wharf. Will he inform the House what contribution he believes the city of Hull should make to the cost of the Humber bridge?

Mr. Morley: I have read the Public Accounts Committee's report on the Limehouse link and it does not mention any contribution by developers towards its cost. It says that the link was commissioned by the London Docklands development corporation, which was established as a non-executive body by the Department of the Environment. As far as I know, the bulk of the money came from taxpayers. Even if there was a contribution from the private sector, it was still a major investment by the public sector. There is no toll on that road and none is expected to be introduced. Many people who use the Limehouse link to travel to work in the City are in a much better position to pay tolls than many of my constituents in Glanford and Scunthorpe—or those in Brigg and Cleethorpes, for that matter. We should put the matter in perspective.

I commuted to work via the Humber bridge for some years; I made that choice. I once remarked to the former chairman of the bridge board, Councillor Alex Clarke, that I had crossed the bridge so many times that I must have paid for part of it. I asked whether my name could be written on it and he replied that, given the escalation in debt, in all my daily journeys I may have paid for only one rivet in the bridge. He said that I could put my name on that if I wanted to. That puts in perspective the escalation of debt, which is dealt with under the Bill.

I hope that the Minister will give some assurances about future tolls. It is not good enough for him to say that it is purely a matter for the bridge board. We all know that tolls will be determined by how much debt the Government are prepared to write off under the powers that they are taking in the Bill. The private Bill that the Government were blackmailing the bridge board to introduce would have proposed that no public inquiries be held. I am glad that there is no such suggestion now as local people have a right to make representations about toll increases.

It was also clear from the discussions that the Government wanted that private Bill to include the automatic index-linking of tolls. That would put an intolerable burden on people who use the bridge because they have no choice. Some people have to use the bridge as a direct result of Government policy—for example, the location of health care facilities. They have no option but to cross the bridge and pay the tolls. There must be some consideration for such people's needs and the impact on them.

There must also be consideration for local businesses—the Minister failed to mention them in his opening remarks—and the impact of tolls on lorry companies and local distribution businesses with bases on both sides of the bridge. A sharp increase in tolls would put an intolerable burden on their profitability. That has to be taken into account.

The Minister said that he could not tell the House what the tolls would be, but it would be useful if he gave us an assurance that whatever the increase was, it would be within reasonable limits—perhaps the level of inflation. I would be interested to hear the Minister's opinions on that.

The Minister has been described as a Father Christmas figure as he is writing off the debt. If we have no idea of what future tolls will be, he will not be a Father Christmas figure but the ghost of Christmas yet to come and we should remember that that ghost foreshadowed some unpleasant consequences and implications. There will be unpleasant implications in the Bill unless the Minister ensures that any future increase in tolls is reasonable for the people whom it will hit.

6.32 pm

Mr. Watts: With the leave of the House, I shall reply to the debate. The hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) asked me about further Bills in respect of other crossings. I have no such proposals. There are only two other bridges, the Tyne and the Mersey, where there is any debt owed to the Government and in both those cases that debt is now being repaid by the setting of appropriate toll levels by the bridge operators.

In respect of the proposal to deregulate tolls, the consultation period has finished. We are now considering the responses to consultation. I am not in a position today to state what our reaction will be, but I hope to make an announcement at the earliest opportunity when we have finished our consideration. I can confirm, however, that the Humber bridge was included in the consultation and I expect that it will be included within any powers that we might take in any such legislation.

Privatisation is not an objective of the Bill. Although my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) made a very good case for privatisation as a longer-term solution to the problem, that is not in any way connected with the Bill, which relates to the undertaking given by one of my predecessors in 1991.

The hon. Member for Nottingham, North also asked me about improvements to the road links to the bridge. At present, we have no such proposals. I really could not begin to improve upon the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel), which brought great pleasure to both sides of the House.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) questioned some of the timings to which I referred. I understand that the final decision to build the bridge was taken in 1969 and my source of information for that is a publication by the bridge board, which would have no particular reason to give false information. Loans were agreed in May 1971 and my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes explained why the Government of the day were not concerned about that because the responsibility for repaying the loans rested firmly and squarely with the local authorities that promoted the bridge.

It was a bit rich for the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North to mention sound finance and to criticise my noble friend Lord Barber. His memory conveniently slipped over 1976, when we experienced some of the highest levels of inflation Britain has ever known. If, as he said—of course I accept what he said on this point—the promise to build the bridge was not necessary to secure his election as the Member for Kingston upon Hull, North, it was even more a waste of money. Although I have no doubt that at the time we would have liked to see my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham representing Kingston upon Hull, North, he has told us that he is well satisfied with his continuing election in perpetuity in Twickenham. Nobody on either side of the House bears any malice towards the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North, who is a distinguished Member of the House, and who has added to its variety.

I owe my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes a debt of gratitude, as he has given me another new alibi. When Members ask me why they cannot have their bypass in future, I shall say that all the money has been expended on the Humber bridge. He also stressed—as he has on many occasions—as did the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), the importance of the bridge to his constituents, who require access to a hospital located on the north side of the river.

My hon. Friend may know that when I had a meeting with the bridge board on my birthday on 19 April this year, we discussed the burden of tolls on those needing to go to hospital for treatment. I told those on the board that if they wished to put forward a workable scheme for a concession to such essential users, I would look at it sympathetically as part of the package of proposals.

Mr. James Cran (Beverley): I have no difficulty with increasing tolls because they have not increased since 1989. The question is by how much. My hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) was absolutely right to stress those special categories, but we shall want to encourage usage of the bridge. My hon. Friend the Minister said that tolls must be high but realistic. However, those two conditions may be mutually exclusive. All I want to hear from him tonight is that he is not leading the board by the snout and telling it to do what he wishes. If he does that, it will simply put a very large increase to the public inquiry and we shall all have to give our views on it.

Mr. Watts: I would not seek, nor would the board promote, a level of tolls that would reduce the traffic and the revenue. That would be counter-productive. As I have said before, it is for the board to promote a new toll tariff and then for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to determine it when the other procedures have been completed.

In view of the assurance from the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) that the bridge did not assist his election to this House, I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes will not try to send him a bill for part of the cost.

The hon. Gentleman seemed to have some of the arguments the wrong way round. He seemed worried that I might be trying to offload a problem on to local taxpayers. On the contrary: the purpose of this generous legislation is to take some of the burden off them. The local authorities promoted the legislation authorising the bridge in such a way as to put the whole burden—£435 million as it now is—firmly on local taxpayers, chiefly those of Hull. So the hon. Gentleman must not reverse the argument; he must accept that the burden arose in the first place because of the way that the project was taken forward. I am taking powers that will enable the Government to relieve the local taxpayer of some of the burden. The precise amount of write-off and suspension will have to be determined and then contained in the order that I shall put before the House in due course.

On the whole, the constituents of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West ought to view me as Father Christmas; but he will recognise that Father Christmas does not always give children everything they want. It is not, as he suggested, a lack of action on the part of the Government that has allowed the problem to accumulate. The board has procrastinated by not coming up with proposals to maintain the levels of its tolls. Certainly, it tried to introduce a Bill, but if it had acted sensibly, it would have promoted an increase in tolls using the procedures currently available to it. It would also have promoted a Bill to provide for a more efficacious method of keeping the value of the tolls up to date in future. The board should not have sat back and waited for a private Bill to be taken through the House.

I remind the House that the Bill failed because not a single hon. Member was prepared to pick it up and sponsor it, even though it went through the other place—

Mr. Morley: Quite right.

Mr. Watts: But the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West has suggested that the Government are responsible for the board's inability to maintain its toll charges.

Mr. Michael Brown: I plead guilty, and I do so publicly along with the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley). I objected to the Humber Bridge Board seeking to use private legislation to deal with its problems. A clause in the Bill would have enabled the board to abdicate responsibility for setting tolls; it handed over to the Secretary of State unlimited powers over future tolls. I had to have regard to the fact that one day there might be a Labour Secretary of State who might misuse those powers.

Mr. Watts: I was not necessarily criticising my hon. Friend—only Opposition Members who suggested that the Government failed to help bring about a solution. If Opposition Members had wished to do so, they could have sponsored the Bill on behalf of their local authorities.

The hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe almost led us astray today by saying that £3 billion was wasted on the poll tax. He will know that any such figure represented the increase in revenue support grant from central Government to local government. If he really thinks the money should not have been spent, he is advocating a reduction in central Government support for local government by that amount. I am sure that he will want to reconsider; it would be a most inconvenient proposition for Labour Front Benchers.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about the impact of tolls on road haulage. The current toll for the largest heavy goods vehicle is £10.90. He will know, from the excellent information provided by the bridge board, that on the journey from Hull to Grimsby using the bridge involves a saving of 47.9 miles. Most hauliers would consider the toll good value for money, given that the alternative would involve more fuel and more time for the driver.

Comparisons with other crossings and links on the trunk road network are invalid. I remind the House that the bridge was promoted by local authorities to serve a local purpose. Once a local authority has done such a thing and accepted that the financial responsibility for it should rest with its local taxpayers, it is a bit rich to compare the bridge with crossings on other parts of the trunk road network promoted by my Department to serve national strategic needs.

Mr. Morley: I mentioned the Limehouse link earlier. No private sector contribution was forthcoming for it, and the Public Accounts Committee criticised the Department of the Environment—the funding agency—for that, recognising that the link benefited the private developers of Canary wharf who contributed nothing. So there was an even poorer return for the money put into that link, which amounted to more than the cost of the Humber bridge. Surely in any case the Minister must recognise that the bridge is part of our national infrastructure network.

Mr. Watts: One's perception of the value of that link depends on the value one places on the redevelopment of docklands. Some of the hon. Gentleman's hon. Friends who represent parts of east London might take a rather different view.

For all the reasons adduced in this debate, I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Committee of the whole House.—[Mr. Bates.]

Further proceedings postponed, pursuant to Order [19 December].

HUMBER BRIDGE (DEBTS) [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 50A,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Humber Bridge (Debts) Bill, it is expedient to authorise the Secretary of State to provide that sums which would otherwise be payable to him by the Humber Bridge Board shall not be so payable.—[Mr. Bates.]

Question agreed to.

Bill immediately considered in Committee, pursuant to Order [19 December]; reported, without amendment; not amended, considered; read the Third time and passed.

PETITION

War Medals (Replacement)

6.48 pm

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford): I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of my constituent, Mr. J. Conn. It concerns the fact that he and other pensioners like him who have had their medals stolen or who have lost them by misadventure are asking the Ministry of Defence to take that into account and to make efforts to replace the medals. I think that a worthy cause, particularly on the 50th anniversary of the end of the war in which Mr. Conn and many others saw service. That is why they would like the medals they won in the war to be replaced. This is not a big matter, but I hope that the Ministry of Defence will take account of it—as I know that many hon. Members will.

The petition ends:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your honourable House shall urge the Ministry of Defence to consider the plight of Mr. Conn and others in a similar situation and endeavour to replace these medals.

Your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

I beg leave to present the petition.

To lie upon the Table.

Textile Effluent

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Bates.]

6.49 pm

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): I am grateful to have secured the debate. It will be the last debate today and, therefore, of the pre-Christmas part of the Session.

I wish to highlight a serious threat to the dye-works in Hinckley in my constituency, the threat to Brookside Dyers, Atkins, Fludes, Halls and Sketchley. It is a threat to 500 jobs in the industry in Hinckley and a threat to thousands of other jobs in the related hosiery, knitwear and textile industries. I am grateful for the opportunity to highlight that threat there and at other towns in the county and in the region.

In February 1990, at a meeting called at the request of Severn Trent Water Ltd., the dyeing and finishing sector committee of the Knitting Industries Federation Ltd., KIF, was told for the first time that the then newly formed National Rivers Authority intended to introduce consents on the discharge of dye colour in textile effluent received at certain sewage treatment works. The treatment works at Hinckley, Loughborough, Wigston, Wanlip and Pinxton were all identified as problem areas.

It was explained by Severn Trent Water that the procedures in place at the works to which I have referred were ineffective in removing dye colour, which was passing through the treatment process into rivers. Surprisingly, STW stated that it was not prepared to offer any solution but laid the responsibility for the removal of the colour firmly on the shoulders of individual dischargers.

It was not until June 1992 that the NRA's proposed colour consents were revealed, with the declaration that these would be introduced by 1 January 1994 at the latest. The consents amounted to a gin-clear discharge for 100 per cent. of the time. I always thought that gin had a blue tinge and was not exactly clear, but we had better not pursue that line this evening.

The proposal to implement gin-clear discharge—that is discharge without any coloration—would have had a catastrophic impact on the industry then, and would have one now unless STW took the necessary action. Fortunately, at the time, the KIF sprung into action. I congratulate it on what it has done. It appointed an environment committee. It rapidly established, following a worldwide trawl, that there were no known solutions at end of pipe that would be viable for those compelled to discharge into sewers. The committee stressed the non-toxic nature of the effluent at the levels of dilution involved, together with the major threat to jobs in the east midlands.

There was clearly a need for a formal tripartite action group—it is known as the TAG—between the KIF, STW and the NRA. That group was set up in January 1993. General meetings of dyers were held at Leicester and Mansfield, at which the NRA and STW gave audio-visual presentations. These did nothing to allay the sector's fears.

By the end of March 1993 it became clear that the TAG had become deadlocked. That was principally because of the NRA's insistence on maintaining its so-called gin-clear consents for 100 per cent. of the time. That gave STW an excuse for not accepting the responsibility for removing dye colour at its treatment works, although it was much better placed to carry out the job more economically, efficiently and effectively than any of the dye-works.

The KIF took the matter to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. The meeting took place in July 1993, with support from the union, the National Union of Knitwear, Footwear and Apparel Trades and the all-party knitting industry lobby at Westminster. Meanwhile, the support of the influential Chemical Industries Association Ltd. dye users group was enlisted along with the Textile Finishers Association in Manchester. It was agreed with the then Minister that the TAG should have high-level talks with senior officials at the Department of Trade and Industry to arrive at a workable solution through mediation.

Trials were agreed. It was not until October 1993 that the long-awaited but elusive dividend which had been sought was achieved. Severn Trent finally agreed to undertake, on a trial basis, to remove the colour at selected sewage treatment works. A joint action plan was submitted to the NRA with the following central aims: the pursuit of practical colour removal at selected treatment works, the examination of dye house discharge management procedures, the formulation of best practice for dye house operations and the establishment of further research development programmes. But the breakthrough became shortlived.

The NRA's response to the JAP of continuing insistence on the gin-clear consent for 100 per cent. of the time, compounded by the introduction of the unacceptable peg-in-the-ground concept—you are probably as confused as I was, Madam Deputy Speaker, when I first came across the concept, but broadly speaking it means no increase in capacity for existing dye-works—caused STW to revert to its original and, I suggest, unacceptable policy of passing the problem back along the pipe to the dischargers.

Simultaneously, the KIF, as part of its responsibilities under the JAP, initiated—this was with the assistance of an expert, Dr. Skelly—the publication of a water and effluent management manual. I thank my hon. Friend the Minister and his Department for a contribution of £10,000. The total cost was £30,000. The manual, which included individual case studies by the products sector, set out best practice for dye house operations. Copies were distributed to the member dye houses in May 1994.

What is the NRA's response to the JAP? By the end of March 1994 it had become clear that although the NRA would not become a party to the JAP, it was prepared, provided all parties proceeded with their respective commitments, to postpone the introduction of its colour consents until 1 January 1996. More time had been bought for the industry, and that was important.

During this period, or breathing space, a significant number of dischargers, such as those in my constituency, continued their search for suitable technologies to remove the colour in association with a variety of water equipment suppliers. They were not idly standing by but taking action. Many of the pilot rigs installed proved effective in removing the colour. However, the associated costs of bulk applications, in terms either of capital or of revenue, proved prohibitively expensive in the absence of an ability to recycle a significant volume of the effluent. Only through recycling could meaningful payback be achieved.

The KIF therefore decided, with the co-operation of four member dye houses, to make an application to the Department, under the Government's Link programme, for a 50 per cent. grant towards a £2.5 million project. The very size of that figure indicates the enormous costs that dye houses face in responding to the problem. Unfortunately, the Department rejected the application in June 1995 on the ground that it was oriented towards near-market applied research rather than pure research. However, I have to thank the Minister because I understand that, in the past few days, £8,000 has been made available, and several companies will be able to install new equipment and work on recycling as a result.

What about this year? Severn Trent commenced bulk trials on part of the effluent flow at the Wanlip sewage treatment works in Leicester. The Wanlip works is the biggest of the works that I am talking about this evening and, depending on how one classifies dischargers, there are 30 to 40 whose discharge is sent there. It is therefore a very important works. I understand that the trials have proved successful although the seasonality and long-term prospects have still to be tested. Further trials at Pinxton, where there is a sole discharger with a dedicated sewer, have so far failed to produce satisfactory results.

Severn Trent claims, however, that it has not been possible to carry out trials at the other peripheral treatment works at Hinckley—which is the principal subject of my debate—or Loughborough because of the intermittent absence of perceptible colour in the effluent. That was no doubt influenced by the fashion colours for the spring-summer 1995 season. My hon. Friend the Minister may not study such matters in great detail, but the colours were neutral and pastel shades, which meant that it was difficult to test for dye. Severn Trent's declared intention to pursue trials at Wigston have apparently been similarly frustrated.

In January this year, the halfway point in the NRA's two-year postponement of the introduction of colour consents—a postponement for which, as I have already said, the industry is grateful—the Knitting Industries Federation called for a mid-term review to be carried out by itself, Severn Trent and the NRA, again under the chairmanship of the DTI. That chairmanship was provided by the Department's textiles and retailing division. The mood of the industry is very much one of gratitude to the Department for taking that interest and for chairing the review so effectively. I thank the Minister on behalf of the Knitting Industries Federation and other parties.

Four meetings took place throughout the year, the last of which was held on 1 December in Nottingham. During that process, the KIF successfully demonstrated, among other things, that the NRA's proposed colour consents were flawed, firstly because the gin-clear approach was unnecessarily excessive, having regard to the inherent background colour in the affected rivers. In other words, there is a great deal of coloration in the rivers anyway. Secondly, the so-called "100 per cent. of the time" requirement was prohibitive, given the untested nature of the colour-removal treatment at sewage treatment works over an extended period.

Fortunately, modified and less stringent wavelength criteria were finally accepted by the NRA which, at the same time, agreed to adopt a phased percentile approach with associated look-up tables starting with 90 per cent. compliance—rather than 100 per cent. compliance—from 1 January next year; 95 per cent. compliance with effect from 1 January 1997; and, with effect from 1 January 1998, 95 per cent. compliance but including an upper-tier absorbency limit for each wavelength. At that point, the upper tiers will be absolute and must not be exceeded.

The NRA then served the modified consents on Severn Trent on 1 October, covering the treatment works at Hinckley in my constituency, and the ones at Loughborough, Pinxton, Wanlip and Wigston, by giving the statutory three months' notice in advance of their introduction on 1 January next year. In turn, Severn Trent—in compliance with statutory requirements—served consents on all the dischargers in each of the consented catchment areas on 1 November.

Severn Trent claims that it is not possible to pass the percentile approach to dischargers end of pipe, except perhaps to a single discharger into a dedicated sewer. In the process, Severn Trent declared to dischargers in the Wanlip catchment area its preparedness to remove the colour at the sewage treatment works at a cost of between 20p and 30p per cubic metre, always provided that there was a sufficient level of take-up by the dischargers; I can tell my hon. Friend that there almost certainly will be.

However, Severn Trent has not offered the dischargers into the peripheral sewage treatment works, such as that at Hinckley, the facility of removing the colour from their effluent. That is grossly unfair and wholly unreasonable. Bearing in mind where the colour saga began in 1990, and taking into account the KIF's prolonged and determined campaign in the subsequent 70 months, the outcome at the large Wanlip catchment area in Leicester might be considered satisfactory. In contrast, as no facilities are being offered by Severn Trent to remove the colour at the designated peripheral sewage treatment works such as that in Hinckley, the position of the dyers that I cited earlier is as grave as ever.

The absence of an even-handed approach by Severn Trent across the affected area is regrettably divisive and threatens the future of those who discharge into the designated peripheral treatment works, not only at Hinckley but at Loughborough, Pinxton and Wigston. The unavoidable next step is for those dischargers in question to enter an appeal to Ofwat.

The KIF's five years of campaigning and lobbying has achieved significant and meaningful progress. At the outset, Severn Trent refused to accept responsibility for removing colour at the affected sewage treatment works. Meanwhile, the NRA stuck rigidly to its excessive and, I would suggest, ridiculous gin-clear standards for 100 per cent. of the time. The KIF campaign initially persuaded the NRA to postpone the introduction of colour consents for two years until 1 January 1996. Thereafter, the NRA was further persuaded to modify the severity of its original consent proposals and at the same time to adopt a phased percentile approach. That is jargon which means that it allowed some failures, thus making it much easier for dischargers to meet the requirements.

Following succesful trials at Wanlip, Severn Trent has in turn been persuaded to accept the responsibility for removing colour at that works but at a cost of 20p to 30p per cubic metre, assuming that there is sufficient take-up. As I said, I am fairly sure that there will be.

[Mr. David Tredinnick]

Meanwhile, the collective research efforts of many members for end-of-pipe solutions at an estimated cost of £1 million have resulted in considerable progress being made in identifying suitable combination technologies for colour removal, albeit largely unproven throughout the cycle. At the moment, there is no technology in the world to cope with the specific problem. In any event, the cost of bulk installation would be around £300,000 per firm. I should like my hon. Friend to bear that figure in mind.

If dye-works at Hinckley in my constituency are going to have to pay £300,000 each, one does not have to be psychic to work out the impact on their competitiveness. If they are forced to pay such an amount, I envisage the thriving dye industry at Hinckley facing serious difficulties. It would affect not only Hinckley but the other centres to which I have referred, such as at Loughborough and Wigston. A very serious cost factor is involved, and I encourage my hon. Friend to look carefully at the possibility of making further money available for research, perhaps to Severn Trent, for the peripheral works that are necessary.

The absence of colours in the flows, apart from intermittently during the summer months, which was due to the fashion colours—the light colours—to which I referred, has prevented Severn Trent from carrying out any trials. It stated that, despite the works being included in the original joint action plan in late 1993, it is not in a position to offer colour removal facilities at those sewage treatment works from 1 January 1996, when the consents are due to become operative. Thereafter, Severn Trent seems to be of the opinion that the associated costs would be excessive at those works, always assuming that suitable technologies were available. It claims that it does not follow that the system established at Wanlip would be suitable elsewhere.

If Severn Trent, with its massive resources, thinks that the costs will be excessive, how does it think that Halls, in my constituency, Atkins or any of the other dye houses to which I referred, are supposed to continue trading? Severn Trent has advised that it will not be appealing against the NRA's colour consents, but meanwhile has imposed consents on each of the dischargers—passing the buck, one might say. Those consents are not identical to those that the NRA has imposed, and Severn Trent argues that it is not possible to pass the percentile approach up the pipe to individual dischargers, with the possible exception of Pinxton, where there is only one discharger.

According to Ofwat, its target time scale for deciding appeals is 18 weeks from the date when the further mediation between Severn Trent and the dischargers breaks down—I think that it probably will break down. In practice, though, the time scale is within the gift of Severn Trent. For those discharging at Loughborough, Hinckley, Pinxton and Wigston, where no colour-removing facility is being offered by Severn Trent, there is no choice but to enter appeals not later than 31 December. The central thrust of the appeals, subject to obtaining sound legal advice, would be that the discharger's costs are more than those of Severn Trent to treat the discharge to the same environmental standard at its works.

I know that the KIF is perfectly prepared to co-ordinate such appeals, with the assistance of an experienced environmental law practice; I have had discussions with it on that point. I hope that it does not get as far as that, and that is one reason why I raised the issue this evening. My understanding is that, under paragraph 6 of schedule 10 to the Water Resources Act 1991, the Secretary of State for the Environment has the power to direct the NRA to revoke a discharge consent or impose or modify any conditions of the consent if it appears appropriate to him to do so, in consequence of any representations or objections made to him. It appears, however, from the general context in which that provision is set, that its purpose is to enable the Secretary of State to impose stricter requirements—I certainly do not argue that that is what we want from my hon. Friend tonight—and not to relieve the burden. The KIF has been advised that that power is capable of being interpreted in such a way as to allow a relaxation, even a direction quashing the NRA's consents. I ask my hon. Friend a specific question—I know that this is a complicated matter. Will he give an undertaking that he will at least consider what action he can take directly to alleviate the problem, and not, as seems to be the current policy with Severn Trent, pass the problem down the pipe, as we say?

In five days, the KIF has raised enough money for legal costs, including counsel's opinion, to address the issue at Hinckley, Loughborough, Wigston and Pinxton, on the Erewash. I understand that, when an appeal is entered, consent is immediately set aside. If it has to get the consents set aside—it cannot comply with them anyway by 1 January next year, for all the reasons that I have given—and an appeal is entered, we shall be in a state of suspended animation. We shall have to look at ways to break that. Severn Trent could have appealed against the NRA consents to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, but it took a policy decision not to do so. Why did it not appeal? Why did it not get on and do something about it? I think that the answer is that it thought that if it left the problem alone, it would not have to address it and that it would end up at the discharger's door.

I hope very much that in the first stage of the appeals procedure, which now looks to be an inevitability, action will be taken to get the relevant parties—the NRA, Severn Trent and the dischargers—together for sensible discussions. I know that the KIF intends to set up consultative meetings between those key groups. The mediation process could take weeks or months. The length of the negotiations is under the control of Severn Trent. If it got beyond the preliminary appeals procedure, to what is the appeals procedure proper, the consents would not be quashed, but Severn Trent would be forced to remove the colour at reasonable cost. It could have undertaken trials in 1994, but it did not. In 1995, it has a problem because the fashion colours are light.

This is a complicated business. It is not an issue on which people can easily hold their attention, precisely because it is so detailed. One of the complexities of the problem is that the dye discharged is not of a constant nature; the chemicals in it are not constant. That means that there are changes daily. We need not just one process to clean the dye that is in the discharge but several, and that raises some big issues. If the end users, for example the dye-works at Hinckley, are supposed to deal with the problem themselves—never mind the enormous costs, at £300,000 per dye-works—there are environmental issues, too, because with such constantly changing chemicals, they will need a chemist to get it right. It would be much safer for Severn Trent to take the issue and solve the problem collectively in the peripheral treatment works. It is absurd to expect individual dye-works to introduce very complicated processes at vast expense.

It is also grossly unfair on my region, because specific problems relate to rivers. The River Soar in Leicestershire is a slow-flowing river, unlike many others, so disposal of effluent takes longer. That is why there is pressure. Never mind Sketchley brook at Hinckley, into which most of the Hinckley dye-works discharges. The quality of receiving water, to use the jargon, in the area is worse than in the rest of the country, where the problem does not exist. It behoves Severn Trent to face up to its responsibilities.

I must compliment my hon. Friend and his Department on the participation of the textile and retail division in presiding over the tripartite talks set up by the review committee. That really has helped, and I understand that it has led to a satisfactory solution at Wanlip, where there are between 30 and 40 dischargers. However, other dyers in Leicestershire—not least the five in Hinckley to which I have referred—face a tremendously difficult time, with 1 January, when the consents come in, just around the corner.

I have referred to the enormous costs that those dyers face, and I have mentioned the environmental worries. I plead with my hon. Friend the Minister to make every effort to make the mediation stage of appeal a success—to persuade Severn Trent to accept the responsibility, which it is morally obliged to accept, to upgrade the peripheral treatment works at Hinckley and Loughborough, and the others that I have listed. If my hon. Friend can do that, he will have served the House well.

I look to my hon. Friend to press for a sensible negotiated settlement that will protect not only the environment but jobs in Hinckley's dye houses, which are vital to the town, the county and the country.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. James Clappison): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick) for raising such an important subject. I know that he is very concerned about the health of the textile industry, which, as he rightly said, is important to many of his constituents. He has certainly demonstrated that concern tonight, along with his mastery of the technical details of a complicated subject. He has used that knowledge to give the House a penetrating analysis of the problems facing the textile industry in his constituency, and in other parts of Leicestershire and the midlands.

My hon. Friend has outlined some of the issues that face the textile industry in its efforts to meet the standards required for the discharge to water of effluent coloured by dyestuffs. The issue also involves problems for the National Rivers Authority and the water companies in the meeting of their objectives, as the House will have gathered. As I have said, the matter is complicated and sensitive, and I do not wish to upset the delicate balance that has been reached in discussions among the parties so far; nor can I comment in any detail on issues that may affect individual cases, for fear of prejudicing any appeals to the Secretary of State by those who feel aggrieved.

I do, however, wish to outline the position, and the reasons why the NRA considers it necessary to control the discharge of dye colour by textile companies. We are all familiar with the high quality of the knitwear goods produced in Leicester and surrounding areas, and with the attractive range of colours and patterns that are available nowadays. Of course, once dyes have been applied, any surplus must discharged from the premises in waste water.

In matters of this sort, there is a danger that the issues will be exaggerated. It would be wrong to characterise this issue in terms either of an over-zealous regulator making life difficult for British industry to no worthwhile purpose, or of a lurid picture of rivers flowing purple and red and devoid of life. Neither of those characterisations would be accurate.

Generally, dyestuffs are non-toxic pollutants. However, in this case it is not a question of interference for no good reason. Although dyestuffs are not toxic, the discolouration of rivers caused by uncontrolled discharge of dyestuffs is of legitimate aesthetic concern, and a source of pollution. There is understandable public concern about visibly coloured water, or rivers suddenly changing colour. That concern, and the need to control such pollution, is at the heart of the wide and diverse range of uses to which we put our rivers.

Rivers are major features of our landscape. When they are used for the discharge of waste, it must be on a sustainable basis. They are used not only as sources of water for a wide range of industrial purposes, but as sources of drinking water. They support valuable ecosystems, which must be protected. Just as important, they are an invaluable recreational asset, particularly for the angling community.

For those reasons, we must manage our rivers efficiently, and ensure that they are able to meet the needs of all who wish to use them. The NRA exists to carry out that management, and has a statutory duty to ensure that pollution is controlled. There is, of course, public concern about pollution, and the NRA is properly responsive to that concern.

Under the Water Resources Act 1991, it is an offence to cause or knowingly permit polluting matter to enter a water course; however, acting under and in accordance with a discharge consent provides a defence against such charges. Thus, both discharges made from a manufacturing plant and those made via a sewage treatment works require consents, and the NRA is able to impose requirements in respect of the discharge that protect the local aquatic environment and the key users of those waters.

As for dyestuffs, I understand that, for some time, the NRA has been keen to introduce conditions into consents to control the discharge of coloured waste that meet environmental needs, while ensuring that the consent conditions that they set are achievable. For a variety of reasons, progress has been slow.

Mr. Tredinnick: I asked my hon. Friend to find out whether his Department has direct powers to intervene, and whether, if the Secretary of State has such powers, he would at least consider using them.

Mr. Clappison: My hon. Friend has issued a powerful plea. As he implied, he knows of the rights of appeal that exist, and is aware that some of the matters to which he referred are within the province of the regulators, and are involved in the relationship between regulators and dischargers. I will respond to that powerful plea in due course, but before I do so, I feel that I should set out the background, and the reasons why regulation is required.

As I said, progress has been slow, but discussions have continued. This year, discussions between the Government, the NRA, water companies and industry representatives have made good progress on standards and their implementation from 1 January 1996. The objective is to ensure that discolouration caused by dyestuffs is not visible to the naked eye. I noted my hon. Friend's comments on that.

I believe that the NRA has worked to ensure that attention is paid to the needs of industry, as well as fulfilling its statutory duty to protect our rivers. At the same time, industry is aware that this source of pollution must be controlled, and that it will be necessary to contribute to the cost of reducing discolouration: it is a well-established principle, applying widely across the environmental field, that the polluter pays.

The sewerage undertakers have also been included in the dialogue. When discharges are being made to sewer, a consent is required from the sewerage undertaker, who must ensure that discharges are such as to enable effective treatment to take place to remove pollutants, and—when the effluent is finally treated and released into the river—for NRA requirements to be met in respect of the discharge from the treatment works that they operate.

As I understand it, the National Rivers Authority has come up with proposals that have secured a good measure of agreement. Acceptable standards that will achieve the desired aesthetic effects, but that are not overly stringent, will be progressively introduced from 1 January, and compliance will be assessed on a basis established with some flexibility.

That provides the conditions for the textile industry to rise to the challenge and, to meet pollution reduction targets, to work on means of reducing discolouring emissions. One of the most promising may be to recycle waste water within the plant, which would have the benefit of allowing installation costs to be offset against other savings. The complex process of dyeing and treatment of residues might be re-examined with a view to minimising waste.

I congratulate the regulators and the industry on progress so far, but I do not underestimate the difficulties that must be resolved in an industry that, for historical reasons, is based on old infrastructure. The ability to invest and to modernise has been affected by global competition, and there have been job losses and poor profitability. The industry has gone through difficult times.

That combination of factors lies at the root of many of the environmental concerns that the industry faces. The National Rivers Authority is aware of those difficulties, and has aimed to recognise the problems and to reach a sensible agreement that will not jeopardise the industry's future.

Many of the factors that I have outlined affecting the manufacturers' economic position will concern manufacturers in my hon. Friend's constituency, especially in relation to the dischargers to the six peripheral treatment plants to which he drew attention. I am sure that he will share my pleasure that good progress has been made on discharges to the treatment plants at Wanlip, which will help 30 to 40 dischargers. As he rightly says, however, issues remain at the six peripheral works.

My hon. Friend has made a strong case on those dischargers and those plants. In response to his plea for an undertaking, as I have said, there are some restrictions on my position on this matter. I must be aware of matters that properly lie within regulators' province and of any possible appeal rights, but he has rightly outlined the interests that my Department and the Department of Trade and Industry have taken in the matter so far, which will be maintained. We recognise the importance of securing an agreement, if possible, on this important subject, which affects, as he has said, so many of his constituents who are employed by these manufacturers.

It would be for the House's benefit if I briefly repeated the background of assistance that has been given by the Department of Trade and Industry and by the Department of the Environment, which my hon. Friend fairly and fully outlined. That assistance has been in the form of funding for a manual of best practice through a £10,000 grant, mediation between parties, recycling support—which is important and which, as my hon. Friend has said, has been valued by industry—and a continued role in meetings between the parties. In all those respects, the Government have been seeking to assist the industry, and will of course continue to do so in the same way.

It is worth emphasising that the benefits go further than just to the industry, important though that is. There are other benefits for the environment and for industry in environmentally friendly processes. They are a hallmark of an efficient and competitive industry. Consumers of the end product are increasingly seeking reassurance that the process of manufacture has not damaged the environment, and green technology can therefore help in the marketplace.

The textile industry is no exception; it cannot afford to fall behind. New technology and investment may be necessary to meet environmental standards, but development of that technology should be of long-term benefit to the industry that develops it. It is part of the process of change and adaptation, which also benefits the environment. I emphasise that.

There are signs that that is already happening. The NRA annual report for 1994-95, published earlier this year, showed that, overall, there has been a considerable improvement in the quality of our rivers and canals in the past few years. More specifically, there has been a net improvement of 26 per cent. in the length of rivers and canals, between 1990 and 1994, achieving good environmental standards.

Next year, the NRA will be publishing its quinquennial report on river quality in 1990-95. In part, that is a result of a joint approach by the NRA with industry in developing workable standards that meet the environment's needs and safeguard industrial output.

I think that that is an appropriate point on which to draw my remarks to a conclusion. Against that background, I reiterate the need for continuing, sensible dialogue to resolve the remaining difficulties. The NRA has a duty to protect our water environment from pollution, from whatever source. A timetable has been drawn up for implementation of the NRA consent conditions, and, in turn, conditions laid down by water companies.

I therefore congratulate all concerned on the way in which they have, in recent times, approached this problem, with a genuine desire to cater for one another's particular needs. I am pleased to note the progress that has been made so far. It is in all our interests to ensure that river pollution is minimised. The NRA has been working towards that, and I hope that the opportunity to move forward will produce the desired results.

Question put and agreed to.

DEFENCE

Married Housing Stock

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how his Department's married housing stock will be moved into the private sector. [3680]

Mr. Arbuthnot: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced on 30 November, Official Report, columns 810–11, we propose that the Ministry of Defence should transfer ownership of the married quarters estate in England and Wales to the private sector on a series of very long leases, renting back the accommodation which is needed to meet service housing needs. Several thousand surplus properties would be transferred on a freehold basis at the same time. The Ministry of Defence would retain, through the Defence Housing Executive, responsibility for maintenance and the allocation of housing rented by MOD. Further details of this proposal are set out in the preliminary information memorandum published on 30 November, a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will publish the preliminary information memorandum on the sale of the married quarters estate. [4168]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The preliminary information memorandum was published on 30 November 1995, and a copy was placed in the Library of the House.

Departmental Targets

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the published recommended response times within which his Department is expected to reply to letters from the public. [2999]

Mr. Arbuthnot: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my predecessor on 6 June 1995, Official Report, column 148.

Queen's Flight

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions since the recent change in procedures aircraft of the Queen's Flight have been used by members of the royal family for private travel, unconnected with their official duties. [3254]

Mr. Soames: Since the introduction, on 1 April 1995, of arrangements under which the royal households are charged for private use of aircraft of No. 32 (The Royal) Squadron, there have been six occasions when such aircraft have been used for private travel.

Navigation Systems

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reason the specification for integrated inertial navigation and global positioning system equipment for Sea Harriers was drafted in accordance with the US Department of Defence's requirement; and if he will instruct British Aerospace to amend that specification to accord with British requirements. [3727]

Mr. Arbuthnot: As prime contractor with responsibility for conducting the competition for an integrated inertial navigation and global positioning system for the Sea Harrier, British Aerospace defined the specifications to be applied. My Department has reviewed these specifications and is satisfied that they are consistent with recognised international standards.

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what steps he has taken to ensure that British Aerospace treats all bidders fairly in its administration of the competition for the supply inertial navigation and global positioning systems for the Sea Harrier aircraft; [3725]

(2) what are the implication for the IN-GPS contract for the Sea Harrier aircraft of the relationship between British Aerospace, BASE and the division of Honeywell which is bidding for the contract. [3726]

Mr. Arbuthnot: British Aerospace's handling of the competition for an inertial navigation and global positioning system for the Sea Harrier has been closely supervised by my Department's technical and contracts staff. We are satisfied that the conduct of this competition has been fair and proper.

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the economic and strategic importance of maintaining a British industrial capability to design and manufacture inertial navigation and guidance systems. [3728]

Mr. Arbuthnot: My Department is now assessing the results of the competition for an inertial navigation and global positioning system for the Sea Harrier prior to reaching a procurement decision. This assessment will take into account any impact on a continuing United Kingdom design capability in this technology field.

Armed Forces Exercises (Ebford)

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many low flying operations or exercises were conducted by the Royal Air Force or other NATO armed forces over the village of Ebford, Devon, during the autumn of 1988. [2855]

Mr. Soames: Although records are maintained of the total number of sorties flown in the UK low flying system, statistics are not available on, nor is it possible to estimate, the number of sorties flown over precise locations.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions a Royal Marines colour sergeant was deployed in Ebford village during autumn 1988. [2860]

Mr. Soames: No colour sergeant of the Royal Marines command was deployed in Ebford village during the autumn of 1988.

Departmental Efficiency Savings

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will provide details of the efficiency savings required to meet his Department's budget settlement. [3679]

Mr. Soames: The MOD efficiency programme has led to savings worth more than £3 billion and "Front Line First" will produce a further £1 billion of savings per year by the end of the century. We will build on this in setting targets for future efficiency savings.

Amphibious Operations

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place a copy of his directorate of operational capability's latest report in the Library; if he will make a statement on the Royal Navy's capability to mount an amphibious operation equivalent to the Falklands campaign; and what immediate plans he has to order new amphibious assault ships or other vessels to improve that capability. [3745]

Mr. Soames: Reports produced by my directorate of operational capability are classified documents, and constitute advice to Ministers. It is not our practice to place such documents in the Library of the House.

The Royal Navy retains the capability to conduct amphibious operations in support of our defence policy objectives. This capability is currently being enhanced by the acquisition of the helicopter carrier HMS Ocean, which was launched earlier this year, and the refit of the landing ship logistic Sir Bedivere.

Negotiations are under way with VSEL on its tender to replace the amphibious ships HMS Fearless and Intrepid.

Aircraft Spare Parts

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the provision of spare parts for British aircraft. [3677]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The Ministry of Defence obtains spare parts from industry for support of its aircraft. Logistic support procedures are designed to ensure that requirements are satisfied while minimising spares holdings in the interests of efficiency and cost-effectiveness. Unforeseen problems can mean that aircraft are unavailable awaiting spare parts but this has not affected our current operational commitments.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many RAF aircraft are currently not operational due to the lack of spare parts. [3678]

Mr. Soames: The number of RAF aircraft unavailable awaiting spare parts from industry varies on a daily basis. The figure for Monday 27 November 1995, including training aircraft, was 44.

Ro-ro Ferries

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to purchase roll-on roll-off ferries; and if he will make a statement. [3676]

Mr. Arbuthnot: We are examining a number of possible enhancements to the civil and military strategic lift available to the joint rapid deployment force, including the charter, lease or purchase of suitable shipping and cargo aircraft.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Tourism

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will set out the Exchequer grant for the promotion and support of tourism for each of the years 1979–80 to 1995–96, at 1979 prices and expressed per head of population, for England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland. [2158]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 27 November 1995]: The total Government grant to the statutory tourist boards, expressed in 1979 prices—millions of pounds—for each year from 1979 to 1995, and expressed per head of population—pounds—for the countries covered by the boards, was as follows:

	British tourist authority		English tourist board		Scottish tourist board

ENVIRONMENT

EU Directives

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all EU and EEC directives which have come into force and have not yet been translated into United Kingdom regulation. [2075]

Mr. Clappison: Directives for which my Department is responsible, for which the date for transposition has passed but for which no transposing legislation has been made are those relating to: nitrates, hazardous waste, safety signs and the adaptation of the directive on contained use of genetically modified organisms—GMOs. The steps necessary to give effect to these are well in hand, although explanatory guidelines from the Commission are necessary before the GMOs directive can be transposed. Directives on the quality of fresh waters to support fish life and the quality required of shellfish waters were implemented by administrative means, which are soon to be replaced by new regulations. My Department intends to transpose into United Kingdom law the directive on the control of volatile organic compound emissions from the storage of petrol and its distribution to service stations by the compliance date of 31 December 1995.

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all EU and EEC directives which will come into force during the next 12 months indicating the dates when he expects to lay regulations to implement them in the United Kingdom. [2076]

Mr. Clappison: There are no directives for which my Department is responsible which are certain to come into force during the next 12 months.

Planning Permission

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if local authorities will be expected to meet the costs of (a) the new rural business use class initiative and (b) informing unsuccessful applicants of the outcome of their application for planning permission from within their existing budgets. [2644]

Sir Paul Beresford: The present regime under which local planning authorities charge fees for applications for planning permission would apply to applications relating to any new rural business use class. The Government's policy is to progress to full-cost recovery by local planning authorities, including the cost of notifying applicants of planning decisions, and we are close to achieving this target.

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each regional office the number of notices served for each of the last 12 months, for extension of time owing to failures to determine the call in process for planning applications, within the prescribed period of time, together with the average period of time for which such extensions were required. [3487]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: I will write to my hon. Friend.

Departmental Targets

Ms Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the published recommended response times within which his Department is expected to reply to letters from the public. [2997]

Mr. Gummer: My Department has a target of replying to all letters from the public, including individuals, businesses and local authorities, within 15 working days of the letter being received by the Department.

Homelessness

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to increase his Department's support to voluntary organisations which assist homeless people. [2870]

Mr. Clappison: The Housing White Paper "Our Future Homes", issued on 27 June 1995, undertook to continue the Government's rough sleepers initiative—RSI—in central London beyond March 1996, and to assist the development of the successful RSI model in other areas where rough sleeping could be demonstrated to be a major problem. Over the next three years—1996–97 to 1998–99—my Department plans to make available an additional £50 million to meet these commitments. Following analysis of the responses to a consultation paper issued on 3 October 1995, we will be issuing a strategy paper in the new year inviting bids for these resources.

My Department also provides grants under section 73 of the Housing Act 1985 to voluntary sector organisations to provide practical help for single people in housing need. Planned provision for this programme is an increase from £6.9 million in 1995–96 to £7.8 million in 1996–97.

Public Inquiry (Welbeck)

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) when he intends to decide on the inspector's report covering the public inquiry into the appeal by the Warmfield Company against the planned refusal to develop the Newland park and Welbeck site in the Normanton constituency; [3206]

(2) if he will now make a statement on the inspector's report following the public inquiry held on the Welbeck reclamation and landfill projects and compulsory purchase orders by the Warmfield Company. [3207]

Sir Paul Beresford: The inspector's report has been received. The Secretary of State's decisions on the Welbeck compulsory purchase orders and the appeal by the Warmfield Company have been deferred at the request of Wakefield council and the company. The Secretary of State currently awaits their confirmation of whether they wish to withdraw the orders and appeal or proceed with them. It is not possible to say when the decision on the appeal will be issued, should the company decide to proceed with it.

Voting Disqualifications (Councillors)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many councillors since 1979 have sought a dispensation from him to allow them to vote on matters in which otherwise they would be disqualified from voting by virtue of a declared interest. [3376]

Sir Paul Beresford: There would be a disproportionate cost involved in providing such figures from 1979. However, records kept since 1985 indicate some 1,360 councillors have sought a dispensation from the Secretary of State to allow them to vote on matters in which otherwise they would be disqualified from voting by virtue of a declared interest.

Housing Associations

Mr. Cann: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of new lettings by housing associations have been made to people in receipt of housing benefit in (a) 1994 and (b) 1995 to date. [3187]

Mr. Clappison: The latest available information relates to housing association lettings to households that are eligible for either full or partial housing benefit.

The figures for 1994 and the first nine months of 1995 are:

Housing association new lettings: per cent. eligible for housing benefit

	England Percentage
1995[1]	82

Local Government Finance

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the metropolitan district budgets for 1994–95 ranking them in order from the largest increase from the previous year to the lowest. [3199]

Mr. Curry: The information is as follows:

Percentage increase in budgeted net revenue expenditure 1993–94 to 1994–95

Debt Charges (North Yorkshire County Council)

Mr. Sykes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the annual debt charges paid by North Yorkshire county council in (a) 1992–93, (b) 1993–94 and (c) 1994–95. [3502]

Sir Paul Beresford: Annual debt charges paid by North Yorkshire county council were:

(a) 1992–93: £18.3 million

(b) 1993–94: £18.9 million

(c) 1994–95: £18.3 million

Sick Leave (Lancashire County Council)

Mr. Elletson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many days off sick were taken by employees of Lancashire county council social services department in (a) 1990–91, (b) 1991–92, (c) 1992–93, (d) 1993–94 and (e) 1994–95 indicating (i) the total figure and (ii) the average for each employee. [3505]

Sir Paul Beresford: This information is not available centrally.

Mr. Elletson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many days off sick were taken by employees of Lancashire county council in each of (a) 1990–91, (b) 1991–92, (c) 1992–93, (d) 1993–94 and (e) 1994–95 indicating (i) the total figure and (ii) the average for each employee. [3508]

Sir Paul Beresford: This information is not available centrally.

Gas Pipeline (Zeebrugge-Bacton)

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will call in for public inquiry the application by Interconnector for construction of a gas pipeline from Zeebrugge to Bacton, Norfolk. [3524]

Sir Paul Beresford: No. The Secretary of State for the Environment has no statutory powers to call in proposals for submarine pipelines. Submarine pipelines, from low water mark to the median line, are authorised by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry under the provisions of the Petroleum and Submarine Pipelines Act 1975. The section of pipeline from low water mark to the proposed Interconnector (UK) Ltd. facility at Bacton is currently the subject of planning applications before North Norfolk district council. Consideration has been given to call in that application, and one for the related gas processing facility, but it was considered that no more than local issues were involved and North Norfolk district council was best placed to determine the applications accordingly.

Emergency Drought Order (Yorkshire Water)

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the proceedings, and representations made at the public inquiry into Yorkshire Water's request for an emergency drought order. [3449]

Mr. Curry: In line with usual practice, the record of the proceedings of, and representations made at, the public hearing into objections to the application by Yorkshire Water Services Ltd. for an emergency drought order will be the inspector's report.

Mrs. Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the inspector's report of the public inquiry into Yorkshire Water's request for an emergency drought order; and on what date he will be able to issue the report. [3451]

Mr. Curry: The inspector's report will be made public when a final decision is taken whether or not to make the emergency drought order sought by Yorkshire Water Services Ltd.

Mrs. Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list each measure and drought order he has approved in the current year for the Yorkshire region indicating the dates of each approval, in respect of Yorkshire Water's statutory duty to provide a supply of drinking water. [3453]

Mr. Curry: My right hon. Friend has made the following drought orders on the application of Yorkshire Water Services Ltd:

1. YORKSHIRE WATER SERVICES LTD. (RIVER WHARFE) (DROUGHT) ORDER 1995.

Order made 18 August 1995.

This order reduced the support to the River Wharfe which Yorkshire Water was required to give Grimwith reservoir and thus allowed more water from Grimwith to be available for public supply. It also allowed the Nidd Aqueduct to be used to take water from Grimwith, rather than just bring water to Grimwith.

2. YORKSHIRE WATER SERVICES LTD. (DROUGHT) ORDER 1995.

Order made 26 August 1995.

This order authorised the restriction of non-essential uses of water in the Bradford area.

3. YORKSHIRE WATER SERVICES LTD. (HEBDEN WATER AND RIVER WORTH) (DROUGHT) ORDER 1995.

Order made 7 September 1995.

This order reduced the amount of compensation water that Yorkshire Water had to release from certain reservoirs.

4. YORKSHIRE WATER SERVICES LTD. (SILSDEN RESERVOIR) (DROUGHT) ORDER 1995.

Order made 31 August 1995.

This order reduced the compensation water that had to be discharged from Silsden Reservoir.

5. YORKSHIRE WATER SERVICES LTD. (PENNINE RESERVOIRS) (DROUGHT) ORDER 1995.

Order made 2 October 1995.

This order reduced the amount of compensation water that had to be discharged from a range of Pennine Reservoirs.

6. YORKSHIRE WATER SERVICES LTD. (CHELLOW DEAN RESERVOIRS) (DROUGHT) ORDER 1995.

Order made 2 October 1995.

This order allowed abstraction from reservoirs not normally used for drinking water abstraction.

7. YORKSHIRE WATER SERVICES LTD. (RIVER WHARFE) (AMENDMENT) (EMERGENCY DROUGHT) ORDER 1995.

Order made 28 September 1995.

This order allowed increased abstraction from the River Wharfe to provide water for Bradford.

8. YORKSHIRE WATER SERVICES LTD. (RIVER WHARFE) (DROUGHT) (EMERGENCY AMENDMENT) (EXTENSION) ORDER 1995.

Order made 31 October 1995.

This order extended the period for which Order No. 7 was valid.

9. YORKSHIRE WATER SERVICES LTD. (SILSDEN RESERVOIR NO. 2) (DROUGHT) ORDER 1995.

Order made 30 October 1995.

This order extended the period during which the amount of water required to be discharged from the reservoir was reduced.

10. YORKSHIRE WATER SERVICES LTD. (HAIGH COTE DAM) (DROUGHT) ORDER 1995.

Order made 31 October 1995.

This order allowed abstraction from a reservoir not normally used for drinking water.

11. YORKSHIRE WATER SERVICES LTD. (RIVER OUSE) (DROUGHT) ORDER 1995.

Order made 3 November 1995.

This order allowed increased abstractions from the River Ouse for supplies to Leeds.

12. YORKSHIRE WATER SERVICES LTD. (DROUGHT NO. 2) ORDER 1995.

Order made 3 November 1995.

This order authorised the restriction of non-essential uses of water in Leeds, Selby and Wakefield.

13. YORKSHIRE WATER SERVICES LTD. (RIVER WHARFE) (ARTHINGTON) (DROUGHT) ORDER 1995.

Order made 8 November 1995.

This order allowed additional abstraction from the River Wharfe for supply to Leeds.

14. YORKSHIRE WATER SERVICES LTD. (PENNINE RESERVOIRS) (NO. 2) (DROUGHT) ORDER 1995.

Order made 9 November 1995.

This order reduced the requirements to discharge compensation water from a large number of Pennine reservoirs.

15. YORKSHIRE WATER SERVICES LTD. (HEBDEN WATER, RIVER WORTH AND PENNINE RESERVOIRS) (NO. 3) ORDER 1995.

Order made 15 November 1995.

This order consolidated orders Nos. 3 and 5 and reduced further the required compensation water discharges.

16. YORKSHIRE WATER SERVICES LTD. (DROUGHT) (NO. 3) ORDER 1995.

Order made 20 November 1995.

This order restricted non-essential uses of water in Harrogate area.

17. YORKSHIRE WATER SERVICES LTD. (LEIGHTON AND HAVERAH PARK RESERVOIRS) (DROUGHT) ORDER 1995.

Order made 17 November 1995.

This order reduced the compensation water required to be discharged from these reservoirs.

18. YORKSHIRE WATER SERVICES LTD. (ABSTRACTION LICENCES) (DROUGHT) ORDER 1995.

Order made 21 November 1995.

This order allowed all operators of licensed boreholes in Yorkshire to provide water to any premises in West Yorkshire, within the quantity limits in their licences.

Mrs. Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has received the inspector's report of the public inquiry into the request by Yorkshire Water for an emergency drought order. [3450]

Mr. Curry: My right hon. Friend has received the report of the inspector on the public hearing into objections to Yorkshire Water Services Ltd.'s application for an emergency drought order.

Mrs. Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to respond to the inspector's report of the public inquiry into Yorkshire Water's request for an emergency drought order. [3452]

Mr. Curry: My right hon. Friend indicated on Friday 24 November that he had received the inspector's report, but that in present circumstances he did not propose to take a decision on the application: the matter would be kept under review.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has collected from local authorities about the allocation of properties to asylum seekers and refugees; and how many representations he has received from local authorities about the provision of housing for refugees and asylum seekers. [3669]

Mr. Clappison: My Department does not collect information from local authorities about the allocation of properties to asylum seekers and refugees. My hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration has received a request from the Association of London Government to discuss housing for asylum seekers.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many applicants for political asylum qualified for housing and housing benefits in the last year for which figures are available. [3667]

Mr. Clappison: The only available data relate to asylum seekers seeking housing under the homelessness provisions of the Housing Act 1985.

In the year ending June 1995, 2,190 households which had applied under these provisions in England were found to be registered as asylum seekers with the Home Office. Local authorities have a duty to provide temporary accommodation for these households until their asylum application is resolved.

Over the same period, 930 of the households which local authorities accepted for rehousing under the homelessness provisions of the Housing Act 1985 were former asylum seekers.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many properties (a) by local authorities and (b) by Government Departments are currently vacant in the United Kingdom; and what percentage of vacant dwellings were made available to refugees and asylum seekers during the past 12 months. [3668]

Mr. Clappison: I will write to the hon. Member about the numbers of vacant dwellings in England when the analysis of the data reported by local authorities on their 1995 housing investment programme returns is complete. No data are collected centrally on vacant dwellings made available to refugees or asylum seekers.

The information on vacant dwellings relating to Wales, Scotland or Northern Ireland is a matter for the Secretaries of State for Wales, for Scotland and for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the cost of providing temporary accommodation for applicants for political asylum in the last year for which figures are available. [3674]

Mr. Clappison: This information is not held centrally.

Single Regeneration Budget

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to announce the results of the latest round of bidding under the single regeneration budget. [3952]

Sir Paul Beresford: Before Christmas.

Statutory Instruments

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many statutory instruments his Department sponsored in the last Session of Parliament; and how many of these (a) constituted a new rule or regulation, (b) were introduced to implement European Community directives and (c) amplify the minimum standards set out in an original European Community directive. [2464]

Mr. Clappison [holding answer 28 November 1995]: The Department of the Environment was responsible for 192 statutory instruments in the last Session of Parliament. It is not possible to give a precise number for those which constituted a new rule or regulation. However, the White Paper "Competitiveness: Forging Ahead", Cm 2867, presented to Parliament in May this year, referred at page 192 to seven categories of regulations made in 1994. The statutory instruments made during the last Session of Parliament for which the Department was responsible fell within those categories as follows:

(i) EU and international obligations: 9
(ii) NHS Trusts: 0
(iii) Fees and local provisions: 43
(iv) Facilitating privatisation and competition: 12
(v) Repeals and more favourable regimes: 12
(vi) Other (with possible impact on business): 39
(vii) Other (with no impact on business): 80.

In addition, there were five commencement orders.

The totals do not exactly correspond with the total number of statutory instruments as a small number fall within more than one category.

In addition, nine statutory instruments have been made since the Health and Safety Executive became a non-departmental public body in connection with which the Department of the Environment has responsibilities.

Of these, three fell within the category of giving effect to EC and international obligations, one fell within the category of fees and local provisions, five fell within the category of repeals and more favourable regimes and six within the category of other instruments with a possible impact on business.

None of the instruments adopts measures which set higher standards than minimum standards explicitly laid down in an EC directive.

Radioactive Waste Dumping

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide a complete list of all radioactive waste dumped since 1965 west of the Hebrides showing (a) the date, (b) the amount, (c) the source and (d) the exact location. [3177]

Mr. Baldry: I have been asked to reply.

No radioactive waste has been dumped since 1965 west of the Hebrides. The "Report of the Independent Review of Disposal of Radioactive Waste in the North East Atlantic" by Professor F. G. T. Holliday, which is in the House Library, lists all the locations where the United Kingdom has disposed of radioactive waste at sea.

TREASURY

Regional Electricity Companies

Mr. Burden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if regional electricity companies will be able to claim corporation tax relief or any other tax relief on any rebate given to domestic consumers arising out of the sale of the national grid; and what is his estimate of the expected value of any such tax relief to the regional electricity companies (a) per customer and (b) in total. [3391]

Mr. Jack: The general tax rules apply to any business which reduces its charges to customers. The precise tax consequences will depend on the particular arrangements. If, for example, a business reduces its prices for future services, then, in general because the business is not entitled to the money, there would be no charge to tax—a business would not be charged to tax on profits to which it was never entitled. If, however, the circumstances were such that a rebate was made out of sums which counted as taxable trading receipts, the rebate would be allowed only as a deduction in calculating the business's profits for tax purposes if the expenditure satisfied the general test that it was revenue in nature and incurred wholly and exclusively for the purposes of earning the business's profit.

I cannot comment on the particular arrangements and tax affairs of individual taxpayers.

Fuel Duties

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will reduce the tax on low sulphur motor vehicle diesel to eliminate the retail price difference. [3750]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: No. There are a number of new diesel products under development which will meet future environmental standards. I am not satisfied that any change in the duty structure would be justified.

Mortgage Interest Relief

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the tax expenditure of mortgage interest relief in each of the years since 1991–92. [3731]

Mr. Jack: The total cost of mortgage interest relief in the years 1991–92 to 1994–95 is given in table 5.1 of "Inland Revenue Statistics 1995", a copy of which is in the Library.

The estimated total cost of the relief in 1995–96 is about £2.8 billion. This is based on the assumption, by convention, of no change from the current average building society interest rate.

Public Service Pensions

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is proposing to increase public service pensions from April 1996. [4459]

Mr. Waldegrave: Under the legislation governing public service pensions, they are increased annually by the same percentage as state earnings-related pensions—additional pensions. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security announced on 28 November, Official Report, column 618, that additional pensions will be increased by 3.9 per cent. in line with the annual increase in the retail prices index up to September. Public service pensions will therefore be increased by 3.9 per cent. from 8 April 1996. Pensions which have been in payment for less than a year will receive a pro rata increase.

Paymaster General

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has for the future of the office of Her Majesty's Paymaster General. [4460]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: In accordance with its framework document, a full prior options review of the office of Her Majesty's Paymaster General will now be conducted, covering all its activities. The terms of reference for the review will be as follows:

> To carry out a full Prior Options Review of the Office of Her Majesty's Paymaster General (PAYMASTER), consulting interested parties. To consider the need for the functions of the Agency and for the Government's retaining responsibility for them; whether any need to remain in the Civil Service and if so, to recommend suitable arrangements and a mechanism for transferring the rest to the private sector.

Since the office of Her Majesty's Paymaster General became a next steps agency nearly three years ago, it has made significant improvements to its efficiency, competitiveness and quality of service. It has won substantial business in competition with public and private sector competitors. I believe that there is a prima facie case now for moving the work of the agency into the private sector, subject to the review revealing no obstacles to this. Privatisation could offer new opportunities for the agency, its staff and—most important—its customers. The review will, therefore, focus on feasible options for moving the agency into the private sector.

Contributions from interested parties are invited and should be addressed to:

The Treasury Accountant
HM Treasury
19 Allington Street
London
SW1E 5EB

They should be received before 26 February 1996. The results of the review will be announced in due course.

Finance Act 1995

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what procedures have been put in place by his Department to monitor the environmental impacts arising from the implementation of the Finance Act 1995; [246]

(2) if the Finance Act 1995 was (a) subject to and (b) modified on account of an environmental appraisal using the guidance contained in "Policy Appraisal and the Environment", produced by the Department of the Environment; and if he will publish the appraisal; [244]

(3) what alternative courses of action from those detailed in the Finance Act 1995 were considered in any environmental appraisal undertaken by his Department. [245]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 22 November 1995]: The main measure in the Finance Act 1995 relevant to the environment was the real terms increase in road fuel duties enacted in sections 6 and 7.

It was announced in the March 1993 Budget that the Government's policy would be to increase fuel duties by at least 3 per cent. on average in real terms in future Budgets in order to help to restrain carbon dioxide emissions. In the November 1993 Budget, this was raised to 5 per cent. Raising duties in this way will make a significant contribution to the UK programme for limiting CO_2 emissions in line with our commitments under the UN convention on climate change.

Emissions of CO_2 are subject to regular monitoring by the Department of the Environment. It is not normal practice to disclose options considered, but not pursued, in the course of preparing the Budget.

The 1995 Finance Bill largely related to measures announced in the 1994 Budget. This year's Budget contained other environmental measures: a further 5 per cent. real increase in fuel duties, the definitive arrangements for the new landfill tax, reduced duties on liquid petroleum gas and compressed natural gas, which are relatively clean road fuels, and an additional increase in the duty on super unleaded petrol, which causes higher levels of pollutants such as benzene. These measures will be enacted in the 1996 Finance Bill. The Chancellor also announced that the Government would look into ways of using vehicle excise duty to encourage the use of low emission vehicles.

Public Bodies

Mr. Steen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the annual income from (a) fees (b) charges and (c) fines; what was the total number of staff employed (i) part time and (ii) full time; and what contribution his Department has made towards the annual running costs in each of the past three years in respect of (1) the Inland Revenue, (2) Customs and Excise and (3) the Central Statistical Office. [2742]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 28 November 1995]: The information is set out in the table.

[1] Includes the Valuation Office agency.

[3] As at 1 April.

[4] Gross running costs.

[5] Covers fines and penalties.

PRIME MINISTER

Former Prime Ministers (Briefings)

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Prime Minister if he will set out the procedures by which civil servants are allowed to provide advice and information to former Prime Ministers; and if he will make a statement. [3025]

The Prime Minister: Subject to the approval of Ministers, civil servants may provide factual briefing to former Prime Ministers, as to other Members of Parliament. Such briefing is often provided for visits to overseas countries.

Scott Inquiry

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Prime Minister what is the latest total cost to public funds of providing legal services for witnesses to Sir Richard Scott's inquiry. [3028]

The Prime Minister: The accounts settled to date from public funds for the provision of external legal services to witnesses to Sir Richard Scott's inquiry are approximately £750,790. The value of legal services charged by the Treasury Solicitor's Department is £306,320. Some legal advice has also been provided by Government lawyers as part of their normal duties. The cost of this advice is not quantifiable.

Northern Ireland Peace Process

Mr. Forman: To ask the Prime Minister if he will give an account of his latest discussions with the Prime Minister of the Irish Republic on the peace process; and if he will make a statement. [3699]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the statement I made on 29 November 1995, Official Report, columns 199-201.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Remand Prisoners

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners in England and Wales had, at the latest available date, been held on remand for (a) up to three months (b) from three to six months (c) from six to 12 months and (d) for more than 12 months. [3271]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. Tim Smith, dated 4 December 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question asked how many prisoners in England and Wales had, at the latest available date, been held on remand for (a) up to three months, (b) from three to six months, (c) from six to twelve months, (d) for more than 12 months.

The latest available provisional information for England and Wales is for 30 June 1995 and is given in the attached table.

Remand prisoners in Prison Service establishments in England and Wales by length of time since first reception[1] on 30 June 1995

Time since first remand	30 June 1995
Less than 3 months	6,830
More than 3 months, up to and inc. 6 months.	2,343
More than 6 months, up to and inc. 12 months.	1,542
Over 12 months.	341
Total	11,056

[1] Awaiting trial or sentence. Time since first reception on remand into a Prison Service establishment. This includes any intervening time spent on bail, but excludes time spent in police cells beforehand.

Dr. Bayo Omoyiola

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the (a) right hon. and hon. Members, (b) Church spokesmen and (c) other organisations that have made representations against the deportation of Dr. Bayo Omoyiola to Nigeria; and if he will make a statement. [3357]

Mr. Kirkhope: Details of people and groups who have made representations in this case are set out in the tables.

Dr. Omoyiola has been in the United Kingdom without leave since 14 May 1991 and entered his employment without permission to do so. He has been refused a work permit. On 16 November 1994 he was given notice of a decision to deport him and his appeal was subsequently dismissed by an independent adjudicator who considered it inappropriate to make any recommendation on his case to the Secretary of State. Full account has been taken of the various representations made on Dr. Omoyiola's behalf. However, he has no claim to be here and his circumstances are not so compelling or compassionate as to warrant him being allowed to remain exceptionally. A deportation order has therefore been signed on 10 November 1995 and this will shortly be served on Dr. Omoyiola. Arrangements will be made for his removal to Nigeria.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what was the number of claims for political asylum which have not yet been decided and which date from (a) 1990, (b) 1991, (c) 1992, (d) 1993, (e) 1994 and (f) 1995; [3641]

(2) how many applications for political asylum dating from before 1990 have not yet been decided. [3631]

Mr. Kirkhope: The number of asylum applications awaiting an initial decision as at 31 October 1995 was 66,655. The available information on the years in which these applications were made is given in the table.

Proportion of total number of asylum applications awaiting initial decisions as at 31 October 1995, by year of application.

Year of application	Percentage
pre 1991	5
1991	15
1992	15
1993	15

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many appeals against a decision to refuse political asylum on the grounds that the applicants have visited a third country were received in the last year for which figures are available; and how many were (a) upheld and (b) dismissed. [3633]

Mr. Kirkhope: The information requested for without foundation appeals—the majority of which are against refusals on the grounds that the applicant had arrived from a safe third country—is given in table 8.4 of Home Office statistical bulletin "Asylum Statistics United Kingdom 1994", issue 15/95. A copy of this publication is available in the Library.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for political asylum have been received from applicants fleeing countries affected by civil war; and how many of such applications were successful, in each year since 1990. [3635]

Mr. Kirkhope: Asylum applications are considered on the individual merit of each case. The basis for an application is not centrally recorded, so the number of those lodged directly as a result of civil wars is not available.

Information regarding asylum applications, by nationality, for the years 1986 to 1994 is given in table 2.1 of Home Office statistical bulletin "Asylum Statistics United Kingdom 1994", issue 15/95, a copy of which can be found in the Library. Tables 3.1 to 3.3 of this publication gives decisions on asylum applications, by nationality, for the same time period.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which countries are currently classified as undergoing or having undergone events likely to give rise to a well-founded fear of persecution among the nationals of those countries. [3637]

Mr. Kirkhope: Under proposals on which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security has been consulting for restricting the benefit entitlement of asylum seekers, it will be possible for the Benefits Agency to be notified in the event of a future fundamental upheaval in a country such that persons cannot normally be returned to it for the time being.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many applications for political asylum by applicants with dependent children were refused in the last year for which figures are available; and how many dependent children were involved; [3639]

(2) how many applications for political asylum by unaccompanied minors were received for the last year for which figures are available; and how many were (a) successful and (b) rejected. [3638]

Mr. Kirkhope: The available information on the number of asylum applications which were refused in 1994, both including and excluding dependants, is given in table 1.2 of Home Office statistical bulletin "Asylum Statistics United Kingdom 1994", issue 15/95, a copy of which can be found in the Library. The available information on applications from unaccompanied children is given in table 2.4 of the same publication. A more detailed breakdown of these figures is not available.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what was the average time taken to process an application for political asylum for the latest year for which figures are available; [3640]

(2) what is the average number of hours taken to decide an application for political asylum from the receipt of the application to a decision. [3632]

Mr. Kirkhope: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) on 21 November 1995, Official Report, column 219, which provided the available information on the average times involved in deciding applications for asylum.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for political asylum were dismissed as frivolous and vexatious under the Immigration and Asylum Act 1993; and how many of these cases went to appeal and how many appeals were successful, in the last year for which figures are available. [3634]

Mr. Kirkhope: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for political asylum have been received from applicants from (a) Croatia, (b) Serbia, (c) Bosnia, (d) the Sudan and (e) Rwanda; and how many were successful in each case since 1990. [3636]

Mr. Kirkhope: Information regarding asylum applications from nationals of Sudan and the former Yugoslavia for the years 1986 to 1994 is given in table 2.1 of Home Office statistical bulletin "Asylum Statistics United Kingdom 1994", issued 15/95, a copy of which can be found in the Library. Tables 3.1 to 3.3 of this publication give decisions on asylum applications, by nationality, for the same time period.

In 1994, there were an estimated 110 applications from nationals of Rwanda. During the same time period there were approximately 15 decisions on Rwandan applications, of which five were granted asylum and 10 were refused.

Information on applications from the individual states of the former Yugoslavia, and one of those from Rwanda prior to 1994, is not available.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the situation in (a) Somalia (b) Liberia, (c) Nigeria, (d) Sierra Leone, (e) Sri Lanka and (f) Rwanda for the purposes of allowing asylum applications. [3682]

Mr. Kirkhope: Asylum applications are considered in accordance with the 1951 convention, taking account of available information from a wide range of sources about the position in the country of origin and its significance for the particular application in question.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish a breakdown of the number of asylum seekers currently held in detention by (a) nationality, (b) gender, (c) length of detention, (d) place of detention and (e) immigration status at the time of application. [1523]

Mr. Kirkhope [holding answer 23 November 1995]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) on 28 November 1995, Official Report, column 655, which gave a breakdown of asylum seekers held in detention.

Asylum and Immigration Problems

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 28 November, Official Report, column 659, concerning the bodies from which he sought information, or had consultations concerning current asylum and immigration problems, if he will place in the Library a list of the organisations he then referred to, distinguishing those from which he sought information or with which he had consultations, respectively. [3701]

Mr. Kirkhope: The discussions referred to in my previous reply are generally ad hoc rather than in the nature of formal consultations. Information about them could be collated in the form requested only at disproportionate cost.

Parole Applications

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what percentage of (a) first and (b) second parole applications from prisoners in England and Wales were granted to prisoners serving more than four years in each ethnic category in 1994; [3654]

(2) what percentage of first and second parole applications were granted to prisoners in England and Wales in each ethnic category in (a) 1989 and (b) 1994. [3656]

Miss Widdecombe: The available information is given in the tables; information for 1989 is not available. Comparisons between the ethnic categories are affected by many factors which influence the outcome of parole reviews, including length of sentence, type of offence and amount of time remaining to be served before unparoled released. These factors were analyse in Home Office statistical bulletin 2/94 "Parole recommendations and Ethnic Origin, England and Wales 1990", published in January 1994. Comparisons between 1990 and 1994 are affected by the substantial changes in the parole system—to which annual reports of the parole board refer. Copies are available in the Library.

Prisoners

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current prison population in England and Wales. [3657]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Ms Janet Anderson, dated 4 December 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the current prison population in England and Wales.

On Thursday 30 November, a total of 52,617 prisoners were in custody in England and Wales.

Visa Applications (Algeria)

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what facilities were available in Algeria to deal with visa applications to enter the United Kingdom in 1994; how many staff were involved; how many applications were (a) received and (b) successful for a visa to enter the United Kingdom in 1994; how many applicants were recognised as political refugees in 1994; and how many applicants were granted long stay in the United Kingdom in 1994. [3264]

Mr. Kirkhope: A full entry clearance service was available in Algeria until 18 August 1994. Since then a service has been available for diplomats and officials only. A list of entry clearance staff appears in the list:

1 x full-time Entry Clearance Officer (United Kingdom-based) all year

1 x full-time Entry Clearance Officer (United Kingdom-based)

January–September 1994

1 x full-time Vice Consul spending 15 per cent. of his time as Entry Clearance Manager January–September 1994

2 x LE3 (Locally Engaged) assistants all year

1 x LE3 (Locally Engaged) assistant January–September 1994

Information on grants and initial refusals of entry clearance by overseas posts in Algeria and by category—settlement and temporary purposes—in 1994 is given in table 2.1 of "Control of Immigration Statistics United Kingdom 1994", issued on 10 August 1995, Cm 2935 HMSO. Information on applications for asylum made at United Kingdom ports or after entry into the United Kingdom by Algerians in 1994 and the initial decisions is given in table 4.3 of the Home Office statistical bulletin "Asylum Statistics, United Kingdom 1994", issued on 30 June 1995—issue 15/95. Copies of these publications are in the Library.

Mr. Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) successful and (b) unsuccessful applicants from Algeria for visas to enter the United Kingdom have relatives living in the United Kingdom who are British citizens; and what is the breakdown in age groups of those applicants who were successful in 1994. [3265]

Mr. Kirkhope: The information requested is not available.

Prisons

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements have been made by the Prison Service to accommodate expected peaks in the prison population over the next 12 months. [3085]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. John Battle, dated 4 December 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about what arrangements have been made to accommodate expected peaks in the prison population over the next twelve months.

In dealing with a rising population, our first priority is to ensure that existing accommodation is fully utilised. To meet expected peaks in the population, arrangements have been made to identify accommodation which would normally hold one prisoner but is suitable for holding two for a short period of time; and to bring forward, where practicable, the opening of new accommodation. Around 2,700 additional prisoner places are expected to become available for use over the next twelve months.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the impact of increasing the density of accommodation use at local and training prisons. [2993]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. John Battle, dated 4 December 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about what assessment has been made of the impact of increasing the density of accommodation use at local and training prisons.

The majority of prisons are not overcrowded. Overcrowding is concentrated principally in some local prisons. This is because of the need to hold unsentenced prisoners close to the courts.

The Prison Service recognises that overcrowding has the potential to impact on the delivery of planned regimes and other purposeful activity. In spite of increases in the population, since April 1995 prisoners have on average spent 25.5 hours a week on purposeful activity. This is in line with the target set in the Prison Service Business Plan for 1995–96. The proportion of prisoners unlocked for twelve hours or more on weekdays is currently 38 per cent, which is the target set in the 1995–96 Business Plan.

In dealing with a rising population, our first priority is to ensure that existing accommodation is fully utilised. In addition, there is a substantial programme for the building of new accommodation. A new houseblock building programme will provide an additional 2,000 places by 1996–97. Further new accommodation is planned to come into use by 1997–98 with the rebuilding and re-opening of Lowdham Grange prison near Nottingham and the opening of two new privately financed prisons in South Wales and Merseyside.

Prisoner-prison Ratios

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list, by region, the prisoner to prison officer ratio in 1989–90, and the latest year for which figures are available. [2498]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Gerry Steinberg, dated 4 December 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the ratios, by region, of prisoners to prison officers.

Annex A shows the overall prisoner:officer (including prison custody officer) ratio in each of the Prison Service's fifteen areas. These figures reflect the position on 31 January 1995 and are the latest available.

Area information for 1989/90 is not available. Annex B shows the available information for this period, which is restricted to an overall prisoner:officer ratio for the whole Prison Service.

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total number of public interest immunity certificates signed by his Department for each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement. [2352]

Mr. Howard [holding answer 29 November 1995]: I refer the hon. and learned Gentleman to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) on 28 November 1995, Official Report, column 670.

Murder Victims (Family Compensation)

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many applicants were successful in respect of families of murder victims in general and specifically in respect of (a) parents of adult victims, (b) the adult children of murder victims, (c) the unmarried partners of murder victims and (d) the fathers of illegitimate murder victims under the tariff-based scheme of criminal injury compensation which was announced in April 1994 and subsequently withdrawn; [2307]

(2) how many applications were received but not processed from the families of murder victims in general and specifically from (a) parents of adult victims, (b) the adult children of murder victims, (c) the unmarried partners of murder victims and (d) the fathers of illegitimate murder victims in respect of the tariff-based scheme of criminal injury compensation which was announced in April 1994 and subsequently withdrawn. [2306]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 27 November 1995]: I refer the hon. Member to the answers given to him on 28 November 1995, Official Report, columns 652-53.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Ministerial Statements

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Lord President of the Council how many oral statements have been made by the Secretary of State for Wales in each Session since May 1992; and what was the total length of time taken in making these statements and replying to questions. [1709]

Mr. Newton: The information is as follows:

Number of statements made

1992–93: 5

Information on the total length of time taken in making these statements and in replying to questions is not held centrally.

Welsh Grand Committee

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Lord President of the Council on how many occasions the Welsh Grand Committee has sat in each Session since the 1992 election; what was the number of total hours of those sittings; and what proportion those hours represent of the total number of hours that the House has sat. [1802]

Mr. Newton: The Welsh Grand Committee has met 12 times since the 1992 general election, for a total of 29 hours. This represents 0.64 per cent. of the House sitting time.

Oral Answers

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Lord President of the Council how many oral answers have been made by the Secretary of State for Wales in each Session since May 1992; and how many oral questions sessions have taken place since that date. [1710]

Mr. Newton: The POLIS database holds the following information:

Session	Number of orals answered From Order Paper	Supplementaries	Number of question times
1992–93	119	320	12
1993–94	74	174	6
1994–95	98	213	8
Total	291	707	26

Short Money

Mr. Gallie: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will list (a) additional office allowances and (b) other allowances paid from public funds made available to (i) the Leader of Her Majesty's official Opposition and (ii) other spokesmen from Her Majesty's official Opposition. [1854]

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave on 21 November, Official Report, column 46.

Select Committees

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Lord President of the Council what proposals he has for submitting the Bills proposed in the Queen's Speech to pre-legislative inquiries by Select Committees. [598]

Mr. Newton: It will be proposed that the Armed Forces Bill be committed to a Select Committee prior to its conventional Committee stage. This is the usual practice for such Bills, which are required once every five years.

Select Committee on Welsh Affairs

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Lord President of the Council how many reports have been received by the House from the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs; and how many of these reports have been debated on the floor of the House. [1801]

Mr. Newton: The Welsh Affairs Select Committee has made 36 reports to the House. None has been debated on the Floor of the House.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Beijing Programme of Action

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which aspects of the Beijing programme of action he is prioritising. [2911]

Mr. Hanley: We plan to discuss with our aid recipient partners their priorities for our support in implementing the global and regional platforms for action. Their response will also influence our approach to the newer priorities highlighted at the conference, including promotion of women in politics and decision making, statistical work, credit, the revision of legal frameworks and capacity building, both of institutions of civil society and of Governments.

Nigerian Police Force

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many members of the Nigerian police force have visited the United Kingdom for training purposes in each year since 1990. [3147]

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 30 November 1995]: Two members of the Nigerian police force visited the United Kingdom in financial year 1990–91; two in 1991–92; one in 1992–93; nine in 1993–94; and seven in 1994–95.

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many Nigerian police officers have received scholarship awards in each year since 1990; and if he will give in each case the recipient's rank, the cost and duration of the scholarship. [3151]

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 30 November 1995]: Twenty-one officers have received awards as follows:

Year	Rank	Cost £	Duration
1990–91	Deputy Superintendent	2,601	Six weeks
1990–91	Not available	2,601	Six weeks
1991–92	Chief Superintendent	11,306	Three months
1991–92	Not available	2,400	Six weeks
1992–93	Superintendent	5,783	Six weeks
1993–94	Nine Assistant Superintendents	2,915 each	Two weeks each
1994–95	Deputy Commissioner	1,650	One week
1994–95	Assistant Commissioner	4,482	Four weeks
1994–95	Deputy Superintendent	4,482	Four weeks
1994–95	Two Detectives	4,482 each	Four weeks each
1994–95	Two Deputy Superintendents	4,482 each	Four weeks each

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many policemen or women have been seconded to Nigeria in each year since 1990; for what periods of time; and from which forces. [3155]

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 30 November 1995]: Seven police officers have been seconded to Nigeria as follows:

	Force
October 1991–May 1994	Cleveland
March 1991–April 1993	West Yorkshire
April 1991–May 1993	Greater Manchester
October 1993–November 1994[1]	British Transport Police
October 1993–November 1995	Metropolitan
September 1995–October 1995	Metropolitan
September 1995–October 1995	Metropolitan

[1] Retired officer, so not strictly a secondee.

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs where and when Nigerian policemen or women have been trained in Britain under the police training programme since November 1993; and if he will make a statement. [3154]

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 30 November 1995]: Since November 1993, Nigerian police officers have been trained with the west midlands fraud squad, Birmingham in June 1994 and at the Police Staff College at Bramshill in March–April 1995.

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the Nigerian police training programme started; when it finished; how much in total has been spent in each year; and if he will make a statement. [3152]

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 30 November 1995]: The programme started in March 1991, and ended in November 1995. Expenditure by financial year is as follows:

1990–91: £91,793

1991–92: £272,571

1992–93: £311,962

1993–94: £293,085

1995–96: £42,000 (Estimated)

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many Nigerian policemen or women have been trained in Britain under the police training programme since November 1993; and if he will make a statement. [3153]

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 30 November 1995]: Seven Nigerian police officers have received training in the UK since November 1993.

Police Training

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) how many requests for funding for police training projects overseas have been refused and from which countries; what consideration is given to such requests to human rights and the rights of the individual; and if he will make a statement; [3146]

(2) what proportion of (a) the overseas aid budget and (b) the amount of that budget allocated to good government has been spent on police training; what sums have been spent, in each year since 1990; and if he will make a statement; [3148]

(3) what has been the cost of scholarship awards in Britain in each year since 1990 for (a) Nigerian police officers and (b) all police officers funded by his Department; [3149]

(4) how many study tours to the United Kingdom were organised and funded for overseas police officers by his Department; and if he will state the countries that participated and at what cost in each year since 1990; [3150]

(5) on how many occasions in the past five years, a request for funding for police training from a foreign country has been referred for ministerial approval; and if he will name the countries concerned; [3156]

(6) which countries have benefited from police training since 1990; and if he will list the programmes, giving the start date and the size of the individual project budget; [3157]

(7) how many evaluations have been made by his Department of the effectiveness of aid in respect of police training; and if he will make a statement. [3158]

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 30 November 1995]: Questions 3146, 3148, 3149*(b), 3150 and 3156 to 3158 all concern police training worldwide; I can answer most helpfully by taking them together. The answer to 3149(a)* is included in that for 3151.

Under the aid programme, we provide management and technical training for police forces, both in the United Kingdom and in-country, including the development of in-country training capacity. This is usually in support of a wider objective of enhancing the effectiveness and public accountability of the police. This assistance is only a small part of the aid programme, currently accounting for under 0.5 per cent. of overseas aid. Such assistance is not separately recorded and details could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Support for overseas police forces under the aid programme, whether through training, study visits or other support, is considered as part of individual country programmes. There is no global allocation either for police or more generally for good government. Proposals are considered on their merits and in comparison with other competing demands.

Priorities for the use of aid are considered periodically as part of the reviews of country programme strategy, which are approved by Ministers, as well as in response to short-term events. Human rights issues are taken into account in these processes. Where support for the police is not identified as a priority for a country or is considered inappropriate, requests will often be refused at an early or informal stage rather than requiring detailed review. No records are kept of requests which are refused. Nor are separate records kept of submissions to Ministers. Issues are referred for ministerial consideration as necessary in view of their size, political sensitivity or novelty. In many cases, assistance to the police will have been only one facet of a wider-ranging submission or review.

Since 1994, a quarterly report has been made to the Minister for Overseas Development, summarising assistance being provided to police forces under the aid programme.

Police training is kept under regular review by two police advisers and by the departments financing such training. No overall evaluation has been made in recent years but the 1995 to 1997 work plan for ODA's evaluation department will include a review of assistance to police forces, including training.

Police training is also supported on a more limited scale from diplomatic wing funds. Efforts are currently being made to assess the impact of such training by tracing the careers of trainees since their return home.

Nigeria

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what funding his Department has given (a) civil liberties organisations, (b) the Campaign for Democracy, and (c) the constitutional rights projects in Nigeria, in the last five years. [3159]

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 30 November 1995]: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office has funded specific projects designed to foster good government through a number of Nigerian non-governmental organisations in the last five years, including those named.

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which of the aid projects to Nigeria agreed before December 1993 received funding in (a) 1994–95 and (b) 1995–96; and if he will make a statement. [3160]

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 30 November 1995]: Projects receiving funding in 1994–95 were:

National Electric Power Authority (institutional development)
University Management Systems

Those funded in 1994–95 and 1995–96 were:

Crop Protection Training

Middle Level Agricultural Education

Cross River State Forestry Management

Administrative Staff College of Nigeria (institutional development)

Police Training

Lagos Lagoon (pollution reduction plan)

Polytechnic Equipment Maintenance

Integrated Science Teacher Education

Federal Technical College, Yaba (institutional development)

Mr. Garrett: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place an embargo on military equipment shipments in Nigeria. [2967]

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 30 November 1995]: On 20 November 1995 the European Union adopted a common position extending measures against the Nigerian military regime in force since 1993. These included a full arms embargo. We shall continue to strictly enforce all European Union measures against the Nigerian military and keep them under review in the light of progress towards civilian democratic rule.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

HMSO

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) if he will make a statement on his plans for the privatisation of HMSO; and what is the time scale for his plans for the privatisation of HMSO; [3210]

(2) when he will be able to announce details of his plans for the future of HMSO. [3217]

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) on 27 November, Official Report, column 447. The Government's plans envisage completing a privatisation during 1996.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) how many of its financial targets HMSO has met since 1980; [3212]

(2) if HMSO has been self-financing since 1980. [3213]

Mr. Freeman: As a trading fund, HMSO is required to cover all its costs with income from activities, and to make a small annual surplus. It has broken even every year, and achieved the target surplus on all except two occasions—1991 and 1994—since 1980.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many people are employed in HMSO. [3211]

Mr. Freeman: The total number including casual staff on 1 November 1995 was 2,898.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what (a) representations and (b) requests for a meeting he has received from trade unions representing employees in HMSO with respect to the possible privatisation of that agency; and what response he has given. [3215]

Mr. Freeman: I and my colleagues have so far received one letter on the possible privatisation of HMSO from the Graphical, Paper and Media Union, and one from the HMSO trade union side, and have responded to the points each raised. I have received no requests for a meeting. However, I met local trade union representatives at my own request during a visit to HMSO's Norwich headquarters in September.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many times he has met the chief executive of HMSO to discuss proposals for the privatisation of the agency. [3214]

Mr. Freeman: Five times.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has received from organisations or groups interested in bidding for the contract to run a privatised HMSO. [3216]

Mr. Freeman: Around 60 potential purchasers of HMSO have so far contacted me or my advisers. Their identities must remain confidential for the time being for commercial reasons.

HEALTH

Breastfeeding

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list breastfeeding rates in England for each year since 1985; and if he will make a statement on his Department's policy with regard to the encouragement of breast feeding. [2531]

Mr. Horam: Breastfeeding rates are surveyed every five years. Survey results for 1985 and 1990 are comparable. The Government continue to protect and promote breastfeeding as the best way of feeding a baby. Information on breastfeeding rates for 1985 and 1990 are available in "Infant Feeding 1990", copies of which are available in the Library.

Clinical Psychologists

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, how many vacant posts for clinical psychologists there were in English NHS trusts in each region on (a) 1 April 1994 and (b) at the latest date for which figures are available. [543]

Mr. Malone: The table shows the number of vacancies for clinical psychologists in English national health service trusts by region at 31 March 1994 and 31 March 1995.

The figures shown for the two years are not comparable because 1995 figures include data from about 80 fourth wave trusts which were directly managed units in 1994.

The vacancy rate as a percentage of the funded establishment in all trusts in 1994 was 15.2 per cent. In 1995 it was 15.5 per cent.

The figures supplied are for advertised vacant posts.

NHS Finance

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will provide an analysis of capital expenditure compared to cash limit allocation for (a) trusts in each region and (b) regions in each of the last three years. [2400]

Mr. Horam: The available information is shown in the tables. "Allocations to RHAs" represent the final capital cash limits for the year. Trusts do not have cash limits; their equivalent control is external financing limits, but these cover both revenue and capital expenditure. The figures provided for trust "Capital Allocations" in the tables therefore represent initial planned capital allocations for the year concerned. In each case, capital expenditure covers capital additions, which include assets purchases by, and donated to, authorities and trusts, as shown in their accounts. Expenditure also includes assets purchased with the proceeds from land sales which are not included in allocations.

Information is now available for 1994–95, and provisional figures from the summarised accounts for capital expenditure for that year are also included.

1. Capital allocations for RHAs are final cash limits which include in year adjustments made to the original cash limits. The transfer of capital cash limit and capital receipts to Trust external financing limits by some RHAs resulted in negative final cash limit figures.
2. Capital allocations for trusts are capital planning totals.
3. The 1994–95 capital expenditure figures are unaudited and therefore provisional.
4. Capital expenditure represents capital additions, as shown in annual accounts, which includes assets purchased by, and assets donated to, authorities/trusts.
5. Changes were made to the definition of capital spending in 1993–94. Some items of expenditure formerly treated as capital are now treated as revenue.
6. RHAs were restructured in 1994–95.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many national health service trusts have borrowed money from commercial sources; and if he will list the sums involved. [3249]

Mr. Horam: Information on national health service trusts' borrowing from commercial sources during the year is not available centrally.

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is (a) the current capital value of the Princess Margaret hospital, Swindon, (b) the capital value of the proposed new hospital, (c) the cost of refurbishment and rebuild, (d) the length of the lease from the private financiers with the NHS, (e) the annual cost of the lease to the NHS for each year of the duration, (f) the cost to the NHS of preparing the bid and (g) the projected time to rebuild the hospital; [3765]

(2) what is (a) the current capital value of the Bishop Auckland hospital, (b) the capital value of the proposed new hospital, (c) the cost of refurbishment and rebuild, (d) the length of the lease from the private financiers with the NHS, (e) the annual cost of the lease to the NHS for each year of the lease, (f) the cost to the NHS of preparing the bid and (g) the projected time to rebuild the hospital; [3761]

(3) what is (a) the current capital value of the Wycombe and Amersham general hospital, (b) the capital value of the proposed new hospital when completed, (c) the cost of refurbishment and rebuild, (d) the length of the lease from the private financiers with the NHS, (e) the annual cost of the lease to the NHS for each year of the lease, (f) the cost to the NHS of preparing the bid and (g) the projected time to rebuild the hospital. [3752]

Mr. Horam: The capital value of individual hospitals and the costs of preparing individual business cases are not available centrally. The other information requested is a matter for negotiation between the individual trusts and the private sector consortia bidding for the developments.

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will publish information on health authority costs and NHS trust management costs. [4461]

Mr. Dorrell: I shall tomorrow publish "Health Authority Costs" setting out actual spending on running each district health authority and family health services authority for 1994–95 together with plans for 1995–96 and the planned spending for the new health authorities in 1996–97. I shall also publish "National Health Service Trusts Management Costs 1994–95" setting out spending on management for each NHS trust for 1994–95.

Copies of the documents will be placed in the Library.

Methionine

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what plans he has to introduce legislation to require methionine to be added to paracetamol products; [3136]

(2) what assessment he has made of the benefits of adding methionine to paracetamol products. [3135]

Mr. Malone: There are no plans to make the inclusion of methionine in paracetamol-containing medicines mandatory.

Methionine is sometimes given by mouth to treat paracetamol overdose. It is not possible to assess directly the benefits of adding methionine to paracetamol products. It is believed that methionine may have a protective effect on the liver in paracetamol overdose, but clinical trials to establish this would be unethical. At the recommended doses the addition of methionine provides no benefit.

Prescriptions

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much was received in prescription charges in respect of prescriptions where the cost of the drugs to the NHS was less than the prescription charge in each year since 1989. [3121]

Mr. Malone: The estimated amounts received in 1993–94 and 1994–95 were £86 million or 32.5 per cent. and £111 million or 38.7 per cent. respectively. Information is not available for earlier years.

These figures take no account of income received from prepayment certificates or prescriptions dispensed by dispensing doctors.

Osteoporosis

Mr. Pope: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what progress has been made towards establishing national clinical guidelines for the prevention of osteoporosis; and if he will make a statement; [2861]

(2) in what percentage of hip fractures experienced by women osteoporosis has been identified as a contributing factor; and if he will make a statement; [2864]

(3) what research is being conducted by his Department into the prevention of osteoporosis; and if he will make a statement; [2865]

(4) what measures have been taken since 1994 at a local and national level to educate the public and health professionals about the prevention of osteoporosis; and if he will make a statement. [2866]

Mr. Horam: It is likely that osteoporosis is a contributing factor in most hip fractures, of which about 80 per cent. are suffered by women. Our concern about these and other effects of osteoporosis caused us to set up the advisory group on osteoporosis, whose report was published in January 1995. The Department is currently working to implement its recommendations.

It is the responsibility of professional bodies to develop clinical guidelines where a need has been identified. Discussions have begun the Department and the relevant medical royal colleges with a view to their developing guidelines for osteoporosis, in response to one of the recommendations of the advisory group. The Department has this year significantly increased its financial support to the National Osteoporosis Society, which does a great deal at both national and local levels to educate the public and health professionals about the disease.

The Department is funding a study into the cost-effectiveness of hormone replacement therapy, including the benefits of using it for the prevention of osteoporosis. The Medical Research Council, which receives its grant in aid from my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, also funds a significant amount of research on osteoporosis. We are discussing with the Medical Research Council what further work should be undertaken.

Departmental Targets

Ms Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the published recommended response time within which his Department is expected to reply to letters from the public. [2995]

Mr. Horam: "Access to Information: a guide for the public" states that the Department aims to respond to letters requesting information under the open government code of practice within 20 working days of receipt.

Breast Cancer Screening

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to ensure that all women aged over 65 years will be offered breast cancer screening in the same way as women aged 50 to 64 years. [3137]

Mr. Horam: The Government announced proposals on 18 October for pilot schemes in Northern and Yorkshire, and South Thames regions to evaluate the effectiveness of extending the call/recall breast screening programme to women up to the age of 69. These schemes will run for three years to enable an assessment of the likely uptake, effect on work load, and effectiveness in terms of cancers detected. We will base any changes to our policy on the evidence emerging from these studies.

Women over 65 can continue to have three-yearly breast screening free of charge if they request it. This facility has been well publicised in leaflets available in general practitioner surgeries and clinics as well as in breast screening centres.

NHS Trust Directors

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the compensation given to directors of trusts for loss of office in each financial year since 1991–92 (a) in total and (b) by each trust. [3113]

Mr. Malone: This information is not available centrally.

Capital Projects

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list in order of priority capital projects in the NHS which he plans to undertake. [3430]

Mr. Horam: No such list is compiled centrally. Programming of capital developments is devolved to national health service executive regional offices and is ultimately determined at local level by the decisions of local purchasers and providers.

Infertility Treatment

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many health authorities provide in vitro fertilisation treatment free within the national health service system. [3185]

Mr. Horam: This information is not available centrally.

Information on the services available under the national health service for the treatment of infertility is contained in "The Effective Health Care Bulletin", "The Management of Subfertility", August 1992, published for the NHS management executive by a consortium of Leeds and York universities and the research unit of the Royal College of Physicians. Copies of the bulletin are available in the Library.

Local health authorities are responsible for the provision of local health services, including the provision of infertility services. Decisions about the resources available for these services must be left to individual health authorities as they are in the best position to determine priorities in the light of local needs and circumstances.

In-patient Episodes

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the average length of in-patient hospital stay for each specialty in each year since 1989–90. [3250]

Mr. Horam: Mean duration of stay by specialty is published annually in volume 1 of "Hospital Episode Statistics", copies of which are available in the Library.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the average throughput of patients per hospital bed in each major specialty in each year since 1989–90; and what was the percentage change over the entire period. [3251]

Mr. Horam: The information is not available in the form requested. Information on average throughput by sector groups is published annually in the "Statistical Bulletin—NHS Hospital Activity Statistics: England", copies of which are available in the Library.

Market Testing (Clinical Services)

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his Department's press release 95/532, dated 21 November 1995, concerning his speech on that day to the Royal College of Physicians, if he will identify the NHS trusts which have explored local arrangements for private sector provision of clinical services; and if he will list the clinical service or services considered for private sector provision by each of those trusts. [3474]

Mr. Horam: A table will be placed in the Library listing the trusts that are recorded on the national health service executive's market-testing database as having market-tested one or more of their clinical services together with details of the outcome.

Out-patient Attendances

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the total number of out-patient attendances in each of the last five years. [3763]

Mr. Horam: Information on out-patient attendances is published annually in "Outpatients and ward attenders, England", copies of which are available in the Library.

Hospital Beds

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total number of NHS beds in the last five years. [3769]

Mr. Horam: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville) gave to her on 28 November 1995, Official Report, column 604.

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the number of private pay beds in the NHS in each of the last five years. [3768]

Mr. Malone: This information has not been collected centrally since 1990–91 when there were 2,956 pay beds. Laing's "Review of Private Healthcare", copies of which are available in the Library, provides estimates for subsequent years.

National Blood Service

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what types of blood products are currently sold by the blood transfusion service outside the United Kingdom; and what is the total value of these contracts every year. [3770]

Mr. Horam: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville) gave to the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) on 2 November 1995, Official Report, column 455. The value of these exports has never exceeded £5 million in any one year.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what factors led to the difference between the figures for the National Blood Authority budget for the national blood service quoted in "Plans for the future of the National Blood Service", dated November 1995, and in the National Blood Authority consultation document of August 1994; and if he will make a statement. [3675]

Mr. Horam: The figure of £135 million contained in the consultation document is based on actual expenditure in the blood service for the year 1992–93. The figure of £154 million in the November 1995 document is a cost forecast for the current financial year. The difference reflects an average annual increase in the amount of blood supplied of 4 per cent. and a general increase in the level of provision of other services to hospitals.

NHS Pensioners Trust

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the management costs of the national health service benevolent fund. [3840]

Mr. Malone: Further to my answer of 19 June 1995, Official Report, column 38, I now wish to clarify the situation. The parliamentary question tabled in June asked for details of the benevolent fund. It was impossible to identify the body on the basis of the information given. Further information was sought but none was provided. We now have full information which indicates that the question related to the national health service pensioners trust. The trust was formally established in 1990. It is managed independently by its trustees and any action regarding the management costs of the trust is the responsibility of those trustees.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list all NHS trusts (a) as of 30 November 1995 and (b) with effect from 1 April 1996. [4064]

Mr. Malone: A list of all national health service trusts as at 30 November 1995 will be placed in the Library. No decision has yet been made on any trust applications for 1 April 1996.

EU Health Council

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Health Council held on 30 November, giving details of all votes and all decisions which were determined by unanimity or without dissension. [1972]

Mr. Bowis: The Health Council agreed a common position on a proposal from the European Commission for a programme of action within the field of public health on combating drug dependency. The Council agreed six resolutions, two in response to reports from the Commission—on the integration of health protection requirements into other Community policies, and on the state of health in the European Community—and four which invited the Commission to produce a study on an area of interest to the Health Council concerning orphan drugs, the mutual recognition of prescriptions, generic medicinal products and medicinal plant preparations. The Council also discussed a modified version proposal on tobacco advertising put forward by the presidency but reached no decision on it. The matters on which decisions were taken were agreed by all member states with no abstentions or votes against.

NHS Reforms

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his estimate of the income that has become available to the private sector as a result of NHS reforms. [2272]

Mr. Malone: This information is not available centrally.

Legionnaire's Disease

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when his Department was first notified of an outbreak of legionnaire's disease at Kusadasi, Turkey, in 1995; what action was taken and at what time to advise travel agencies operating in the United Kingdom about the outbreak; and what advice has been issued to United Kingdom travellers to Kusadasi, Turkey, since May 1995 about the outbreak of legionnaire's disease associated with the Hotel Imbat. [3273]

Mr. Horam: The Department of Health was informed of five possibly related cases of legionnaire's disease which were known to have occurred in travellers returning from Kusadasi on 16 August and of a sixth case on 21 August 1995. The Turkish authorities were informed, via the British embassy in Turkey, of all cases as they became known. The consular department of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Association of British Travel Agents were informed on 23 August. The Federation of Tour Operators was informed of further cases on 29 September 1995. A notice to travellers was issued on the Prestel database on 23 August and updated on 29 September.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action was taken to alert medical agencies in the United Kingdom about an outbreak of legionnaire's disease in Kusadasi, Turkey. [3274]

Mr. Horam: Public health doctors were alerted about cases of legionnaire's disease in travellers returning from Kusadasi, Turkey via the Epinet electronic message system on 23 August and through the public health laboratory service communicable disease reports of 15 September and 6 October.

Patient Records

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to introduce measures.

including specific criminal offences, to prevent the obtaining of particulars of patient records from general practitioners other than in circumstances of clinical need; and if he will make a statement. [3356]

Mr. Horam: Patient confidentiality is already protected by a number of legislative measures. The General Medical Council re-emphasised the importance of confidentiality in guidance to the profession earlier this year. We shall shortly be issuing guidance to the national health service as a whole on the protection and use of patient information.

Community Care Services

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 27 November 1995, Official Report, column 523, on community care services, what relevant information is held by his Department. [3618]

Mr. Bowis: Information is collected on expenditure on the community health programme on a provider basis. Information about purchaser expenditure on board service groupings, including community health services, will be available at the end of 1995–96.

Tiffield Secure Unit

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the capital and revenue costs of proposals with regard to the Tiffield secure unit. [3625]

Mr. Bowis: The capital cost of the new children's secure unit at Tiffield is £4,308,379. A grant to cover this cost has been made available to Northamptonshire county council. The county council is responsible for all revenue cost matters.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proposals he has (a) to place in the Library or (b) to place in the nearest public libraries to the development affected, the principal components of the agreements signed between NHS provider units and private sector facilities management and design and build consortia under the private finance initiative. [3733]

Mr. Horam: The private finance initiative will further develop our excellent record of co-operation with the private sector and ensure new national health service capital schemes are provided promptly and run efficiently, for the benefit of all NHS patients. Before any PFI scheme with significant expenditure consequences for the NHS is approved, a business case is produced to demonstrate the cost-effectiveness of the proposal and assess the public spending implications. Approval to PFI schemes is only given only if the business case demonstrates that a PFI approach increases the cost-effectiveness of the scheme for the NHS and if any expenditure implications are affordable to NHS purchasers. NHS trusts and health authorities are accountable to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health, who is accountable to Parliament. He is supported by an accounting officer who has to answer to the Public Accounts Committee of the House of Commons. The Audit Commission, which we invited into the NHS in 1990, carries out independent financial audits in every NHS trust and health authority and it sends to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State any report that is causing it particular concern. Since we are satisfied that all of this process protects the interests of the NHS and patients and taxpayers, I do not propose to place the commercial contracts in Libraries.

Clinical Negligence

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish figures on clinical negligence settlements for each of the last four years (a) by region, (b) by district and (c) by trust indicating (i) their number and (iii) their cost. [2419]

Mr. Malone [holding answer 24 November 1995]: Information is no longer collected centrally about the numbers of clinical negligence claims settled, nor is any information held about claims settled by districts. However, I am able to give details of the costs of clinical negligence claims by trust, and this will be placed in the Library.

For information by region, I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 6 March 1995, Official Report, columns 40-42, which contains the most current data available.

Medicine Prices

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received calling for the abolition of the retail price maintenance scheme for medicines. [3017]

Mr. Malone [holding answer 27 November 1995]: None.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received that patients purchasing medicines are being disadvantaged through the higher prices required by resale price maintenance of medicines. [3014]

Mr. Malone [holding answer 27 November 1995]: None.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

National Grid

Mr. Burden: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the impact of the promised rebate to domestic consumers, arising from the sale of the national grid, on the collection of the fossil fuel levy; and if any rebate will be leviable. [3390]

Mr. Eggar: The rebate is expected to take the form of a discount in the first quarter of 1996 with a consequent effect on the fossil fuel levy collected in that quarter.

Gas Pipeline (Zeebrugge-Bacton)

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement with regard to the implications for United Kingdom energy reserves of the proposed construction of a gas pipeline from Zeebrugge to Bacton, Norfolk. [3484]

Mr. Eggar: The Department considers the proposed gas pipeline from Bacton to Zeebrugge to be an important strategic project that will ensure the continued development of our oil and gas resources.

Natural Gas Reserves

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the United Kingdom's current reserves of natural gas; and what is the rate of consumption through (a) domestic supply and (b) exports. [3483]

Mr. Eggar: Estimates of the United Kingdom's remaining recoverable reserves of gas are given in my Department's energy report 1995, volume 2, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. The report shows that discovered reserves could yield 1,915 billion cu m of gas. Allowing for the full potential from as yet undrilled structures could raise this to 3,815 billion cu m.

In 1994, some 63.5 billion cu m were produced for United Kingdom supply and 0.9 billion cu m were exported.

Late Payment

Mr. Day: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans there are to review the case for a statutory right to interest in June 1996 in accordance with the commitment made in the White Paper of June 1994. [3553]

Mr. Page: The incidence of late payment and the need for new measures to address the problem are subject to on-going investigation. A number of measures were put in place following the publication of "Competitiveness—Helping Business to Win" in May 1994 and the effect of these will need to be evaluated. Any decision to review the case for a statutory right to interest will be dependent on these considerations and will be announced by June 1996.

Beaufort's Dyke

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on what date in 1981 a United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority shipment destined for Rockall Deep in 1981 was diverted to Beaufort's dyke; what was the reason for the diversion; and if he will list the full contents of that shipment. [3552]

Mr. Page: In November 1981, the MV Gem left Bromborough bound for the Rockall Deep. It was intended to test a new mechanism for handling drums of the type used for sea disposal of radioactive waste. However, due to severe weather it was necessary to carry out the tests at an alternative approved site at Beaufort's dyke.

The tests involved the dumping of a small batch of dummy drums containing only solid concrete. Beaufort's dyke was not used for the disposal of radioactive waste.

Scott Inquiry

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the estimated cost to date of the Scott inquiry. [1890]

Mr. Lang: The direct cost to date of the Scott inquiry is £1.8 million.

Executive Agencies (Overseas Travel)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list for each of his executive agencies for the last financial year in respect of overseas travel by staff of the agency (a) the cost, (b) the countries visited and (c) the posts held by the staff involved. [2358]

Mr. Lang: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the chief executives of the agencies for which my Department is or has been responsible. I have therefore asked Mr. David Durham of Companies House, Mr. Peter Joyce of the Insolvency Service, Dr. Richard Worswick of the Laboratory of the Government Chemist, Dr. Peter Clapham, acting chief executive for the National Engineering and National Physical Laboratories, which ceased to be agencies earlier this year, Dr. Seton Bennet of the National Weights and Measures Laboratory, Mr. Paul Hartnack of the Patent Office and Mr. Jim Norton of the Radiocommunications Agency to arrange for replies to be given. My Department's Accounts Services Agency has also ceased to be an executive agency. Its financial and management accounting functions did not necessitate overseas travel.

Letter from R. D. Worswick to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 29 November 1995:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply to you about overseas travel by staff of the Laboratory of the Government Chemist (LGC).

In financial year 1994/95 just over £99,000 was spent on overseas travel (air fares, hotel bills and subsistence); of this £56,000 was for travel to EU countries and £43,000 for travel outside the EU.

Visits were made to Austria, Belgium, Canada, China, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Holland, Hong Kong, Hungary, Italy, Mexico, Norway, Portugal, South Africa, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Thailand, and the USA. These visits were made in order to fulfil customer contracts.

The staff involved were within the Civil Service grades Scientific Officer to Grade 3, with the bulk of the trips made by staff in Grades 5, 6, 7 and Senior Scientific Officer.

Letter from Peter Joyce to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 30 November 1995:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply to your Question about overseas travel by staff in The Insolvency Service during 1994/95.

The total cost of overseas travel for 1994/95 was £9,050: the countries visited were Austria, Belgium Canada, France and Spain: and those visits were made by myself, a grade 4, a grade 5, and insolvency B grade (equivalent grade 7) and an insolvency C grade (equivalent SEO).

Letter from Seton Bennett to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 30 November 1995:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply on behalf of the National Weights and Measures Laboratory (NWML) to your Question about overseas travel by the staff of the Agency.

For NWML, the information you requested is as follows:

(a) The cost of foreign travel by Agency staff in the financial year 1994/95 was £25,692 (some of which was recovered from the European Commission);

(b) The countries visited were Belgium, the Czech Republic, France, Germany, Holland, Italy, Norway, Sweden and Switzerland;

(c) Apart from myself, some 13 different members of staff were involved, who hold a variety of posts in the Agency.

Letter from Peter Clapham to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 30 November 1995:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply to your Question about overseas travel by staff of the National Physical Laboratory (NPL) and the National Engineering Laboratory (NEL) during the last financial year.

As you will be aware, NPL and NEL are no longer executive agencies, both now being operated by private sector management. However, as the last Chief Executive of both laboratories I am pleased to respond to your question.

I should comment that as internationally active research and technical advice laboratories, both NPL and NEL have a wide range of overseas commitments associated with, for example, collaborative projects, international consultancies, conferences and committee work. A significant proportion of staff travel costs is met directly by customers and in some cases these costs are not separately identified in our accounts. However, the approximate totals for overseas travel and subsistence in 1994/95 were £520,000 and £130,000 for the NPL and NEL respectively.

As you might expect from the extent of both laboratories' activities, the countries visited and the grades of staff involved are very wide ranging and it would not be practicable to provide you with a breakdown. However, if you have some specific queries I should be happy to do my best to elicit the information for you.

Letter from Jim Norton to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 29 November 1995:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply to your Question about overseas travel by staff of the Agency.

The Radiocommunications Agency has a major international role. It represents UK-wide interests in many international fora at the European and global levels. These activities all relate to the effective management of the radio frequency spectrum and include the harmonisation of frequency usage, the development of radio regulatory regimes, and the adoption of international standards for radiocommunications equipment. The interests we represent include the Agency's customers who use the radio spectrum, other government departments, manufacturers, operators and service providers. In some fora we also represent the interests of the UK's dependant territories.

With the agreement of ministers, we play an active and constructive role in the relevant fora and, particularly in Europe, we play a leading role by holding chairmanships and making substantive contributions to the development of international agreements.

For the financial year 1994/95, the Agency spent a total of £538,202 on overseas travel including subsistence. In keeping with the Agency's net running cost regime, all of this expenditure was recovered through licence fees and other income.

This expenditure involved extensive travel throughout Europe, some visits to the Americas and occasional visits to other parts of the world. The staff involved ranged from the Chief Executive to junior administrative staff (in support of large delegations to world treaty-making conferences). A detailed breakdown of countries visited and staff levels involved could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

I hope that this information is of interest.

Letter from David Durham to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 30 December 1995:

The President of the Board of Trade, the Rt Hon Ian Lang MP, has asked me to reply to your Question about overseas travel by staff of Companies House Executive Agency during the last financial year.

The information you sought is as follows:

(a) Cost: £12,000

(b) Countries Visited: Anguilla, USA, Eire, Belgium and France

(c) Posts held by staff involved: Chief Executive, senior and middle management grades.

I should explain that in the case of Anguilla, the net cost to Companies House will be nil, because the visit was in connection with consultancy advice we provided to certain overseas administrations, for which we are reimbursed.

I hope this information fully answers your question.

Letter from P. R. S. Hartnack to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 December 1995:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply to your question about overseas travel by Patent Office staff in 1994/95.

As can be seen the bulk of overseas travel by Patent Office staff was to Belgium, Germany, Spain and Switzerland. These countries are respectively the seats of the European Commission, the European Patent Office, the EC Office for Harmonisation in the Internal Market (which deals with trade marks) and the World Intellectual Property Organisation.

British Coal Enterprise

Mr. Tipping: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list those companies that have prequalified as potential buyers for British Coal Enterprise. [3384]

Mr. Page [holding answer 30 November 1995]: The sale of British Coal Enterprise is a matter for British Coal. Details of the pre-qualifiers are commercially confidential and are not being released by British Coal, but I understand that there has been a very positive interest in purchasing BCE or its various activities.

Small Firms

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what discussions his Department has had with the British Standards Institution regarding a British standard for small firms. [3692]

Mr. Page: This Department has had no discussions with the British Standards Institution regarding a British standard for small firms. As I stated in my reply on 22 November 1995, Official Report, column 209, there are no plans to introduce a British standard for small firms.

Public Service Contracts

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what powers he has to intervene when there is evidence of anti-competitive activity by local authorities in the award of contracts for public services; [3778]

(2) how many councils have been investigated by the Office of Fair Trading for favouring their in-house supplier over external contractors bidding for work under CCT; and if he will list them. [3779]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Under legislation governing local authorities, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment is responsible for investigating behaviour by local authorities in connection with compulsory competitive tendering for contracts for public services.

Cycle Imports

Mr. Simpson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many cycles were imported from (a) China and (b) south-east Asia as a whole in each of the last five years; what has been the allotted quota for each of these years; and by what month in the year the quota was exceeded. [2440]

Mr. Oppenheim: The figures for imports of bicycles from China and south-east Asia for 1990 to 1994 are given in table 1. There are no import quotas for bicycles. However, a "ceiling" on duty-free imports of bicycles into the EC under the previous generalised system of preferences scheme was introduced in 1991. When a ceiling was reached, full import duty could be reimposed at the request of a member state. Duty was reimposed on imports of bicycles from a number of countries in south-east Asia at various points—in some instances, at the request of the United Kingdom. Details of ceilings and duty reimpositions under the GSP scheme are provided in table 2. A revised EC GSP scheme introduced from 1 January this year contains no limits on the amount of a product that could be imported under it. Instead, a fixed rate of reduced duty is applied to sensitive products. In the case of bicycles this is set at 70 per cent. of the full duty.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the latest assessment he has made of the probability of BSE entering the human food chain. [1993]

Mrs. Browning: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) on 28 November 1995, Official Report, columns 530–31.

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures are currently in place to prevent cattle infected with BSE from entering the food chain. [2668]

Mrs. Browning: The following measures are in place to prevent issue from cattle infected with BSE from entering the food chain:

(i) BSE is a notifiable disease;

(ii) all cattle suspected to be suffering from BSE are killed and their carcases incinerated;

(iii) all cattle receive an ante mortem inspection at the slaughterhouse. Any that display signs of BSE are killed and the carcases incinerated; and

(iv) cattle which are incubating BSE but are not yet showing clinical signs cannot be identified. All cattle are therefore assumed to be potentially infected, and the tissue in which infectivity may be present are removed and cannot be used in human food or animal feed. The tissues are the so called specified bovine offals—brain, spinal cord, spleen and tonsils of cattle over six months of age and the thymus and intestines of all cattle.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food also announced new measures to control the use of bovine vertebral columns in the making of mechanically recovered meat—MRM—in an answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) on 28 November, Official Report, columns 530–531.

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many farmers have been prosecuted to date for falsifying documents relating to BSE in cattle. [2670]

Mrs. Browning: Farmers' declarations that cattle have not resided on a holding in which a case of BSE has been confirmed during the previous six years, or that individual animals are less than two and a half years of age, are required for export purposes. They do not form part of our comprehensive system for the protection of the consumer in this country.

Responsibility for enforcement and prosecution in relation to these declarations rests with local authorities. Although the Department is often kept informed at local level, we do not keep central records of such prosecutions and information on total numbers could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Executive Agencies (Overseas Travel)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list for each of his executive agencies for the last financial year in respect of overseas travel by agency staff (a) the costs of the travel, (b) the countries visited and (c) the posts held by the staff concerned. [2287]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Responsibility for this matter is delegated to agency chief executives and I have asked them to reply to the hon. Member direct.

Letter from George Trevelyan to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 December 1995:

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has asked me to reply to your question about overseas travel made by staff in this Agency for the last financial year as this matter is within my operational responsibility.

The total cost of overseas travel between 1 April 1994 to 31 March 1995 was £77,986.

Countries visited by Agency managers were Belgium, Denmark, Eire, France, Greece, Germany, Holland, Italy, Norway, Switzerland and the United States.

In all, 62 managers were involved with official business visits and a number of these visited several of the countries concerned over the year. These include the Agency's Finance Director, Chief Accountant, Finance Policy Adviser, Finance Group Managers, Finance Managers, the Head of Information Systems, Group Manager Business Systems, Group Manager IT Development, Information Systems Contracts and Procurement Manager, Computer Services Senior Accounts Manager, Internal Market Director, Head of Internal Market Operations, Internal Market Group Manager, Scheme Managers, Technical Services Managers, Deputy Technical Services Manager, Procurement Manager, Head of External Operations, Group Managers External Operations, External Operations Scheme Managers, Group Manager Anti-Fraud Unit and Anti-Fraud Unit Scrutineers.

Letter from Phillip Needham to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 December 1995:

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has asked me to reply on behalf of this Agency to your Parliamentary Question number 62. In this you sought details for this Agency, for the last financial year, for a) the cost of travel, b) the countries visited and c) the post held by the staff concerned in respect of overseas travel.(2287)

ADAS was formed as an Executive Agency in April 1992 and is jointly owned by MAFF and the Welsh Office. It undertakes a broad range of consultancy and R&D work for commercial customers as well as government.

In recent years, ADAS has been heavily involved in overseas work mostly in Central and Eastern Europe. The majority of work concentrates on consultancy to the emerging governments in matters related to re-structuring of agriculture and food production. Approximately £1.4 million of ADAS income derives from this source. The Agency incurs approximately £200,000 per annum in travelling expenses. These are relating to visits made by ADAS in order to secure future business, visits made to deliver consultancy services and visits to International conferences where these are required to update the professional knowledge of ADAS staff.

Letter from Johnston McNeill to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 December 1995:

As Chief Executive of the Meat Hygiene Service (MHS), I have been asked to respond to your question regarding overseas travel with respect to this Agency.

As you may know, the MHS was established as an Executive Agency of MAFF on 1 April this year. Since that time there has been no overseas travel by any member of staff.

Letter from G. K. Bruce to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 December 1995:

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, has asked me to reply, in respect of the Pesticides Safety Directorate (PSD), to your question about overseas travel.

During the 1994/95 financial year the cost of overseas travel undertaken by PSD staff totalled £42,339. Details of the countries visited and the posts held by the officers concerned could only be provided at disproportionate cost but the greater part of this expenditure relates to attendance at meetings in Brussels.

Letter from J. M. Rutter to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 December 1995:

The Minister has asked me to reply to your question about the costs of overseas travel by staff of the Veterinary Medicines Directorate, the countries visited, and the posts held by the staff concerned, as these are operational matters for which I am responsible.

The cost of overseas travel, including subsistence, in 1994/95 was £126,863.82. Full details of the countries visited and the posts held by the staff involved could only be provided at disproportionate cost. The main element of overseas travel however, was by immunological inspectors (Grade 7 equivalent) in the VMD, carrying out inspections of manufacturing premises for immunological veterinary medicines in Australia, New Zealand, Canada, the USA and in Europe, and by staff, mainly at Grade 7 level and above, attending meetings of scientific, Commission and Council working groups in Brussels. In both cases, all or part of the travel costs is recovered from the companies involved or from the Commission.

Letter from T. W. A. Little to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 December 1995:

The Minister has asked me to reply to your question on overseas travel by staff in the Veterinary Laboratories Agency (known as the Central Veterinary Laboratory until 30 September 1995).

In the last financial year, overseas travel costs in the Central Veterinary Laboratory amounted to £40,008. Due to internal management restructuring we have only been tracking the costs from the beginning of this financial year and, consequently, are not able to provide any further breakdown. However, the posts held by staff and the countries visited will be varied as we consider overseas travel, for the purpose of attending conferences and presenting papers, an essential component of the scientific development of staff.

Letter from Professor P. I. Stanley to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 December 1995:

You asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to provide information for each of his executive agencies relating to overseas travel by agency staff in the last financial year. The Minister has asked me to reply to you in respect of his Central Science Laboratory (CSL) Agency as this is an operational matter for which I am responsible.

(a) The total cost of overseas travel was £175,779.

(b) Countries visited were: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Chile, Czech Republic, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Holland, Hong Kong, Hungary, Iceland, India, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Japan, Malaysia, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Poland, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, USA.

(c) The posts held by staff concerned were 109 scientific and 3 administrative. The main purpose of overseas travel was either to present scientific papers at conferences or to represent the UK in EU meetings.

Early Retirement (Farmers)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many representations he has received over the past three years on the subject of initiating an early retirement scheme for farmers; what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated into the likely benefits of this to the tenanted sector; and if he will make a statement. [2526]

Mr. Boswell: In the past three years, the Department has answered four parliamentary questions and 28 Ministers' correspondence on the subject of an early retirement scheme for farmers. Council regulation 2079/92 permits member states to provide early retirement pensions to farmers aged between 55 and normal retirement age who release their land for amalgamation with other holdings or for non-agricultural use. This option has not been taken upon the United Kingdom because we take the view that its terms are not appropriate to the conditions of agriculture here. For that reason, we have not commissioned any research on early retirement for farmers nor evaluated the likely impact on the tenanted sector.

Executive Agencies (Meetings)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what record he keeps of the number and dates of meetings he has with the heads of agencies which report to him. [3081]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My office holds a record of all my meetings. Those with the heads of agencies which report to me form a part of that record. They are not singled out in any special way.

Arable Areas (Checks)

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will commission a survey of arable areas throughout the European Union by the Western European Union satellite centre to facilitate a scientific comparison between the arrangements made by member states to secure compliance with common agricultural policy regulations including set-aside areas. [3259]

Mr. Baldry: No. Most EU member states carry out remote sensing checks on arable areas including set-aside land, using satellite imagery or aerial photography as part of an EC Commission co-financed programme. Discrepancies found are followed up by individual member states and results monitored by the EC Commission. These measures, together with those applied by all member states under the integrated administration control system, are designed to ensure compliance with CAP regulations.

Sheep and Beef Support Schemes

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much money was spent on (a) hill livestock compensatory allowances, (b) suckler cow premiums, (c) sheep annual premiums and (d) beef special premiums in each country of the United Kingdom in 1994–95. [3221]

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 30 November 1995]: In 1994–95 £31.3 million[1] was spent on hill livestock compensatory allowances, £64.7 million was spent on suckler cow premium, including extensification premium; £163.7 million was spent on sheep annual premium, including Less-favoured area supplement, and £81.1 million was spent on beef special premium, including extensification premium, in England. Expenditure on these schemes in the other parts of the United Kingdom is a matter for the Secretaries of State for Scotland, for Wales and for Northern Ireland.

[1] This includes expenditure carried forward from the previous financial year.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much money will be spent on (a) the hill livestock compensatory allowances, (b) suckler cow premiums, (c) sheep annual premiums and (d) beef special premiums in each country of the United Kingdom in 1995–96. [3222]

Mr. Hogg [holding answer 30 November 1995]: In 1995–96, we estimate that £27.6 million will be spent on hill livestock compensatory allowances; £83 million will be spent on suckler cow premium, including extensification premium; £182 million will be spent on sheep annual premium, including LFA supplement, and £129.2 million will be spent on beef special premium, including extensification premium, in England. Expenditure under these schemes in the other parts of the United Kingdom is a matter for the Secretaries of State for Scotland, for Wales and for Northern Ireland.

European Funding (North Yorkshire)

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much matching funding his Department has provided for European agricultural guarantee and guidance projects in (a) 1994–95 and (b) 1995–96 within the north Yorkshire area; and if he will provide a breakdown based on (i) parliamentary constituency and (ii) local authority. [3744]

Mr. Baldry: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him on 19 October, Official Report, column 323. A breakdown of this information by parliamentary constituency and local authority can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Investor in People Status

Mr. Byers: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps his Department is taking to achieve investor in people status; when they started the process; when they expect to achieve investor in people status; and if he will make a statement. [2971]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 30 November 1995]: The Department is committed in principle to pursuing the investor in people standard. The Ministry's information technology directorate achieved the standard at the end of 1993; the regional organisation recently carried out a diagnostic survey and is now evaluating the results; and the rest of the core Department is preparing to follow suit by assembling the various elements that are required in order to attain investor in people status.

Overgrazing

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many farmers had their payments withdrawn as a result of overgrazing in each country of the United Kingdom in (a) 1994–95 and (b) 1995–96 to the latest available date. [3223]

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 30 November 1995]: In England, four farmers had their hill livestock compensatory allowances withheld in whole or in part in 1994–95 as a result of overgrazing. To date, three farmers have had their hill livestock compensatory allowances withheld in whole or in part as a result of overgrazing in 1995–96. Responsibility for the implementation of overgrazing provisions of the livestock subsidy schemes in other parts of the United Kingdom falls to the Secretaries of State for Scotland, for Wales and for Northern Ireland.

Moorland Scheme

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many lectures have been entered into the moorland scheme in each region of the United Kingdom to which the scheme applies. [3225]

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 30 November 1995]: In England, 4048.63 hectares of heather moorland grazing have been entered into the moorland scheme. Responsibility for schemes to enhance the nature conservation value of moorland in other parts of the United Kingdom falls to the Secretaries of State for Scotland, for Wales and for Northern Ireland.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many farmers have entered their land into the moorland scheme in each region of the United Kingdom to which the scheme applies. [3226]

Mr. Hogg [holding answer 30 November 1995]: In England, 13 farmers have to date signed agreements entering land into the moorland scheme. Responsibility for schemes to enhance the nature conservation value of moorland in other parts of the United Kingdom falls to the Secretaries of State for Scotland, for Wales and for Northern Ireland.

TRANSPORT

MV Derbyshire

Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the results of his assessment of the further work required to be undertaken to identify the cause of the sinking of the MV Derbyshire; and if he will make a statement. [4119]

Sir George Young: I have today published Lord Donaldson's assessment. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House and are available in the Vote Office.

The formal investigation in 1987 into the loss of the Derbyshire decided that

> "... the Derbyshire was probably overwhelmed by the forces of nature in Typhoon Orchid" and added that

> "the evidence available does not support any firmer conclusion".

Following the discovery in June 1994 of the wreckage of the Derbyshire during a search sponsored by the International Transport Workers Federation, my predecessor appointed the right hon. Lord Donaldson of Lymington to undertake an assessment of what further work might be undertaken to seek to determine the actual cause of the loss of the Derbyshire, together with assessments of the costs involved, the likelihood of establishing the cause and the likely benefits to ship safety.

Lord Donaldson has recommended that a second, and final, re-examination of the wreck should be carried out, at a cost which he estimates at around £2 million. He believes there is a compelling case for seeking to establish the cause of the loss, with resulting benefits to ship safety.

I have decided to accept his recommendation. The timing of his re-examination will depend on making the necessary arrangements—drawing up a specification, inviting tenders and selecting a contractor—and will take place as soon as practicable in either spring 1996 or spring 1997. I have raised within the European Commission the possibility of sharing the costs with it, as the potential benefits are not confirmed to British ships and seafarers. The Commission has confirmed its readiness to assist financially.

Lockerbie

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 27 November, Official Report, column 505, what considerations led him not to place all documents currently held by his Department relating to the destruction of Pan Am 103 over Lockerbie, seven years ago, in the Library. [3783]

Mr. Norris: It is not my Department's normal practice to release official files other than at the appropriate time under the procedures and criteria set down by the Public Record Office. There are no plans for earlier release of the papers in question, given the classified nature of some of the material and the pending criminal trial.

South Yorkshire Supertram

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what assessment he has made of the financial impact of the sale of South Yorkshire Supertram; [3364]

(2) what will happen to any debts of South Yorkshire Supertram which are not covered by the sale; [3363]

(3) what assessment he has made of the impact on (a) revenue funding, (b) capital funding and (c) capping levels of each council in South Yorkshire of the sale of Supertram. [3362]

Mr. Norris: My Department and South Yorkshire passenger transport executive are currently discussing these issues.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) when he announced the sale of South Yorkshire Supertram; and what steps he will take to advertise the sale; [3361]

(2) if he will list the (a) organisation and (b) individuals which he has engaged to assist with the sale of South Yorkshire Supertram; [3360]

(3) what restrictions will be placed on the bodies able to purchase South Yorkshire Supertram in respect of (a) bus companies and (b) other organisations; [3367]

(4) if the sale of South Yorkshire Supertram will be by competitive tender. [3365]

Mr. Norris: Arrangements for the sale of South Yorkshire Supertram are a matter for South Yorkshire passenger transport executive.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the timetable and process for the sale of South Yorkshire Supertram. [3368]

Mr. Norris: Arrangements for the sale of South Yorkshire Supertram are a matter for South Yorkshire passenger transport executive. It is, however, this Government's policy to privatise public transport operations wherever possible. I therefore look forward to South Yorkshire Supertram being sold at the earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport under what powers he has taken the decision to order the sale of South Yorkshire Supertram. [3366]

Mr. Norris: The Government and South Yorkshire passenger transport executive have always agreed that the operation of South Yorkshire Supertram will be privatised at the earliest opportunity. South Yorkshire passenger transport executive proposed the "build first, sell later" structure for Supertram and has put in place arrangements for privatisation. The director general of the PTE has frequently confirmed to me the PTE's commitment to privatisation.

White Hart Roundabout, Northolt

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will order an inquiry into the time scale adopted by Ealing council in constructing phased traffic lights at the White Hart roundabout, Northolt; and if he will make a statement. [1853]

Mr Norris: No. It would not be appropriate for Ministers to intervene in the timing of this local highway scheme.

A36 (South Newton)

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the work, referred to in his answer of 7 November 1995, Official Report, column 753, will commence on installation of experimental speed limit warning signs on the A36 at South Newton. [3617]

Mr. Norris: Some of the installation work to accommodate the electronic speed limit warning signs has already started. Following the commissioning and testing of the equipment, the trial will be fully operational from 15 December onwards. The highway authority will be monitoring the site for a minimum period of six months.

Pollution

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy to establish freephone numbers to which the public can report excessively smoky and polluting vehicles. [3721]

Mr. Norris: No. I am satisfied that the current reporting procedure for the smoky vehicle hotline explained in the publicity leaflet—copies of which were placed in the library on 27 October—is adequate.

Cycle Tracks

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures have been made in major cities for the provision for cycle tracks; and if he will make a statement. [3514]

Mr. Norris: Cycle facilities such as cycle lanes on the carriageway, cycle tracks away from the road, advanced stop lines at traffic lights and toucan crossings exist in most of our major cities. I hope all local highway authorities will respond positively to our initiatives to encourage cycling.

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many miles of cycle track currently exist in the cities of (a) Birmingham, (b) Manchester, (c) Newcastle, (d) Leeds, (e) Liverpool and (f) Sheffield; and if he will make a statement. [3196]

Mr. Norris: This information is not held centrally. The responsibility for cycle facilities rests with individual local highway authorities.

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he has to extend the existing cycle track network in Sheffield; and if he will make a statement. [3197]

Mr. Norris: Responsibility for providing cycle facilities in Sheffield lies with Sheffield city council as the local highway authority. Proposals for cycle improvements in Sheffield were included in the south Yorkshire package bid, which is currently under consideration. I expect to make an announcement on funding shortly.

Cycling Accidents

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many (a) fatal, (b) injury causing non-fatal and (c) minor accidents were recorded involving cyclists who were (i) minors and (ii) adults on pavements in each of the last five years. [3468]

Mr. Norris: The information requested is not available.

Road Accidents

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what research he has (a) commissioned, (b) published and (c) evaluated from (i) the Transport Research Laboratory and (ii) others on the contribution of sideways spray from lorries and coaches to accidents on motorways. [3429]

Mr. Norris: In 1990 the Transport Research Laboratory undertook a review of the contribution of spray to motorway crashes and followed this with a study in which the police were asked about the contribution of spray when they reported injury accidents on wet motorways or A and M roads.

The study suggested that spray was a contributory cause in about 131 and 552 accidents on motorway and A and M roads in Britain each year. The annual cost of these accidents was estimated to lie between £6,905,010 and £29,095,020, based on the Department of Transport's figure for the average cost of a motorway injury accident.

The reports also discuss results of earlier estimates by the Transport Research Laboratory and others on the contribution of spray to accidents.

British Railways Board (Logo)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to ensure that for the foreseeable future the present logo of the British Railways Board will be continued to be displayed (a) on all buildings, direction signs, maps and publicity literature and (b) in all other ways as currently practised in respect of public rail services. [3342]

Mr. Watts: I intend to continue to use the double arrow symbol in those places where it is used as a road sign at present. Its use as a logo by the British Railways Board and others is a matter for them.

Defective Pavements

Mr. Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will issue guidelines to ensure compensation will be provided for accidents involving faulty paving stones of less than 1in in height. [3332]

Mr. Norris: No. In any claim for compensation for injury allegedly caused by a defective pavement, it is for the courts to decide whether a highway authority's refusal to accept liability is reasonable in the light of the circumstances of the case.

Vehicle Statistics

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the total number of (a) vehicle and (b) passenger miles travelled by (i) motor car, (ii) omnibus and (iii) private coach in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Norris: Passenger and vehicle miles by vehicle type and year are given in the table. Figures for buses and coaches are available only as a single combined category. However, further information on the use of buses run by public service vehicle operators can be found in section 5 of "Transport Statistics Great Britain" 1995 edition, a copy of which can be found in the Library. [3464]

1. Estimates are derived from the traffic series (vehicle miles) and average occupancy rates from the National Travel Survey.

2. Changes are estimated by deflating passenger receipts by the most appropriate price indices available. Because the proxy method has to be used the series gives only a broad guide to trends.

Supplementary Credit Approvals

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will list for (a) Sheffield and (b) all metropolitan boroughs the number and the value of each supplementary credit approval not used within the specified time period for each of the last three years; [3195]

(2) if he will list for (a) Sheffield and (b) all the metropolitan boroughs the time limit specified for each supplementary credit approval granted for each of the last three years; [3194]

(3) if he will list for (a) Sheffield and (b) all the metropolitan boroughs the total value of each supplementary credit approval granted for each of the last three years. [3193]

Mr. Norris: Supplementary credit approvals, SCAs, may be issued at any time during the financial year and are valid for expenditure incurred up to the end of the financial year in question. If they are not used, the local authority is expected to return the SCA to the Department for reissue to another authority.

The following SCAs have been issued to Sheffield city council by my Department in the last three years:

1992–93:

£1,175k

1993–94:

(a) £3,326k

(b) £1,391k

1994–95

(a) £529k

(b) £244k

(c) £80k

(d) £419k.

None of these SCAs has been returned to the Department.

Information for the the metropolitan boroughs is as follows:

Kingskerswell Bypass

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when work is to begin on the Kingskerswell bypass. [2102]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Rupert Allason, dated 4 December 1995:

As you know, the Minister for Railways and Roads, Mr. John Watts, has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking the Secretary of State for Transport, when work is to begin on the Kingskerswell Bypass.

As announced in Managing the Roads Programme published on 28 November, this scheme has been transferred to the Longer Term programme.

It is too soon to anticipate when it might be possible to move the scheme back into the main programme.

Royal Family (Diary Engagements)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport to what extent he is consulted in respect of diary engagements for members of the royal family. [3253]

Sir George Young: The extent to which my Department is consulted on visits in the United Kingdom depends on the nature of the engagement. My Department's transport security division is represented in discussions on the security for royal visits overseas.

Vehicle Emissions

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the extent of non-compliance with vehicle construction and use regulations in respect of motor vehicle emissions in each of the last five years. [3472]

Mr. Norris: The extent of non-compliance with emissions standards in the Road Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations 1986 is assessed in terms of prohibitions issued by the Vehicle Inspectorate after vehicle enforcement checks, which are targeted on vehicles thought most likely to be defective.

The figures for the last three years, in respect of emissions, are as follows:

	Heavy goods vehicles checks	prohibition rate (per cent.)	Public service vehicles checks	prohibition rate (per cent.)	Light vehicles checks	prohibition rate (per cent.
1992–93	5,706	0.6	4,647	1.7	4,759	0.5
1993–94	10,589	2.1	5,165	2.8	33,103	0.7
1994–95	12,959	3.5	7,292	2.5	70,899	3.6

During 1992–93 and 1993–94, no delayed prohibitions were issued on light vehicles, thus depressing the failure rate.

The figures collected before 1992–93 did not specify prohibitions issued for non-compliance with emissions standards.

Ro-ro Ferries

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress was made at the specially convened International Maritime Organisation diplomatic conference to consider the recommendations of the IMO's panel of experts, set up after the loss of the ro-ro passenger ferry, Estonia, on survivability, evacuation and life-saving appliances; and if he will make a statement. [307]

Mr. Norris [holding answer 29 November 1995]: The Government welcome the outcome of the IMO conference, which has agreed significant amendments to the safety of life at sea convention.

On the ability of a ship to withstand a significant amount of water on the car deck, the conference passed a resolution which paves the way for regional agreements applying the high SOLAS 90 plus 50 cm of water on the car deck standard recommended by IMO's panel of experts established after the Estonia.

We fully support this resolution and the future application of the SOLAS 90 plus 50 cm standard, through a regional agreement, to all ro-ro passenger ferries serving our ports. We will shortly be initiating, with other northern European states, discussion of such a regional agreement.

The amendments to the convention introduced a wide range of safety improvements including enhanced life-saving equipment, evacuation requirements, search-and-rescue procedures and the extension of the SOLAS 90 survivability standard to all existing ro-ro ferries worldwide.

SCOTLAND

Departmental Targets

Ms Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the published recommended response times within which his Department is expected to reply to letters from the public. [3009]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Scottish Office Ministers aim to reply to letters within 17 working days of receipt. Performance against that target is published in the Official Report. A 20-day response time has been set for letters addressed to Ministers which are answered by officials, although individual areas may set a tighter deadline. Executive agencies include details of target response times and performance in their annual reports.

Acts of Parliaments of Scotland

Mr. Charles Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those Acts of the Scottish Parliament before 1707 which are still in force. [3209]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: A list of the Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland before 1707 which have not been statutorily repealed follows. While there is a presumption that any Scots Act which has not been so repealed remains in force, that presumption can be rebutted through application of the doctrine of desuetude. That doctrine requires proof to the satisfaction of the Scottish courts that an enactment has not been repealed and that there has been contrary practice.

Salmon Fishing

Sir Cranley Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from the Scottish district salmon fishery boards for the restriction of the salmon netting season in Scotland following the publication of the Salmon Advisory Committee report of the timing of salmon runs. [1974]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: I have made one order to implement a two-and-a-half month reduction in the netting season from the River Eachaig district salmon fishery board, and an application for a reduction in the season for the River Dee (Aberdeenshire) district is under consideration. Scottish district salmon fishery boards can also arrange for reductions in net fishing effort in their districts by other means without my intervention, and many have done so in the past 10 years.

Communication Autistic Spectrum Disorders

Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many children of school age there are with communication autistic spectrum disorders; and how many places there are in schools appropriate for their needs. [2709]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: The information requested is not held centrally.

A1 (Haddington-Dunbar)

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the target date for the completion of the Haddington and Dunbar section of the A1 dual carriageway. [3664]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In his announcement on 15 June of the programme for developing Scotland's trunk road network, my right hon. Friend announced that, subject to the usual criteria including satisfactory completion of the statutory procedures and the necessary preparatory work, it is intended to start work on this section of the A1 dualling by March 1998. The subsequent construction period is expected to be approximately two years.

The Department plans to publish revised draft road orders early next year to re-test public reaction to the scheme and the design revisions which have been adopted following earlier publication of the proposals. Subsequent progress will be dependent on the reaction of the public to the revised proposals.

Roads Programme

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on his Department's road construction programme following the Chancellor's financial statement. [3665]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. Friend will make an announcement on the roads programme for the next three years after he has set out his new expenditure plans for the Scottish Office.

Hairmyres Hospitals

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details of the time scale and funding arrangements for the proposed new build hospital facility at Hairmyres. [3843]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Hairmyres and Stonehouse Hospitals NHS trust is currently seeking a private sector partner to design and build a new hospital at Hairmyres, East Kilbride. The Scottish Office Department of Health expects to received a full business case from the trust in the spring on 1996. Subject to approval, final contractual and planning issues will be completed in 1996 with a start on site scheduled for early 1997.

Ministerial Transport, London

Mr. McShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many times in the last year he has used (a) London Buses and (b) London Underground while on official business.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 24 November 1995]: None.

Unitary Councils

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the guidance circulars issued by his Department to the new unitary councils. [1739]

Mr. Kynoch [holding answer 23 November 1995]: Circulars issued by the Scottish Office to the new unitary councils have included the following:

WALES

Unemployment

17. Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the current level of unemployment in Wales. [1872]

Mr. Richards: In October 1995, the seasonally adjusted number of people on the claimant unemployment count in Wales was 106,600.

Welsh Development Agency

18. Mr. Donald Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he next proposes to meet the chairman of the Welsh Development Agency to discuss its financing. [1873]

Mr. Hague: I regularly meet the chairman of the Welsh Development Agency to discuss a wide range of issues.

20. Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he last met the board of the Welsh Development Agency to discuss its budget cost. [1875]

Mr. Hague: I met the board of the Welsh Development Agency in October to discuss a range of issues.

National Health Service (Costs)

19. Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total cost of health care provided by the NHS in Wales; and what was the comparable figure in 1979. [1874]

Mr. Richards: Planned expenditure on the NHS in Wales in 1995–96 is £2,191 million compared with expenditure of £466 million in 1979–80.

Inward Investment

21. Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total value of inward investment into Wales since the signing of the Maastricht treaty. [1876]

Mr. Hague: The forecast value of inward investment into Wales since February 1992 is £3.2 billion with 23,000 associated new jobs and almost 22,000 safeguarded jobs.

26. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement about inward investment in Wales. [1881]

Mr. Hague: Inward Investment in Wales has made and continues to make a major contribution to the diversification of the industrial base and to the well-being of the economy.

Business Advice and Support

22. Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps have been taken to improve the advice and support available to the business community in Wales from governmental organisations. [1877]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: In November, the Department's small firms roadshow completed a tour of Wales. A mobile unit visited many industrial estates and business centres throughout the Principality. It was attended by advisers from the Welsh Office, the Welsh Development Agency, the Development Board for Rural Wales, the training and enterprise councils and other local business support bodies. It gave a shop window on business support to local business people and enabled the business community to air its views and have access to the support available. The roadshow provided advice to some 820 small and medium-sized firms in Wales.

The roadshow precedes the launch, on 15 January 1996, of "Business Connect Wales". This new initiative will greatly simplify access to publicly funded business support services throughout Wales. One low-cost telephone number will connect callers to the full range of services. Callers will be automatically switched to one of 34 outlets at which trained staff will either deal with the inquiry direct or refer to the source of expertise.

Further Education

23. Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what increase there has been in enrolments on further education courses in Wales from 1979–80 to 1994–95. [1878]

Mr. Richards: The number of student enrolments on further education courses in Wales for the 1979–80 academic year was 62,207 compared with a provisional figure of 105,994 in 1994–95. This is an increase of nearly 44,000 or 70 per cent.

Assisted Places Scheme

24. Mr. Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to expand the number of places in the assisted places scheme in Wales. [1879]

Mr. Richards: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my right hon. Friend to the hon. Member for Conwy (Sir W. Roberts) on 29 November, Official Report, columns 757–58.

25. Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he intends to undertake with representatives of parent-teacher organisations following the Prime Minister's recent announcement of the enlargement of the assisted places scheme. [1880]

Mr. Richards: My right hon. Friend and I will consider carefully all points made to us about our proposal to double the number of places available under the assisted places scheme in Wales.

26. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement about inward investment in Wales. [1881]

Mr. Hague: Inward Investment in Wales has made and continues to make a major contribution to the diversification of the industrial base and to the well-being of the economy.

Fluoridation

27. Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy to require Welsh Water plc to fluoridate drinking water supplies. [1882]

Mr. Hague: I support the principle of fluoridation but I do not have the statutory power to require Welsh Water to fluoridate drinking water supplies.

Cancer

28. Mr. Merchant: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what progress has been made in the treatment of cancer in Wales. [1883]

Mr. Richards: In response to the report on cancer services from the chief medical officers of England and Wales we have commissioned a review of existing services throughout the Principality which will recommend how the necessary improvements identified in the report can be implemented to bring about better quality of care to patients.

Work is being undertaken in parallel in the NHS in Wales to establish the right local framework to facilitate progress. We expect to receive a report by September 1996 which will include recommendations on links between the providers of treatment and care, clinical standards and targets and the contribution which can be made to research in this field.

Parliamentary Accountability

29. Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has for the improvement in parliamentary accountability and scrutiny of his Department's affairs; and if he will make a statement. [1884]

Mr. Hague: I refer the hon. Member to the statement I made on 30 November on proposed changes to procedures in the Welsh Grand Committee, Official Report, columns 1353–55.

Block Grant

30. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the block grant settlement for expenditure by the Welsh Office in 1996–97; and what percentage change this represents on planned expenditure in 1995–96. [1885]

Mr. Hague: In 1996–97 the provision for the Welsh Office will be £6,865 million, including the proceeds of the sale of the Housing for Wales loan portfolio. This represents a 1.4 per cent. increase over the original planned expenditure for 1995–96 and 2.2 per cent. higher than the forecast outturn.

Community Forests

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his policy on community forests. [2656]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The Government are committed to the expansion of forests close to where people live, with benefits for local communities. We have introduced a range of measures to achieve this aim. The woodland grant scheme offers a community woodland supplement to encourage the creation of new woodlands close to towns and villages, and an annual management grant which can contribute towards the cost of providing public access in existing woodlands. We recently announced a new woodland improvement grant project to encourage owners to provide new facilities for informal public recreation in existing woodlands and a locational supplement for planting in the Aman Gwendraeth community forest project area in south Wales. In addition, the Welsh Valleys initiative encourages local people to make full use of the Forestry Commission's forests through community involvement.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment his Department has made of the probability of BSE entering the human food chain. [2659]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) on 28 November 1995, Official Report, columns 530–31, by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. The Welsh Office has issued the draft regulations for consultation in Wales.

School Funding

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the planned expenditure in the schools service in Wales for the year 1996–97; and if he will make a statement. [2924]

Mr. Richards: It is for individual local authorities to determine how the resources that are made available are allocated between services, including education, in the light of their statutory responsibilities and their perception of local needs and priorities.

Pedestrian Crossings

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many pedestrians have been killed at pedestrian crossings in the past five years, and if he will make a statement. [2922]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The number of pedestrians recorded by the police as having been killed in road accidents at pedestrian crossings in Wales between 1990 and 1994 are as follows. These figures exclude those killed while waiting to cross or while crossing near to but not actually on the crossing.

Year	Number killed
1990	1
1991	3
1992	3
1993	0
1994	3

Domiciliary Care

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what monitoring his Department has undertaken of public and domiciliary care; and if he will make a statement. [2926]

Mr. Richards: The Welsh Office collects the following information form local authorities:

care arrangements, including those for domiciliary care, made each quarter following assessments of individuals' needs;

the number of people receiving different types of care arranged by the local authorities at 31 March each year;

local authority annual budgets and expenditure for home care arrangements and annual expenditure on private and voluntary non-residential care.

From 1995–96, information will also be collected annually on the volumes of domiciliary care provided directly by local authorities and arranged by them with the independent, private and voluntary, sector.

Figures on privately arranged domiciliary care are not collected centrally.

Private Finance Initiative

Sir Wyn Roberts: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what progress has been made with the private finance initiative in Wales: and if he will make a statement. [3486]

Mr. Hague: Good progress is being made. Twenty-five projects, with a combined capital value of some £1 billion are being examined at the moment with a view to taking them forward under the initiative. I estimate that £360 million of private finance will be generated by the PFI in Wales over the next three years.

Chemical Bank

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will recover the grants paid to Chemical bank following its decision to close its branch in Wales. [3681]

Mr. Hague: Discussions with companies are commercial in confidence and I cannot comment on particular cases. However, all offers of regional selective assistance contain clawback provisions which are deployed where appropriate.

WDA Funding

Mr. Ainger: to ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects the Welsh Development Agency to make its contribution to Leader and 5b projects in west Wales. [3738]

Mr. Hague: This is an operational matter for the agency. I have asked the chief executive to write to the hon. Member and will arrange for a copy of his letter to be placed in the Library of the House.

Shorthold Tenancies

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy to require landlords to issue a specific prior notice concerning shorthold tenancies; and if he will make a statement. [3388]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The consultation paper "The Legislative Framework for Private Renting", issued in July, outlined proposals to change current notification arrangements for shorthold tenancies. My right hon. Friend and I are currently considering the responses.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will for each county and for Wales as a whole the total number of ballots held in (a) primary schools, (b) secondary schools and (c) in total to determine whether grant-maintained status should be adopted, indicating the numbers of votes cast for and against the proposals; and what percentage of schools held such ballots in each case. [1855]

Mr. Richards: The information is as follows:

			Votes cast
Authority	Type of school	Number of ballots	For grant-maintained status	Against grant-maintained status	Percentage of schools holding ballots[1]
	Primary	5	598	735	2.1
Clwyd	Secondary	[2]8	4,074	2,104	21.9
	Primary	1	27	155	0.3
Dyfed	Secondary	1	37	426	3.2
	Primary	1	151	44	0.5
Gwent	Secondary	[2]6	2,432	1,699	15.2
	Primary	1	195	48	0.5
Gwynedd	Secondary	1	84	311	4.3
	Primary	1	26	2	0.3
Mid Glamorgan	Secondary	0	0	0	—
	Primary	1	36	12	1.0
Powys	Secondary	1	209	499	7.7
	Primary	2	122	273	1.3
South Glamorgan	Secondary	[2]5	1,687	1,560	15.4
	Primary	0	0	0	—
West Glamorgan	Secondary	4	1,771	3,053	14.8
	Primary	12	1,155	1,269	0.7
Wales	Secondary	26	10,294	9,652	10.1

[1] These figures represent the number of schools holding a grant-maintained ballot since the Education Reform Act 1988 as a percentage of LEA maintained and grant-maintained schools existing at September 1995.

[2] These figures include schools which have held more than one ballot.

Autism

Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many children of school age there are with communication autistic spectrum disorders; and how many places there are in schools appropriate to their needs. [2711]

Mr. Richards: According to returns made by schools to the January 1995 schools census, 240 pupils in Wales had statements of special educational needs in which autism was identified as the major need. All these pupils were in maintained schools: 146 were in special schools, 79 were in primary schools, 14 were in secondary schools and one was in a nursery school.

Staffing

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the latest number of staff employed for each civil service grade by his office, indicating the percentage who are Welsh speaking where this is known. [2067]

Mr. Hague: The information is as follows:

Grade	Number of people	Percentage who have notified they have some ability in the use of Welsh
G1	1	—
G2s and equivalents	2	50
G3s and equivalents	11	9
G4s and equivalents	6	33

Grade	Number of people	Percentage who have notified they have some ability in the use of Welsh
G5s and equivalents	48	15
G6s and equivalents	29	10
G7s and equivalents	159	16
SEOs and equivalents	139	24
HEOs and equivalents	312	17
EOs and equivalents	488	17
AOs and equivalents	570	16
AAs and equivalents	457	8
Industrial and museum support grades	120	13

Measles and Rubella Immunisation

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the monitoring and aftercare support programme established in conjunction with the vaccination campaign instituted in November last year against measles and rubella, covering (a) Blaenau Gwent and (b) Wales. [2766]

Mr. Richards: I am content that there is a well-established satisfactory system in place, covering the United Kingdom as a whole, to monitor adverse reactions to all medicines, including vaccines. Aftercare support, following vaccination, would be a matter for the clinical judgment of an individual patient's practitioner.

European Funding

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how much matching funding the Welsh Development Agency is committing to Leader and 5b projects in Wales this year; and if he will list those projects; [3739]

(2) if he will list those Leader and 5b projects that have received official approval by his Department this financial year; how much each will receive from the EU and from each of the partners involved on the projects; and how many jobs will be supported or created in each project; [3737]

(3) if he will list the Leader and 5b projects the Welsh Development Agency contributed to in each of the last two financial years; how much each received; how many jobs were supported or created; and what was the contribution from other partners on the projects; [3736]

(4) how much the Welsh Development Agency contributed to Leader and 5b projects in each of the last two financial years. [3732]

Mr. Hague: I will write to the hon. Member and place a copy of my reply in the Library of the House.

Breast Cancer Mortality

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what research he has initiated to examine the reasons for the higher rates of mortality from breast cancer in Wales relative to the rest of the United Kingdom. [4003]

Mr. Richards: Whilst a number of factors influence the mortality rate from breast cancer, the higher rate in Wales may partly be a reflection of its higher incidence in Wales. The Government's priorities in this area have been directed at achieving a reduction in the overall mortality rate from this disease, through improved diagnosis and treatment.

European Education Programmes

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the organisations which bid for the provision of the advisory and information service for further and higher education establishments in Wales on European matters, when put out to tender by the Welsh Office; how many had knowledge and experience of further and higher education in Wales and the activities relevant to this field in the European Union; how many had the support of organisations representing and involved in the relevant activity areas in Wales and the European Union; and what considerations led to the selection of Euclid of Liverpool for this contract. [3945]

Mr. Richards: The following seven organisations tendered for the provision of services for European education programmes in Wales:

City college, Manchester and Cardiff institute of higher education—joint tender

Cynefin Environmental

Euclid

Friarsgrove Management Services Ltd.

Gwent Tertiary college

Penzer Allen Ltd.

Welsh joint education committee.

All tenderers expressed knowledge and experience of the further and higher education sectors in Wales, and activities relevant to the European Union.

One tenderer declared expressions of support for its tender by other organisations.

The contract was awarded to Euclid because its tender met the specification at the lowest price.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Iran

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what were the observations of the European Union observers at the trial of those accused of murdering the Christian leaders, Rev. Tateos Michaelian and Rev. Mehdi Dibaj in Iran. [1996]

Mr. Hanley: A representative of the European Union presidency attended two of the four sessions of the trial. No formal observations have been issued. But despite the fact that the trial was held in public, it is not possible to say that justice was done. We are concerned that certain aspects of the procedure did not conform to generally accepted international standards. Examples are the publicity given to the apparent confessions made by the accused before the trial, and the impression that it was stage-managed.

Nevertheless, the holding of a public trial is a welcome development in itself and we shall continue to stress the importance of public trials and of due process.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action Her Majesty's Government are taking to press the Iranian Government to allow the free sale and distribution of bibles and to put an end to the forced closures of churches. [1998]

Mr. Hanley: Following the hon. Member's question on the Bible Society on 10 January 1995, Official Report, columns 60–61, we raised the matter with our European Union partners. As a result, one partner pressed the Iranian Government to clarify their position: no substantive response has been forthcoming. In March 1995 the European Union sponsored a tough resolution on human rights in Iran, adopted by the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, which reflected the criticisms of the then UN special representative, Mr. Galindo Pohl. Mr. Pohl referred to the Bible Society's predicament in his final 1995 report.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action Her Majesty's Government are taking to press for the Government of Iran to allow an independent investigation into the murders of Bishop Haik Hovsepian Mehr, Rev. Tateos Michaelian and Rev. Mehdi Dibaj by the United Nations human rights rapporteurs. [1997]

Mr. Hanley: We fully support the involvement of UN special representatives in investigating the human rights situation in Iran. We and our European partners co-sponsored resolutions on human rights in Iran adopted at the General Assembly in December 2994 and by the Committee on Human Rights in March 1995. They called on Iran to co-operate with the UN special representative and to carry out a thorough and impartial investigation into the deaths of the three pastors.

Saudi Arabia

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures Her Majesty's Government are taking to link the United Kingdom's trade and defence policies with Saudi Arabia's performance in the area of respect for religious liberty; and if he will make a statement. [2000]

Mr. Hanley: The practice of any form of religious other than Islam in Saudi Arabia is prohibited by law. Her Majesty's Government have no plans to link the UK's trade and defence policies with Saudi Arabia's performance in the area of respect for religious liberty. But the Saudi Government are well aware of our views on freedom of thought, conscience and religion and on the importance of inter-faith dialogue.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action Her Majesty's Government are taking to encourage the Government of Saudi Arabia to permit (a) Christian worship, (b) the building of churches and (c) the free sale and distribution of bibles in that country; and if he will make a statement. [1999]

Mr. Hanley: The practice of any form of religion other than Islam in Saudi Arabia is prohibited by law. The Saudi authorities are aware of our views on the importance of the freedoms enshrined in the universal declaration of human rights, including the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion.

Executive Agencies (Overseas Travel)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list for each of his executive agencies for the last financial year in respect of overseas travel (a) the cost, (b) the countries visited and (c) the posts held by the staff involved. [2323]

Mr. Hanley: The FCO—diplomatic wing and ODA—has two executive agencies, Wilton Park and the Natural Resources Institute.

The details requested of overseas travel in financial year 1994–95 for Wilton Park were as follows:

(a) Cost: £19,472 total.

(b) Countries visited: Austria, Belgium, Canada, Czech Republic, Egypt, France, Germany, India, Italy, Poland, Romania, Slovakia, Spain, Switzerland, Turkey, USA.

(c) Posts of staff involved: the Director of Wilton Park, and four Associate Directors.

The chief executive of the Natural Resources Institute has written to the hon. Gentleman with the information requested in respect of that executive agency. The lists mentioned in his letter have been deposited in the Library of the House.

Letter from Anthony Beattie to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 29 November 1995:

In your question addressed to the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs you asked for information about travel undertaken by the staff of executive agencies. It has been agreed that I should provide this information in respect of NRI.

I am enclosing lists of all visits undertaken by NRI staff during 1994–95, with details of countries visited, the grade of the person visiting, dates and costs. You will see that these visits fall into two broad categories: those which are project funded and those which are funded from running costs.

The majority of visits (accounting for £1.670 million out of total visits expenditure of £1.872 million) fall into the former category. They are undertaken by members of the Institute's scientific and professional staff (staff grades are shown on the list) in connection with projects, programmes, and other assignments on behalf of the Overseas Development Administration and other clients.

Visits funded from running costs are mainly in connection with marketing and business development (the Institute operates on a commercial basis and these are important aspects of our work), professional development and representation of the Institute in a wide variety of scientific fora. Visits are frequently undertaken for a combination of project- and running-cost-related purposes and these elements have been shown separately in the attached lists.

European Convention on Human Rights

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to propose an amendment to article 2.2 of the European convention on human rights, in respect of the use of force which is no more than absolutely necessary to replace the word "absolutely" with the word "reasonably". [3165]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: The Government do not intend to propose any amendment to article 2 of the European convention on human rights. As my noble Friend the Minister for Overseas Development said in another place on 23 October, the European Court of Human Rights did not find a violation in relation to compatibility of the national law on the use of lethal force article 2 standards.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the compliance of the security forces of other signatories to the European convention on human rights with article 2 of that convention. [3166]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Compliance with the European convention on human rights by other states party to it and their security forces is a matter for them or, when applications raising questions of such compliance are introduced, for the European Commission and Court of Human Rights and the Committee of Ministers, as appropriate.

International Court of Justice

Mr. Berry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his Department's policy in respect of advisory opinions from the International Court of Justice. [2942]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor [holding answer 28 November 1995]: The Government believe that advisory opinions by the International Court of Justice at the request of the UN or a specialised agency can serve a useful purpose when they resolve legal matters on which the requesting organisation requires guidance for its current activities. Advisory opinions of the court are given careful consideration. However, they are not binding either on the requesting organisation or on its member states. The Government's attitude to particular advisory opinions depends on the terms of the opinion and the circumstances of the case.

BBC World Service

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the charges for the use of transmission faciltiies by the BBC World Service when transmission is privatised will be paid out of the Foreign Office grant; and what proposals he has to bring forward in respect of specific grant for transmission charges. [3248]

Mr. Hanley: The BBC World Service's costs will continue to be paid by grant in aid after privatisation of the BBC's transmission services. I have no proposals for a specific grant for transmission charges.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the BBC World Service would be allowed to hire foreign transmission facilities if these were cheaper than its own transmission facilities following privatisation. [3242]

Mr. Hanley: The BBC World Service already hires foreign transmission facilities where they fit in with its delivery plans, which are a matter for the World Service.

Iraqi Marshlands

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on evidence obtained by his Department from the Western European Union satellite centre about the effects of the construction of the Euphrates barrage in southern Iraq in 1993; what percentage of the Al Amarah and Hawr al Hammar marshes have been drained; and what assessment he has made of the impact of the draining those marshes on the population of that area. [3260]

Mr. Hanley: Although we cannot estimate the precise extent to which the marshlands have been drained, satellite and other imagery of southern Iraq points to a severe reduction of the Amarah and Hammar marshes. This repressive policy has enabled Iraq to control the local population by driving them from the marshes, upon which they rely for their livelihood, into impoverished conditions in cities.

Visa Applications (Turkey)

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the average waiting time between the receipt of a decision to grant a visitor's visa to a visitor from Turkey and the visa being obtained by a visitor. [3694]

Mr. Hanley: In Istanbul, once a decision has been made to issue a visitor's visa the visa may be collected the same afternoon, provided the application was received before 11 am. Those received after 11 am may be collected the following working day.

In Ankara, once a decision has been made to issue a visitor's visa, the visa may be collected within 24 hours.

Mrs. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the average waiting time for an interview for a visitor's visa for a visitor from Turkey. [3693]

Mr. Hanley: The longest waiting time for an interview in Istanbul in 1994 was 20 working days and in Ankara in 1994 was two working days.

Records for average waiting times are not kept.

Former Soviet Union

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list all independent states with a population of 3 million or less, ranked in order of population and indicating for the latest available date (a) population, (b) gross domestic product or gross national product per head in sterling and (c) area. [2068]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: No independent state of the former Soviet Union has a population of 3 million or less.

We do not consider that the Baltic states, which regained their independence in 1991, are part of the former Soviet Union. We never recognised de jure their incorporation into the Soviet Union. Two Baltic states have a population of less than 3 million.

	Estonia	Latvia
(a) Population	1.5 million	2.56 million
(b) Per capita GDP	$1,100	$1,600
(b) Area	45,200 km^2	64,600 km^2

United Nations

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish a list of all countries that have been members of the United Nations since 1965 indicating, where appropriate, the date on which they gained independence. [2069]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: The list of states that have become members of the United Nations since 1965 can be found in the "United Nations Handbook 1995" edited by the New Zealand Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Trade. This book is available in the House of Commons Library.

Turkey (Legionnaire's Disease)

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when notification was first received about an outbreak of legionnaire's disease in Kusadasi, Turkey. [3275]

Mr. Hanley: On 17 August 1995, when the Department of Health asked our consular officials to notify the Turkish authorities that there may be a link between visitors to Kusadasi and the reported cases of legionnaire's disease.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions have been held with Turkish officials about the safety of United Kingdom travellers to Kusadasi. [3276]

Mr. Hanley: Our consular officials alerted the provincial and local health authorities, the provincial governor's office, a local hospital, and the Hotel Imbat to the possibility of the hotel being linked to an outbreak of legionnaire's disease.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what estimate he has made of the number of United Kingdom nationals visiting (a) Kusadasi and (b) the Hotel Imbat between May and October 1995. [3277]

Mr. Hanley: Based on figures from the provincial tourist authority in Turkey and the Hotel Imbat, we estimate (a) some 21,000 British nationals visited Kusadasi, and (b) some 4,230 British nationals stayed at the Hotel Imbat between May and October 1995.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what estimate he has made of the number of United Kingdom nationals visiting (a) Kusadasi and (b) the Hotel Imbat since official notification of legionnaire's disease. [3278]

Mr. Hanley: Based on figures from the provincial tourist authority in Turkey and the Hotel Imbat, we estimate (a) some 8,750 British nationals visited Kusadasi, and (b) some 1,250 British nationals stayed at the Hotel Imbat after the possible link was made between the resort and the reported cases of legionnaire's disease.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what advice was issued to British persons located in (a) the Hotel Imbat and (b) Kusadasi when the outbreak of legionnaire's disease was formerly notified. [3358]

Mr. Hanley: In late September the Hotel Imbat told British tour companies and their clients that the hotel was a possible source of legionnaire's disease. British tourists were transferred to other hotels.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what advice was issued to British persons planning to travel to (a) the Hotel Imbat and (b) Kusadasi following formal notification of legionnaire's disease. [3359]

Mr. Hanley: The Department of Health issued advice to public health doctors about the possibility of a link between the hotel and the reported cases of legionnaire's disease. It also wrote to the Federation of Tour Operators and to the Association of British Travel Agents advising them of the situation.

Budget

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the implications for his Department of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's financial statement. [3700]

Mr. Hanley: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office will respond imaginatively to the challenge of maintaining the front-line effort through demanding efficiency targets, and use of the private finance initiative.

With 21 new posts opened since 1990, the United Kingdom has diplomatic relations with a record high number of countries. The effort to promote exports and investment has been considerably enhanced in recent years and remains a high priority. The British Council and BBC World Service will continue to make an outstanding contribution to the overall UK diplomatic effort.

The UK's aid programme will remain the fifth largest in the world. Its overriding priority will continue to be poverty reduction through sustainable development, focused on the poorest countries in Africa and Asia.

Committee of the Regions

Mr. Berry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which councillors appointed by him to the Committee of the Regions are no longer elected members of local authorities; and what plans he has to request them to stand down from the committee. [3844]

Mr. David Davis: Two of the full UK members appointed to the Committee of the Regions in 1993 and six of the alternate members are no longer elected members of local authorities. The full members are:

Dame Elizabeth Anson

Roy Cross (who has since resigned from the committee)

The alternate members are:

Doreen Fleming OBE

Bill Hughes

Marcus Humphrey

Frazer Mitchell

Tony Prior

Hedley Salt.

Since losing his seat in the 1994 local elections, Marcus Humphrey has gained a seat on the new Aberdeen council, representing the mid-Deeside ward, which will come into being in April 1996.

The European Communities (Amendment) Act 1993, which implemented the Maastricht treaty, states that UK members of the Committee of the Regions must be elected members of a local authority

> "at the time of the proposal of their membership".

Nothing therefore requires committee members who lose their local authority seats to resign.

Article 198a of the treaty of European Union states that Committee of the Regions members should be "completely independent in the performance of their duties".

The Government have no intention therefore of imposing their views on the committee, or its members.

Aral Sea

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's response to Kazakhstan's request for technical help in relation to the Aral sea. [3089]

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 28 November 1995]: The British Government have committed £500,000 to the World bank's programme for the rehabilitation of the Aral sea. Using funds from the know-how fund for the former Soviet Union, we are providing expertise to enhance Kazakhstan's environmental monitoring capabilities and to investigate climate changes and the geology of the region.

Retrospective Service Awards

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Australian and Canadian Governments' approval of retrospective awards of a special service medal for prescribed peacekeeping and non-warlike operations for the period 1945 to 1975; and what plans Her Majesty's Government have to issue a similar medal for Her Majesty's forces. [3240]

Mr. Soames: The decision of a Commonwealth Government to institute retrospectively the award of a medal for any service operation, and any approval which Her Majesty the Queen may have given as Queen of that Commonwealth country, is the sole responsibility of the country concerned. It has been a long-standing policy of successive British Governments not to consider the belated institution of medals and awards, and we therefore have no plans to introduce any medals for the period 1945 to 1975 additional to those already approved.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Crown Prosecution Service (Discontinued Cases)

36. Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Attorney-General what proportion of cases are discounted by the Crown Prosecution Service, and if he will make a statement. [1893]

The Solicitor-General: The rate of discontinuance has fallen from 13.4 per cent. of cases for the year ending September 1993 to 11.9 per cent. of cases for the year ending September 1995.

Court of Appeal (Referrals)

37. Mr. Spring: To ask the Attorney-General how many cases he has sought leave to refer to the Court of Appeal on grounds of unduly lenient sentencing since 1 January 1995. [1894]

The Attorney-General: Since 1 January 1995, I have referred 68 cases in England and Wales and four in Northern Ireland. One has been withdrawn, twenty-four have so far been heard by the Court of Appeals of which 22, or 92 per cent., have resulted in an increase in sentence.

Serious Fraud Office

36. Mr. Carrington: To ask the Attorney-General what is the current case load of the Serious Fraud Office. [1895]

The Solicitor-General: The current case load of the Serious Fraud Office is 63 cases, excluding appeals. In addition to its domestic case load, the SFO is increasingly being called upon to assist overseas investigators.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Attorney-General how many staff work in his Office; at what cost to the public funds; and if he will make a statement. [2169]

The Attorney-General: Twenty-six staff are employed in the legal secretariat to the Law Officers. The total staff costs for the financial year 1994–95—consisting of salary, allowances, overtime, earnings-related national insurance contributions and superannuation—were £1,040,018. These figures do not include agency staff.

Lockerbie

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Attorney-General how many staff in his Department are involved in matters related to the Lockerbie crime. [2170]

The Attorney-General: Responsibility for the prosecution aspects of the Lockerbie crime lies with the Lord Advocate and his staff in the Crown Office in Edinburgh. Members of my chambers may become involved in the course of their normal duties but only in relation to aspects of the case which have a bearing on my own responsibilities.

Electro-shock Batons

Mrs. Clywd: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the progress of the police investigations into the allegations about the production of electro-shock batons. [1887]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I have been asked to reply, since the question relates to a Scottish police investigation.

The inquires which are being conducted by Strathclyde police into these allegations are still continuing.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Industrial Injuries Benefit

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claims for industrial injuries benefit in respect of chronic bronchitis and emphysema were made in Nottinghamshire up to 31 October; how many were successful and how many were refused; and if he will indicate the grounds for refusal or acceptance. [3022]

Mr. Roger Evans: This is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Paddy Tipping, dated 30 November 1995:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about how many claims for industrial injuries benefit in respect of chronic bronchitis and emphysema were made in Nottinghamshire up to 31 October 1995; how many were successful and how many were refused; indicating the grounds for refusal or acceptance.

The information is not available in the format requested. Statistics on the number of claims for Industrial Injuries Disablement Benefit are maintained by each Benefits Agency District office. The figures provided in the attached Appendix A are for the main benefit offices in the North, East and West Nottinghamshire areas for the period from 1 April 1995. These include those offices in Nottingham, Mansfield and Sutton in Ashfield. It is possible that these figures will include some people living outside Nottinghamshire.

The information in this reply follows on from your earlier Parliamentary Question, on 21 April 1995, in which you were provided with the details to 31 March 1995.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Appendix A: Claims to IIDB for prescribed disease D12—Chronic Bronchitis and/or emphysema in the Nottinghamshire area for the period 1 April to 31 October 1995

	Number
Claims made	127
Successful claims assessed at 14–19 per cent.	3
Successful claims assessed at 20–25 per cent.	6
Successful claims assessed at over 25 per cent.	37
Disallowed claims—20 year rule	10
Disallowed claims—failed FEV test	71
Disallowed claims—failed X-Ray test	59
Assessed at 1–13 per cent.	0

IIDB not payable for assessment under 14 per cent. Note that not all claims received within the period will have been decided by 31 October 1995. Similarly some claims decided in the period will have been made prior to 1 April 1995.

Figures are provisional and subject to amendment.

Mr. Peter Sutton

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the hon. Member for Wakefield will receive a full reply from the finance director of the Benefits Agency to inquiries made by Mr. Peter Sutton, national insurance No. ZS065267D, in the hon. Member's letter to the Benefits Agency, dated 13 September; and for what reasons the response has taken longer than the three weeks indicated in the agency's letter of 6 October and the further two weeks reported in its letter of 2 November. [3352]

Mr. Heald: The administration of the national insurance scheme is a matter for Mrs. Faith Boardman, the chief executive of the Contributions Agency. She will write to the hon. Member.

letter from Faith Boardman to Mr. David Hinchliffe, dated 30 November 1995:

As Chief Executive of the Contributions Agency, I have responsibility for answering questions about operational matters relating to the Agency and the National Insurance (NI) scheme.

I have been asked to reply to your enquiry made on behalf of Mr. Peter Sutton, National Insurance Number ZS065267D, regarding difficulties with his National Insurance affairs.

When my assistant wrote to you on 2 November 1995 I anticipated being able to provide a full response within the 2 weeks indicated. Due to the issues raised this was not possible but we should have provided a further update. Please accept my apologies for this oversight.

I anticipate that all the information will be available to provide a full response within 2 weeks, if I am unable to meet this deadline I will write to you again.

War Pension Disregards

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many local authorities and London boroughs currently offer (a) full disregard, (b) partial disregard and (c) the statutory £10 disregard of war widows' and war disablement pension for the purpose of council tax benefit and housing benefit. [1660]

Mr. Roger Evans: The information is not available in the format requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. All local authorities and London boroughs operate the statutory £10 disregard.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what extra public expenditure he estimates would be entailed in implementing a full nationwide disregard of war widows' and war disablement pensions for the purposes of (a) council tax benefit and (b) housing benefit. [1662]

Mr. Evans: The information required to make such an estimate is not available.

Disability Living Allowance

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what is the average length of time taken to process an appeal against the disallowance of a disability living allowance applications; [2687]

(2) how many appeals have been lodged following the disallowance of a disability living allowance application since 1 April 1994; and, of these appeals, how many have been upheld. [2688]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The information is not available in the format requested. However, the average clearance time for appeals considered by disability appeal tribunals, which include disability living allowance appeals, is 30 weeks.

Between 1 April 1994 and 31 October 1995, 41,800 disability living allowance appeals have been decided and, of these, 26,662 cases the appeal was upheld.

Ms Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many disability living allowance applications have been received since 1 April 1994; and how many of those were disallowed. [2686]

Mr. Mitchell: The information is not available in the format requested. The available information is in the table:

	Number
DLA claims received between 1 April 1994 and 31 October 1995	747,000
DLA claims processed between 1 April 1994 and 31 October 1995	735,000
Number disallowed between 1 April 1994 and 31 October 1995	378,000

Compensation Recovery

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many victims of (a) culpable accidents, (b) illnesses and (c) diseases are now settling for compensation of £2,500 or less; and what assessment he has made of the relationship between the number settling at this level and the rules of the compensation recovery unit. [2902]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: Settlements at or under £2,500 are not necessarily notified to the compensation recovery unit. However, the effect of the small payments limit on settlements has been examined as part of a compliance cost assessment of the changes to the compensation recovery scheme proposed by the Social Security Select Committee. The assessment will be published shortly.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to raise the limit of £2,500 as the threshold for non-recovery by the compensation recovery unit. [2903]

Mr. Mitchell: A consultation document was published in October on the implications of changes to the compensation recovery scheme proposed by the Social Security Select Committee. One issue discussed in the consultation document is the future of the small payments limit of £2,500. The Government are now considering the responses to the consultation exercise, and will announce their decision in due course.

Funeral Benefit

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the maximum funeral benefit available to claimants or families in receipt of benefits such as income support in (a) 1979, (b) 1985, (c) 1990 and (d) when it was last uprated. [3735]

Mr. Roger Evans: In each of these years, the maximum amount payable would have been the reasonable cost of specified essential expenses which fell to be met by the person responsible. There was no set maximum amount. Since 5 June 1995, the social fund funeral payment scheme allows up to £500 for specified funeral directors' services, the payment of reasonable costs for other specified disbursements and up to £25 for flowers. Payments may still exceed £1,000, especially in the case of burials. The £500 and £25 caps will be kept under review.

Disabled People, Carers and the Long-term Sick

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what is the projected total annual spending on benefits for disabled people for (a) 1995–96, (b) 1996–97 and (c) 1997–98; and what was the equivalent figure for 1978–79; [3801]

(2) what is the projected total annual spending on benefits for carers for (a) 1995–96, (b) 1996–97 and (c) 1997–98; and what was the equivalent figure for 1978–79; [3800]

(3) what is the projected total annual spending on benefits for the long-term sick for (a) 1995–96, (b) 1996–97 and (c) 1997–98; and what was the equivalent figure for 1978–79. [3802]

Mr. Burt: Total projected spending on carers is not available as carers have access to the full range of social security benefits, depending on their individual circumstances. The available information is in the table.

£ million

	1978–79	1995–96	1996–97	1997–98
Long term sick and disabled	1,771	20,230	20,550	21,250

Departmental Running Costs

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security for what reasons the forecast of his Department's running costs for 1996–97 has risen from £3,195 million, as set out in table 3.7 of the statistical supplement to the "Financial Statement and Budget Report 1995–96", Cm 2821, published by Her Majesty's Treasury, to £3.5 billion, as set out in chart 6.6 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report 1996–97". [4057]

Mr. Burt: The main reason for the increase is a reclassification of £200 million of other current expenditure as running costs. This does not alter overall DSS current provision. The remaining increase of around £100 million is to cover the implementation of jobseeker's allowance, changes to child support, further anti-fraud measures and increases in work load.

Personal Pensions

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the number of holders of appropriate personal pensions who are contributing only their national insurance rebate; and if he will provide this information by relation to the income of the holder. [2701]

Mr. Heald: The information is not available in the format requested.

Out of a total of 5.6 million appropriate personal pensions in 1993–94, we estimate that some 1.25 million received DSS contributions and associated tax relief only.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the number of holders of appropriate personal pensions who have rejoined the state earnings-related pension scheme in each of the past five years; and if he will provide this information by relation to the income of the holder. [2702]

Mr. Heald: The information up to the end of 1991–92, the latest year for which figures are available, is set out in the table.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many individuals currently (a) contribute towards a state earnings-related pension, (b) do not pay SERPS because they are in an occupational scheme and (c) do not pay SERPS because they are in a personal pension scheme. [2703]

Mr. Heald: The information for 1992–93, the latest year for which all the requested data are available, is in the table.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many members of personal pension schemes who have opted out of the state earnings-related pension scheme he estimates will opt back into SERPS over the next five years; and how many have opted back into SERPS. [2704]

Mr. Heald: It is not possible to give a firm estimate of the number of people likely to opt out of an appropriate personal pension into the state earnings-related pension scheme, since the decision depends on an individual's particular circumstances. However, the introduction of age-related rebates from April 1997 should enable the majority of appropriate personal pension holders to maintain their arrangements.

We estimate that some 75,000 United Kingdom appropriate personal pension holders joined SERPS over the five-year period from 1987–88 to 1991–92, the latest year for which figures are available. This may include people who have left their appropriate personal pension and joined SERPS more than once.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the number of those taking out personal pensions and who have ceased to pay national insurance rebates to this policy after (a) one year, (b) two years, (c) three years, (d) four years and (e) five years. [2705]

Mr. Heald: The information is not available in the format requested and can be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Such information as is available is set out on pages 40 and 41 of "Personal Pension Statistics 1993–94", a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the cost to the national insurance fund of all current holders of an appropriate personal pension with an annual income of (a) £2,000 or below, (b) up to £3,000, (c) up to £4,000, (d) up to £5,000, (e) up to £6,000, (f) up to £7,000, (g) up to £8,000, (h) up to £9,000 and (i) up to £10,000 opting back into SERPS. [2706]

Mr. Heald: Information is not available in the format requested. Any estimates of the total cost to the national insurance fund of current holders of appropriate personal pensions opting back into the state earnings-related pension scheme would depend on a number of unknown factors. These include how long the people concerned would remain contracted in to SERPS, how long they would otherwise have contributed to APP schemes and what their future earnings would be. The table gives illustrative estimates of the cost arising, in selected future years, from contributions paid solely in the single year in which the individuals concerned are assumed to contract into SERPS.

2. Estimates of numbers affected based on data for 1993–94, the most recently available, used to estimate proportions of APP holders in respect of people in the earnings bands quoted.
3. Earnings under £3,000 would not accrue SERPS so no financial effect in respect of that year.
4. Earnings have been used, as a breakdown by income is not available.
5. The year in which opting back into SERPS is assumed to take place is 1995–96.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the total cost to date to the national insurance fund of (a) national insurance rebates, (b) tax relief and (c) other incentives paid in respect of personal pensions contracted out of the state earnings-related pension scheme. [2707]

Mr. Heald: The information up to and including 1993–94, the latest year for which audited accounts are available, is set out in the table:

Invalidity and Incapacity Benefits

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many persons were found fit for work following medicals for (a) invalidity benefit and (b) incapacity benefit between (i) 1 April and 30 September and (ii) 1 October and 31 March in each year since 1990; and what studies he is undertaking in order to compare invalidity benefit take-up and benefit suspension with incapacity benefit. [3272]

Mr. Burt: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available prior to April 1995 is in the table. Between April and September, 18,898 people have been disallowed under the all work test and 293 people because they are capable of their own occupation. Direct comparisons between incapacity benefit and invalidity benefit are not possible because of the different structure, qualifying conditions and administration of the two benefits.

The figures for incapacity benefit reflects activity during a time when the take-on of cases has been carefully controlled to match capacity as experience of the new procedures grows. It is not representative and it is too early to draw firm conclusions about the effectiveness of the new procedures.

A number of studies and research projects are planned to establish the effect of the introduction of incapacity benefit.

Period	Number of medical opinions given—capable of own occupation	Number of medical opinions given—capable of alternative work
April 1992–September 1992	19,504	29,502
October 1992–March 1993	18,217	33,118
April 1993–September 1993	12,511	47,370
October 1993–March 1994	9,904	52,996
April 1994–September 1994	8,499	52,217
October 1994–March 1995	8,365	52,684

1. Figures for Great Britain prior to 1992 are not available. The figures relate to the number of medical opinions given by the Medical Reference Service that the claimant was capable of work following examination for Sickness Benefit, Invalidity Benefit and Severe Disablement Allowance and not the number of disallowances. Excluded are references where the National Insurance contribution conditions for Sickness/Invalidity Benefit were not satisfied and benefit was payable because the person's incapacity was the result of an accident at work or a prescribed industrial disease.

2. The decision whether to disallow benefit following a medical opinion was made by an independent adjudication officer.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what benefit provision Her Majesty's Government (a) currently make and (b) intend to make available to disabled applicants for political asylum and those asylum seekers who care for disabled applicants. [3672]

Mr. Roger Evans: Disabled asylum applicants, and carers who are themselves asylum applicants, are currently entitled to claim social security benefits, including invalid care allowance, subject to the normal conditions of eligibility. Payment of income support is at the urgent cases rate, which limits the claimant's personal allowance to 90 per cent. of the normal rate. Entitlement to income support, housing benefit and council tax benefit ceases on the abandonment or final negative determination of an asylum application.

Under proposed changes to these provisions, benefit entitlement would be limited to income support at the urgent cases rate, housing benefit and council tax benefit for people who applied for asylum on entry to the UK.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of his Department's budget is represented by social security benefits made available to refugees and asylum seekers. [3630]

Mr. Evans: Approximately one quarter of 1 per cent. of total benefit expenditure, or £215 million per annum.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what benefit provision Her Majesty's Government intend to make for pregnant women who apply for political asylum during the course of the application with regard to housing, maternal and foetal health and food. [3673]

Mr. Evans: The two maternity benefits, statutory maternity pay and maternity allowance, are specifically aimed at pregnant working women and both have qualifying conditions closely related to the woman's recent employment and earnings history. They are therefore not available to women who have newly arrived in this country. This applies whether or not they are asylum seekers and the proposed benefit changes do not affect this position. People from abroad, including pregnant women, who apply for asylum on entry to the UK will remain entitled to claim income support, housing benefit and council tax benefit under currently proposed benefit changes. In addition, an application may be made to the social fund for a maternity payment if the applicant or her partner is in receipt of income support, housing benefit or disability working allowance.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what discussions he has had with his European counterparts about the harmonisation of welfare benefits available for asylum seekers and refugees. [3629]

Mr. Evans: My right hon. Friend and his ministerial team have had no such discussions.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what is the maximum amount of disability benefit that may be claimed by an applicant for political asylum; and what amount is then deducted from the amount paid to the applicant in income support; [3671]

(2) what is the maximum weekly amount of benefit which may be claimed by applicants for political asylum who are (a) a single mother with one child, (b) a married couple without dependent children and (c) a married couple with two dependent children. [3670]

Mr. Evans: Asylum seekers are currently entitled to claim any social security benefit, subject to the normal conditions of eligibility appropriate to each. The weekly amount of benefit paid will depend on which benefits are claimed and on the individual circumstances of the claimant and any partner and dependants.

Income Support

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the current monetary value of the capital thresholds for eligibility for income support; and where these have been indexed if he will give the date they were set at (a) £3,000 and (b) £8,000. [3623]

Mr. Roger Evans: The income support capital threshold of £3,000 was introduced in April 1988 and the threshold of £8,000 was introduced in April 1990. Had these limits been indexed in line with prices since their respective dates of introduction, the levels that they would be in 1995–96 are set out in the table:

Income support capital thresholds indexed by prices

Current actual levels in 1995–96 £	Levels if indexed since introduction by ROSSI £	Levels if indexed since introduction by RPI £
Lower thresholds @ 3,000	4,172	4,254
Upper threshold @ 8,000	10,101	9,955

1. The lower capital limit of £3,000 is indexed from 1988 to 1995–96 and the upper capital limit of £8,000 is indexed from 1990 to 1995–96.
2. Indexation is based upon the yearly (September) CSO figures for ROSSI and RPI. The September figures are used because annual Social Security benefits uprating in April is based upon the ROSSI and RPI figures of the preceding September.
3. RPI is the CSO Retail Prices Index. ROSSI is the RPI minus adjustments for housing expenditure. ROSSI is the price index used for uprating most of the Income Support allowances and premiums.
4. No rounding has been assumed at each year so the results are presented to the nearest one pound.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Departmental Targets

Ms Armstrong: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what are the published response times within which his Department is expected to reply to letters from the public. [3007]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The Lord Chancellor's Department comprises two next steps agencies—the Court Service and the Public Trust Office—the departmental headquarters and associated offices. The two agencies have published target response times to correspondence as part of their charter standards. As this is an operational matter, I have asked the chief executives of the two agencies to reply direct. There is no universal or published recommended response time in the headquarters of the Department or its associated offices, although individual divisions work to local targets. Every effort is made to respond substantively to letters from the public within 20 working days.

Letter from M. D. Huebner to Ms Hilary Armstrong, dated 4 December 1995:

The Parliamentary Secretary has asked me to reply in respect of the Court Service to your Question about replies to letters from the public.

If a member of the public writes to a court they should receive a written reply or telephone call usually within 5 but no later than 10 working days. If they are not satisfied with the reply they have received and write to the Court Service Customer Service Unit, they should receive an acknowledgement within 2 working days and a reply within 20 working days from the date the Unit receives the letter, unless legal advice is required. If we need to take legal advice, the member of the public will be notified within 20 working days and will be sent a final reply within 40 working days.

These response times are published in the Charter for Court Users.

Letter from Julia C. Lomas to Ms Hilary Armstrong, dated 4 December 1995:

The Parliamentary Secretary has asked me to reply to you as part of the Lord Chancellor's Department's response to your Parliamentary Question, listed on 24 November 1995, regarding the published recommended response times to letters from the public.

The Court Funds Office's standard for correspondence is to respond to all letters of enquiry within 5 working days. The Mental Health Sector and Trust Division standard is to respond to all letters within 10 working days or to acknowledge letters within 3 working days and respond fully within 20 working days.

NORTHERN IRELAND

School Meals

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what action he has taken following the survey conducted by the Northern Ireland Chest, Heart and Stroke Association on the dietary content of school meals. [2676]

Mr. Ancram: The Department of Education has consulted the Department of Health and Social Services, the education and library boards and other agencies about the issues raised in the survey conducted by the Northern Ireland Chest, Heart and Stroke Association and in particular the application of recommendations made by the Committee on Medical Aspects of Food Policy about nutrition. The Department will review the existing guidelines for school meals in light of these consultations.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the dietary value of school meals. [2677]

Mr. Ancram: The Department of Education has issued nutritional guidelines for school meals in nursery, primary and special schools.

The Department and the education and library boards school meals service regularly assess the nutritional value of meals offered to pupils.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the expenditure permitted on school meals per pupil in real and constant price terms in each school board area in each year since 1990. [2678]

Mr. Ancram: This information requested is in the table.

Roads (Belfast)

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what low-cost anti-accident measures have been considered as an alternative to the current enlargement scheme for the Balmoral avenue–Malone road junction in Belfast. [2510]

Mr. Moss: A number of low-cost options based largely on modified traffic signal arrangements were considered but none was found to be suitable. The proposed scheme is the most appropriate means of dealing with the major problems identified at the junction, a view confirmed by the independent inspectors who conducted two separate public inquiries.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if the Balmoral avenue junction scheme in Belfast is part of a wider road enlargement scheme being considered in that area; and how much extra traffic it is expected to generate. [2511]

Mr. Moss: The proposed scheme at the Balmoral avenue-Malone road junction does not form part of any other scheme and is not expected to generate additional traffic.

Road Safety Education Officers

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many road safety education officers have been employed in Northern Ireland in each of the past five years; and how many are planned to be employed in the next financial year. [2717]

Mr. Moss: The information requested is as follows:

Year	Road safety education officers
1991–92	[1]16
1992–93	15
1993–94	15
1994–95	13

It is anticipated that the complement will be 11 road safety education officers with effect from 1 April 1996.

Social Fund

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much receipts under the European social fund for Northern Ireland in each financial year to date were earned by (a) the private sector, (b) non-central Government public sector bodies, and (c) central Government. [2487]

Sir John Wheeler: The information is as follows:

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much money Northern Ireland has received in each financial year to date; how much each year represented a cash addition to the Northern Ireland economy; and how much was used to offset Government expenditure on Northern Ireland. [2484]

Sir John Wheeler: The following amounts were received from the European social fund:

Financial year	Total £ million
1973–74	—
1974–75	3.4

1992–93	41.9
1993–94	35.1
1994–95	70.6
Total	674.7

Receipts earned by the private sector and by non-central Government public sector bodies are paid to the claimant. The receipts represent cash additions to the recipients. Receipts earned by central Government are paid into the Northern Ireland Consolidated Fund. All ESF receipts are subject to EC audit arrangements and normal government accounting requirements.

The overall level of receipts is taken in account in the Government's decisions on public expenditure allocations, and their availability enables public expenditure to be maintained at a higher level than would otherwise be feasible.

Education and Library Boards

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the budget in (a) real, and (b) constant price terms, of each education and library board in each year since 1988. [2537]

Note:

As from 1991–92, under the terms of the Education Reform (Northern Ireland) Order 1989, the Education and Library Boards became responsible for teachers' and lecturers' salary costs.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what resources were made available to each of the education and library boards in connection with the amalgamation of further education colleges in 1993–94 and 1994–95. [2494]

Mr. Ancram: The information is as follows:

	1993–94 £	1994–95 £
North Eastern education and library board	52,000	258,000
Southern education and library board	17,000	89,000

Playing Fields

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many playing fields are currently under threat of development; [2583]

(2) what area of playing fields has been sold off since 1981; [2581]

(3) what estimate he has made of value of playing fields that have been sold off since 1981; [2673]

(4) how many playing fields have been sold off since 1981. [2582]

Mr. Ancram: Comprehensive records of playing fields in Northern Ireland are not held centrally. Of those grant-aided by the Department, 13 have been sold since 1981 and of these seven were on school/university sites, five were owned by voluntary sports clubs and one was owned by a district council. The total area involved exceeds 76 acres and the total sale value exceeds £4 million.

Two former school playing fields are currently on the market for disposal with planning permission for housing development. These sites have become available only because of the closure of the schools in question.

My Department is exploring, with the Department of the Environment (Northern Ireland), the scope for introducing arrangements which would provide for consultation with the Sports Council for Northern Ireland on planning proposals which adversely affect playing fields.

Further Education Colleges

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) voluntary and (b) compulsory redundancies there have been in each further education college in Northern Ireland in each academic year since 1988. [2535]

Mr. Ancram: The information is as follows:

European Agricultural Guidance and Guarantee Fund

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much money Northern Ireland has received in each financial year to date from the European Agricultural Guidance and Guarantee Fund guidance section; how much of these receipts were paid to the private sector; how much of these receipts were paid to the public sector; how much of these receipts represented a cash addition to the Northern Ireland economy; and how much was used each year to offset Government expenditure on Northern Ireland. [2485]

Mr. Ancram: The information requested is as follows:

£ million

	Individual capital products		Other guidance schemes
Financial year	Private sector	Public sector	Private sector	Public sector	Total
1990–91	4.75	—	6.25	—	11.0
1991–92	4.31	—	21.78	2.86	28.95
1992–93	8.31	—	9.56	0.45	18.32
1993–94	2.32	—	23.08	2.7	28.10
1994–95	6.23	—	22.13	—	28.36

All these receipts present cash additions to the recipients and are subject to normal European Community audit arrangements. The overall level of receipts is taken into account in the Government's decision on public expenditure allocations and their availability enables public expenditure to be maintained at a higher level than would otherwise be feasible.

Hotel and Catering College Lecturers

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many lecturers, who are citizens of the Republic of Ireland, were enrolled in hotel and catering colleges in Northern Ireland for each year since 1990–91. [2478]

Mr. Ancram: The information is not available.

General National Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the expenditure on the introduction of GNVQs in schools and further education colleges in Northern Ireland in each year since 1992–93. [2493]

Mr. Ancram: It is not possible to identify separately the total expenditure on GNVQs in schools and further education colleges. Schools and colleges which provide GNVQs meet the costs from within the totality of the resources available to them.

However, additional resources have been made available to 16 schools and to all colleges to assist them to pilot GNVQs and to facilitate the introduction of new subject areas. To date, a total of £32,000 has been paid to schools and £264,000 to colleges.

Common Land

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will institute an interdepartmental policy group to address the problems of those who live adjacent to common land and thoroughfares where anti-social elements gather; and if he will make it his policy to enclose publicly owned common land where persistent offences occur. [2507]

Sir John Wheeler: At present there are no plans to institute an interdepartmental policy group on these issues.

The Northern Ireland Office and Northern Ireland Departments do not have a policy to enclose lands to which the public has access; rather, where offences occur, they take whatever steps are necessary to address the problem in consultation with the RUC.

Road Safety

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what response he has made to the recommendations contained in the 13th report of the Committee of Public Accounts on the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland on road safety—HC 26th Session 1993–94—in respect of the adoption of the local authorities, road safety code of practice. [2716]

Mr. Moss: The Public Accounts Committee made no such recommendation. In 1989 the local authority associations in Great Britain produced a road safety code of good practice. The Department of the Environment has not formally adopted the code. However, it has given formal expression to the code principles, in so far as they are relevant to the Department's functional responsibilities, within the body of the road safety plan for Northern Ireland. The plan was formally launched on 5 July 1995.

Carers (Recognition and Services) Act 1995

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to bring in legislation similar to the Carers (Recognition and Services) Act 1995. [2509]

Mr. Moss: None. The Department of Health and Social Services already has the legislative authority to direct health and social services boards and trusts to carry out assessments of carers' needs as provided by the Act and has done so.

European Regional Development Fund

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much money Northern Ireland has received in each year to date from the European regional development fund; how much has been earned by (a) infrastructure projects undertaken by non-central Government bodies, (b) infrastructure projects undertaken by central Government and (c) industrial projects. [2486]

Sir John Wheeler: The information is as follows:

£ million

	Infrastructure Projects

[1] These programmes combine elements of both industry and infrastructure.

[2] Includes estimated receipts to date for 1995–96 financial year.

University Research Funding

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what arrangements are in place to ensure the continuation of "DevR" research funding for the universities in Northern Ireland. [2532]

Mr. Ancram: The developmental element of research funding for the Northern Ireland universities, NIDevR, is to extend until the end of the 1996–97 academic year. Following the outcome of the 1996 research assessment exercise, the Northern Ireland Higher Education Council, which advises Government on the planning and funding of higher education in Northern Ireland, will make recommendations on the totality of research funding for both universities beyond 1996–97.

Foyleside Centre

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what public funds have been allocated for the Foyleside centre, Northern Ireland; how much the total budget for the centre is, and if he will make a statement. [2909]

Mr. Moss: The allocation of public funds for the Foyleside centre in Northern Ireland comprised a grant of £7.5 million from the Department of the Environment urban development grant budget. The total budget for this centre including fitting-out costs is estimated at some £65 million.

EEC Payments

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much Northern Ireland's share of the United Kingdom's payments into the European Economic Community was from 1 January 1973 to date; how much Northern Ireland's share of the receipts was for the same period; and how much of those receipts was used to offset Government expenditure in Northern Ireland. [2482]

Sir John Wheeler: It is not possible to determine Northern Ireland's actual share of the United Kingdom's contribution to the European Community because payments are made on a national and not a regional basis. Similarly, it is not possible to identify the full extent of receipts from the Community. However, a Northern Ireland attributed share of the contribution to the EC is calculated as an accounting mechanism necessary because of the operation of a separate Northern Ireland Consolidated Fund. This notional attributed share does not count as an item of expenditure within the Northern Ireland public expenditure programme and has therefore no bearing on the level of public expenditure in the Province.

Figures for the notional attribution of part of Northern Ireland's share of the United Kingdom's payments and for those areas where the receipts from the European Community's structural funds can be separately identified are as follows:

£ million

Financial year	Attributed share (part)	[2]Identified receipts
1973–74	1	0
1974–75	6	4
1975–76	8	4

1993–94	[1]171	185
1994–95	[1]173	157
Total	1,475	1,500

[1] Attributed share figures for the last two years are provisional estimates which will be revised when final details of tax revenues are determined.

[2] This comprises total identified EC Structural Funds and, from 1994–95, Financial Instrument for Fisheries Guidance receipts in Northern Ireland.

All receipts represent cash additions to the recipients and are subject to normal European Community audit arrangements and the requirements of government accounting.

The overall level of receipts is taken into account in the Government's decisions on public expenditure allocations and their availability enables public expenditure to be maintained at a higher level that would otherwise be feasible.

Structural Funds

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much money Northern Ireland has received in each financial year from EEC sources apart from payments under the three structural funds. [2483]

Sir John Wheeler: The following amounts have been identified as being received in Northern Ireland from European Community sources other than the three structural funds since 1987–88 when meaningful figures first became available.

Financial year	Total £ million
1987–88	27.6
1988–89	27.8
1989–90	46.0
1990–91	48.0
1991–92	59.5
1994–95	114.7

These receipts are from the guarantee section of the European Agricultural Guidance and Guarantee Fund. However, it should be noted that the bulk of guarantee section receipts are disbursed centrally by the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce and details of payments are not generally maintained at regional level. Other small payments are made by the European Commission direct to recipients which are not passed through the United Kingdom Government.

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much money has been received by Northern Ireland under each of the European Community initiatives to date. [2481]

Sir John Wheeler: Under the 1989 to 1993 structural funds allocation, Northern Ireland had 11 approved Community initiatives. The amounts received to date under each initiative are:

Initiative	£ million
Interreg I (assistance to border areas)	26.90
Stride (research and technological development)	8.55
Envireg (environmental improvement)	11.23
Prisma (assistance to firms)	3.41
Telematique (promotion of telecommunications service)	3.36
Euroform (qualifications and new skills, and employment opportunities)	1.63
Now (employment opportunities for women)	0.84
Horizon (handicapped and certain disadvantaged groups)	1.18
Retex I (diversification for textile regions)	1.45
Leader I (rural development)	2.26
Konver I (restructuring of defence-dependent areas)	0.25

Under the 1994 to 1999 structural funds allocation, eight of the nine Community initiative programmes benefiting Northern Ireland have been approved. The amounts to date under each initiative are:

Initiative	£ million
Interreg II (Promoting cross border areas)	5.94
Smes (small firms)	2.55
Retex II (diversification for textile regions)	1.54
Employment (addressing exclusion and marginalisation in the labour markets)	0.49
Adapt (industrial change)	0.13
Urban (developing selected urban areas)	5.65
Pesca (development of fishing areas)	—
Leader II (rural development)	0.64

Proposed Memorial Volume

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will arrange for the publication of a memorial volume relating to the Northern Ireland conflict, listing the names and details of those members and former members of the armed forces and the police who were murdered or died in accidents while serving since 1969, in Northern Ireland and elsewhere. [1407]

Sir John Wheeler: The Government have no plans, at present, to publish a memorial volume relating to the Northern Ireland conflict. A number of memorial volumes already exist in many military chapels and police stations across the Province, including a book of remembrance at St. Anne's cathedral in Belfast.

Departmental Targets

Ms Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the published recommended response times within which his Department is expected to reply to letters from the public. [3006]

Sir John Wheeler: The published recommended response time for the Northern Ireland Office and Northern Ireland Departments to reply to requests for information under the code of practice on open government is 20 working days.

Targets for replying to other letters from the public are published by the individual NI Departments and agencies as follows:

Department/Agency	Published target response time (working days)
Social Security Agency	7 for letters of complaint
Child Support Agency	10
Department of Agriculture	15
Valuation and Lands Agency	10
Department of the Environment:

Springvale Campus Project

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on how many occasions representatives of Planning, Industrial and Economic Development Advisers met representatives of the university of Ulster in the evaluation of the Springvale campus project on behalf of the Government; and whom they met and when. [1773]

Mr. Moss [holding answer 27 November 1995]: Representatives of PIEDA met with officials from the university of Ulster on five occasions. Details of the names of the university of Ulster officials and dates of the meetings are listed:

University of Ulster officials	Dates of meeting
Vice Chancellor and Senior Academic Officials	16 December 1994
B. Osborne	16 December 1994
Professor Wallace Ewart	16 December 1994
P. Donnelly	5 January 1995
Professor Wallace Ewart	13 June 1995

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which representatives of the local community representatives of PIEDA met in their evaluation of the Springvale campus project on behalf of the Government; and on what dates they met. [1774]

Mr. Moss [holding answer 27 November 1995]: PIEDA did not meet local community representatives as part of its assignment.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which representatives of the Government representatives of PIEDA met in their evaluation of the Springvale campus project on behalf of the Government. [1775]

Mr. Moss [holding answer 27 November 1995]: PIEDA met senior officials at grade 5 level from the Departments of Education, of Finance and Personnel and of the Environment and the Northern Ireland Office in its evaluation of the Springvale campus project. These officials make up the steering group which was chaired by T. McCusker from Making Belfast Work.

T. Quinn, P. Hewitt: Department of Finance and Personnel

J. Cowan: Department of the Environment (NI)

P. Holmes, R. Davison: Department of the Education (NI)

D. Gibson: Department of Economic Development

D. Brown: Northern Ireland Office.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much PIEDA's evaluation of the Springvale campus project has cost; and if there will be further cost. [1776]

Mr. Moss [holding answer 27 November 1995]: To date PIEDA's evaluation of the Springvale campus project has cost £82,263. A further payment of £40,000 will be made shortly.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Initial Teacher Training

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what funds will be available nationally for initial teacher training in 1996–97, and what funds were available in 1994–95 and in 1995–96. [23]

Mr. Robin Squire: The funds available for initial teacher training for 1996–97 are set out in the letter of 28 November from the Department to the Teacher Training Agency. A copy of this letter is in the Library.

Some £151.641 million has been notionally allocated for the funding of ITT courses. It is for the agency to decide on the distribution of funds between the activities that it supports.

In 1994–95, the Higher Education Funding Council for England allocated £141.587 million for the recurrent funding of ITT. In addition, the Department for Education and Employment spent approximately £1.259 million of the school-centred ITT-SCITT-scheme.

In 1995–96, the HEFCE allocated £53.91 million for ITT funding, for the final term of academic year 1994–95. The Teacher Training Agency has allocated £109.953 million for recurrent ITT funding for the first two terms of academic year 1995–96. In addition, the Department has provided £448,000 for funding for SCITT courses in 1995–96.

None of these figures includes student support, or the income from fees for students on ITT courses.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list the grant-maintained schools which have applied for consent for the disposal of premises, in each case stating (a) the nature of the premises, (b) if the premises were previously transferred from a local authority, (c) if the premises were used also by other schools, (d) if consent was given, (e) the proceeds from disposal, (f) the attribution of proceeds and (g) the purpose for which proceeds were used by the school. [2896]

Mr. Robin Squire: The information requested is contained in tables, copies of which have been placed in the Library. Table (a) contains the information for disposals by sale, including land exchanges, and table (b) contains disposals by lease and easement. The term "disposal" also covers compulsory purchase of school premises and payments "in kind". There have been no applications for the Secretary of State's consent involving either compulsory purchases or payments in kind.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what provision has been made in the 1996–97 budget for an increase in the number of grant-maintained schools, in terms of (a) capital and (b) current expenditure; [3712]

(2) what is the planned (a) current and (b) capital spending on grant-maintained schools in the years 1996–97 and 1997–98. [3734]

Mr. Squire: Recurrent provision for grant-maintained schools takes the form of annual maintenance grant and special purpose grants. Provision in 1996–97 and 1997–98 for annual maintenance grant—the bulk of recurrent funding for grant-maintained schools—will depend on school budget decisions yet to be taken by local authorities, and by the Department in respect of the common funding formula, and on the number of additional schools which become grant-maintained in these years. Within the overall provision of £103 million for GM recurrent in 1996–97, £86 million has been allocated to special purpose grants for grant-maintained schools. The planning figure for GM recurrent in 1997–98 is £125 million. This total, and within that the provision for special purpose grants, will be subject to review in the next public expenditure survey.

As regards capital, the Government have announced the allocation of £138 million to the Funding Agency for Schools for 1996–97. The planning figure for 1997–98 is now £134 million. These figures take into account the overall level of capital funds available for schools, the scope offered for work to be supported under the private finance initiative and, subject to parliamentary approval of the proposed legislation, the power which grant-maintained schools will in due course have to borrow on the commercial market. There is no separately identifiable provision for schools newly entering the grant-maintained sector.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate she has made of (a) the number and (b) proportion of (i) primary and (ii) secondary schools opting out of local authority control in the coming year. [3714]

Mr. Squire: The number of schools leaving local authority control in the coming year will depend on parental choices in ballots on grant-maintained status.

Special Needs

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many and what percentage of disabled children with special educational needs were in mainstream schools in each year since 1979. [3616]

Mr. Forth: Data are available only for the years 1984 to 1994, and for all children with statements of special educational needs. The data are provided in the table:

Pupils with statements of special educational need in mainstream schools

	1984	1985	1986	1987	1988	1989	1990	1991	1992	1993	1994
Number	1,815	26,014	30,047	33,277	40,931	47,262	54,299	61,992	71,246	85,013	100,254
Percentage of all pupils with statements	9.8	20.3	22.2	24.7	29.7	34.1	38.9	40.1	43.2	48.1	52.1

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many children in England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland have been awarded an assisted place in the years since 1990. [3504]

Mrs. Gillan: The numbers of children who were awarded and took up assisted places for the first time in England in each year since academic year 1990–91 are given in the table:

Assisted places scheme

Academic	Numbers of children taking up Assisted Places
1990–91	4,948
1991–92	5,602
1992–93	5,815
1993–94	5,775
1994–95	5,813

The total number of assisted place holders in England in the academic year 1994–95, including those who took up places for the first time in earlier years, was 29,747. Questions about the operation of the assisted places scheme in Scotland and Wales are for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Wales. There is no assisted places scheme in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Blunkett: to ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much is proposed to be spent on the assisted places scheme in 1995–96, and in each year to 1998–99. [3713]

Mrs. Gillan: Provision in the supply estimates for the assisted places scheme in England in the current financial year 1995–96 is £104.4 million. We have increased the planned spending for financial year 1996–97 to £118 million. Provisional figures for the following two years will be published in the departmental report. The actual outturn will depend on the number of acceptable bids from eligible schools for new places from September 1996, and on parental demand.

Diploma Directive

Dame Jill Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will add anything to his answer of 25 May 1994, Official Report, column 166, as to when he intends to issue a consultation document on the implementation of the Council directive for a second general system to supplement second diploma directive 89/48/EEC. [3551]

Mr. Forth: The preparation of legislation has proved not to be an easy task but is now at an advanced stage. We are hoping to take forward the process of consultation in the near future with legislation following.

Work Force Skills

Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how the £250 million announced in the "Financial Statement and Budget Report" for industry's efforts to improve the skills of the work force will be allocated. [3705]

Mr. Paice: The £250 million that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced on 28 November, Official Report, columns 684–88, will be used to support the following programmes:

> employer investment in people which enables TECs to help local businesses to improve their performance through the development of their people and, particularly, by achieving the investors in people standard;
> skills for small businesses which will improve the training skills of 24,000 key employees, who will lead the development of workforce skills in small firms across the country; and > career development loans which aid individuals to upgrade their vocational skills with accessible bank loans.

Literacy and Numeracy Centres

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what will be the cost of the project to raise standards of literacy and numeracy in primary schools in (i) 1996–97, (ii) 1997–98 and (iii) 1998–99. [3710]

Mr. Robin Squire: Up to £5 million will be made available to support the establishment of primary literacy and numeracy centres in 1996–97. Funding for later years will be decided in the light of each year's public expenditure settlement; it is expected that broadly similar sums will be available in 1997–98 and 1998–99.

Technology and Language Colleges

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what funding has been allocated for the 60 additional technology and language colleges announced on 28 November, Official Report, column 684. [3709]

Mrs. Gillan: The public expenditure settlement provides funding of some £23 million in 1996–97 to support technology and language colleges. This will support the 107 schools already designated as technology or language colleges, and around 60 schools which will be newly designated before or during 1996–97. The newly designated schools will be eligible for additional capital and recurrent funding in 1996–97 totalling some £11 million.

Student Loans

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when her Department asked the Contributions Agency to assess the feasibility and cost of collecting student loan repayments using the national insurance system on behalf of the Student Loan Company and the proposed private sector scheme; what costs were quoted for the first and subsequent years of operation and what these costs represent as a percentage of the total costs of running the social security deductions system; and if she will make a statement. [3615]

Mr. Bryan Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what discussions her Department has had with officials of the Department of Social Security regarding the use of the national insurance system to collect student loan repayments. [4014]

Mr. Forth: My officials, with the assistance of other Government Departments, have looked at this option on a number of occasions. There are fundamental objections of principle to collecting repayments via the Contributions Agency or Inland Revenue. Any such scheme would have significant implications for both employers and the collecting agency, in addition to the operational costs that the Student Loans Company would still incur in issuing and monitoring loans. For these reasons, no detailed analysis of the cost has been made.

Mr. Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if students who have been declared bankrupt will remain eligible for subsidised loans made by private sector lenders under the proposed reforms of student loans provision. [3923]

Mr. Forth: The Education (Student Loans) Act 1990 does not specifically prevent students classified as bankrupt from being eligible for a loan. Private lenders, who would bear a large share of the risk, would be free to accept loan applications from students, or not.

Mr. Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if it is her policy that private sector levels of subsidised student loans should be permitted to shorten the current loan repayment period if overall public sector subsidy per loan is held constant. [4054]

Mr. Forth: Contracts with the private lenders will set out minimum standards to be met to be eligible for subsidies. This will include a requirement that interest payments are no higher than the rate of inflation as measured by the retail prices index.

If a lender wishes to offer different terms, including a shorter repayment period and lower interest rates, that is a matter between it and the borrower. Our contracts will ensure that, in such cases, the public subsidy paid will have the same overall value to the taxpayer and to the student.

Mr. Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is her Department's estimate of the cost of establishing a new central database for the processing of student loans. [4056]

Mr. Forth: This work is being put out to tender. No estimate has been made at this stage.

School Meals (Beef Products)

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what guidance her Department has issued to local education authorities on the use of beef products in school meals; and if she will make a statement. [3662]

Mrs. Gillan: None, but both the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Department of Health have made public statements on the safety of beef products.

Communication Autistic Spectrum Disorders

Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many children of school age there are with communication autistic spectrum disorders, and how many places there are in schools appropriate for their needs (a) in London and (b) in England. [2710]

Mr. Robin Squire: This information is not held centrally.

Nursery Vouchers

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) how much of the £390 million over the next three years for nursery vouchers announced on 28 November (a) will be spent on administration costs and (b) will be spent on staff training and capital investment; [3743]

(2) if the £390 million over the next three years for nursery vouchers announced on 28 November is in addition to the £185 million announced in her statement to the House on 6 July, Official Report, columns 517–32; and what proportion of the £390 million will be spent in each of the three years; [3741]

(3) what proportion of the extra £390 million for nursery vouchers announced on 28 November will be channelled through local authorities; and what proportion will go to the private company appointed to administer the voucher scheme. [3742]

Mr. Robin Squire: The £390 million for the nursery education voucher scheme announced on 28 November is in respect of those four-year-olds who do not have a place in a maintained school, with £21 million for phase 1 in 1996–97 and £185 million for 1997–98 when the scheme is fully implemented and for the following year. It will be added to sums deducted from each LEA in respect of existing places for four-year-olds.

The Government's contract with Capita Managed Services Ltd. to administer phase 1 of the nursery voucher scheme was awarded after competitive tender. The financial details are commercially confidential. The contract for phase 2 will also be the subject of a competitive tender.

The proportion of the £390 million channelled through local authorities will depend on where new places are created.

The value of the voucher includes elements for training and the servicing of capital debt.

Educational Psychologists

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list by local education authority for each year since 1985 (a) the number of educational psychologists employed, (b) the ratio of educational psychologists to school children, (c) the number of children with statements and (d) to the ratio of children with statements to the school age population. [3627]

Mrs. Gillan: The available information is shown in the table:

Local Education Authority Staff

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many (a) teaching staff and (b) non-teaching staff were employed by the local education authorities throughout the United Kingdom and for each year since 1990; and if she will make a statement. [3626]

Mr. Robin Squire: Information on the numbers of teaching and non-teaching staff employed by local authorities is collected by a local government management board on behalf of the joint staffing watch group. The table provides information for England as at June of each year. The coverage of these figures does not reflect the 2,500 increase in teacher numbers in maintained schools between January 1994 and January 1995.

Full-time equivalent teaching and non-teaching staff[1] employed by local authorities in England—June 1990 to June 1995

	1990	1991	1992	1993	1994	1995[2]
Teaching	482,700	475,100	466,800	392,100	378,000	372,600
Non-teaching[3]	362,400	364,200	360,300	318,200	320,300	262,000

[1] The table includes all manual and non-manual staff whether employed in schools or centrally based. Staff employed by grant-maintained schools are excluded throughout. There was a growth of over 6,000 teaching staff in grant-maintained schools between January 1994 and January 1995. The figures for 1993 to 1995 exclude staff in colleges that transferred to the new FE sector in April 1993.

[2] As a result of changes to the survey form, the 1995 figures are on a different basis from other years. Previously the FTEs were estimated using national statistics of average hours worked. More reliable FTEs are now calculated by local authorities at employee level. Also, staff doing two or more jobs in an authority are now recorded for each job separately. After adjusting the 1994 data to allow for these changes the estimated differences between 1994 and 1995 FTEs are decreases of 3,600 and 5,200, for teaching and non-teaching staff respectively.

[3] Non-teaching staff include educational support, clerical, school meals and premises related staff employed in schools and colleges, together with central services and administration within the education service.

Jobseeker's Allowance

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what are the pilot areas for the trials on the implementation of the jobseeker's allowance; and what is being undertaken in each pilot area. [3799]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Keith Bradley, dated 4 December 1995:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question about Jobseeker's Allowance trial offices.

Jobseeker's Allowance implementation trials are currently taking place in Employment Service Jobcentres (ESJ) in the following locations:

Exeter, Barnstable, Newton Abbott (all in Devon)

Alnwick, Jarrow (North East)

Porthmadog, Cardiff (Wales)

Norwich (Norfolk)

Madeley (Shropshire)

Cheetham Hill (Manchester)

Goole (Humberside)

Bathgate (Edinburgh)

Additional trials will be undertaken in an ESJ in Tottenham, North London commencing 4th December.

These offices are examining various Jobseeker's Allowance processes under current legislation, including new claims, fortnightly job search reviews, enquiries and change of circumstances. The outcomes from these trials will inform the Jobseeker's Allowance project nationally and locally.

I hope this is helpful.

Publicity

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list the expenditure on publicity by her Department in 1994–95 and 1995–96 broken down into spending on (a) television, (b) radio, (c) newspapers and (d) other matters; and what is the protected spending on publicity in 1996–97. [3983]

Mr. Robin Squire: Before the merger in July 1995, the Department operated separately as the Department for Education and the Employment Department. We will continue to follow separately funded programmes of publicity until the end of the financial year 1995–96.

Expenditure on publicity by the Department is:

	ED	DFE
1994–95
(a) Television	2,778.3	—
(b) Radio	441.6	—
(c) Newspapers and posters	3,257.8	147.1
(d) Other matters	2,528.4	7,941.2
1995–96 (estimated)
	2,906.1	—
(a) Television	—	—
(b) Radio	3,376.7	300
(c) Newspapers and posters	1,312.6	5,130
(d) Other matters	—	—

The projected spending on publicity in the 1996–97 public expenditure survey allocation for the Department is £13,040,000. Details on how this will be divided between various forms of publicity have not yet been agreed.

Consultation Papers

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list the consultation papers that have been issued by her Department since 31 July, indicating in each case (a) the date on which the consultation paper was issued, (b) what consultation period was allowed in weeks and (c) if the consultation period was subsequently extended and by how long. [4000]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department for Education and Employment has issued the following consultation papers since 31 July 1995:

Proposed Amendment to the Teacher Regulations and Guidance on the use of Supply Teachers. Issued on 17 November, consultation period—10 weeks. No current plans to extend consultation period.

The Education (School Premises) Regulations 1995—Draft Regulations and Circular. Issued on 14 August, consultation period—nine and a half weeks. The period was not extended.

Quality Assurance Regime for Institutions which Redeem Vouchers for Pre-School Education. Issued on 4 September, consultation period—six weeks. The period was not extended.

Removing the Requirement to Publish Statutory Proposals to Establish Nursery Classes in the Maintained Sector. Issued on 26 September, consultation period—four weeks. The period was not extended.

Commercial Borrowing and Asset Disposal by GM Schools. Issued on 10 October, consultation period—six weeks. The period was not extended.

Self-Government for Voluntary Aided Schools. Issued on 27 October, consultation period—four weeks. The period was extended by one week.

Consultation Letter to Industrial Training Organisations, Lead Bodies and Occupational Standards Councils on working relationships with Sector Partners. The aim was to set-up a series of conferences on: 28 November, 11 December, 14 December and 19 December. Issued on 19 October, consultation period—five and a half weeks. The period was not extended.

Consultation Proposals to Allow Easier Access to Schools' National Curriculum Assessments Results. Issued on 30 October, consultation period—six weeks. No current plans to extend consultation period.

A Common Funding Formula for Grant-Maintained Schools, 1996–97: The Top-slice. Issued on 3 October, consultation paper—four weeks. The period was not extended.

Consultation Paper on Calculating the Primary/secondary Split. Issued on 5 September, consultation period—four weeks. The period was not extended.

Consultation Paper on Standardising the Pupil Count and Pupil Contingency. Issued on 6 October, consultation period—four weeks. The period was not extended.

Consultation Paper on Other Common Funding Formula Issues. Issued on 31 October, consultation period—four weeks. The period was not extended.

Consultation Paper on Proposed Allocation Formula. Issued on 29 November, consultation period—three weeks. No current plans to extend consultation period.

Consultation Letter on Training for Appeal Committee Members for Admission and Exclusion. Issued on 27 November, consultation period—three weeks. No current plans to extend consultation period.

Draft Planning Guidance for TECs and Careers Service 1996–97. Issued on 6 October, consultation period—three weeks. The period was not extended.

Consultation Letter on Proposed Regulations Affecting Entitlement to JSA of People Undertaking Voluntary Work While Unemployed. Issued on 11 August, consultation period—six weeks. The period was not formally extended, however, the last response was accepted on 26 September.

Future Arrangements for the Secretary of State to Receive Local Advice and Assistance on the Employment of People with Disabilities. Issued on 9 October, consultation period—12 weeks. No current plans to extend consultation period.

Criteria for Severely Disabled People entering the Employment Service's Supported Employment Programme. Issued on 25 October, consultation period—14 weeks. No current plans to extend consultation period.

Local Advisory Arrangements. Issued in October, consultation period—nine weeks. No current plans to extend consultation period.

Draft Leaflet for Parents on School Attendance. Issued on 29 August, consultation period—four and a half weeks. The period was not extended.

Letter Inviting Comments on the Proposed Collection of Exclusion Appeals Data. Issued on 28 September, consultation period—four weeks. This period was not extended.

Letter to Governors of Stratford Schools about use of Powers to Replace First Governors. Issued on 3 November, consultation period—one and a half weeks. The consultation period could have been extended, however, no extension was requested.

Consultation on the Main Proposals Contained in the Report Produced by the North East London Education Association on the Future of the Hackney Downs Schools. Issued on 31 October, consultation period one and a half weeks. The period was not extended.

Unemployment (Waveney)

Mr Berry: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is her most recent estimate of the level of unemployment in Waveney; and if she will make a statement on the measures she proposes to take to reduce it. [3845]

Mr. Forth: On 12 October 1995, the latest date for which figures are available, the number of unemployed people in Waveney was 4,580.

The local offices of the Employment Service provide a wide range of programmes to assist jobseekers to find work. Norfolk and Waveney training and enterprise council provides a range of training programmes for adults and young people, including a programme specific to Waveney offering practical training in skills for the offshore industries. The TEC, in conjunction with the local authority, offers an incentive scheme for those who start up new businesses in the area. These opportunities, together with our overall policy aim of achieving sustainable low inflation growth, are the best way of achieving a reduction in unemployment.

Code of Practice (Consultation)

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when she expects to draw up a code of good practice on consultation along the lines recommended by the efficiency scrutiny on the administrative burden on schools. [4001]

Mr. Robin Squire: Work on the code of practice is due to start shortly. As my officials need to consult widely on the content, it will not be generally available until next year.

Suffolk Training and Enterprise Council

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment she has made of the accuracy of the published information on the value of Suffolk TEC's contract with the Employment Department in the financial year 1994–95; and if she will make a statement. [4190]

Mr. Paice: The published figure is incorrect. The value of Suffolk TEC's budget in the financial year 1994–95 was overstated by £4.52 million: the correct figure should be £15.6 million. This error was caused by a change to the method by which the TEC's youth credits programme was funded, midway through the year.

This led to a clerical error when part of the budget was double counted. I should stress that this was purely an administrative error and at no time were public funds at risk. The administrative systems have now been changed to ensure that this mistake cannot be repeated.

College Fees

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans she has for the future handling of college fees at the universities of Durham, Kent, Lancaster and York. [4192]

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has accepted that the funds paid in college fees to the universities of Durham, Kent, Lancaster and York should be paid to those universities as part of their funding council grant. The constitutional independence of St. Chad's college, St. John's college and Ushaw college from the university of Durham precludes the transfer of college fees in their case. The Higher Education Funding Council for England has been asked to advise my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on the annual adjustment of their college fees in future.

Lifetime Learning

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make a statement on lifetime learning. [4181]

Mr. Paice: I shall be publishing tomorrow a consultation document on lifetime learning. Copies will be placed in the Library.

Building a culture of lifetime learning is crucial both to sustaining our international competitiveness and to the quality of our national life. It is a shared enterprise between Government, employers, individuals, and education and training providers. The document invites views from a wide range of interested parties by 26 February 1996 on how together we can set a course for achieving the national targets for lifetime learning, building on the progress already achieved.

Written Answers to Questions

Tuesday 5 December 1995

WALES

Chiropody Services, Clwyd

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the adequacy of chiropody services provided in Clwyd; and if he will make a statement. [2664]

Mr. Richards: The provision of chiropody services in Clwyd is a matter for Clwyd district health authority. I have made no separate assessment of the adequacy of chiropody services provided there.

Departmental Targets

Ms Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the published recommended response time within which his Department is expected to reply to letters from the public. [3001]

Mr. Hague: The target time for replying to letters from Members of the House is 12 working days. The target time for replying to all other correspondence is 15 working days.

North East Wales Training and Enterprise Council

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what level of funding has been made available to North East Wales TEC for work in townships which have lost steelmaking; and if he will make a statement. [2920]

Mr. Richards: In October 1990 the Welsh Office announced a substantial package of measures to mitigate the effects of the closure of the Brymbo steelworks. This included the allocation of an additional £260,000 to the North East Wales TEC. In addition, it has been able to utilise the resources made available each year by the Welsh Office to support the creation of new businesses and jobs in north-east Wales and to deliver training to enhance the skills of he local labour force. An example of this is the support which the TEC has been able to provide to local employers in establishing the new twin-sited engineering and manufacturing training centre at Yale college, Wrexham, and at Deeside college, Shotton.

Alltami Bypass

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will advance the date of construction of the Alltami bypass; and if he will make a statement. [4017]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Proposals for an Alltami bypass form part of the A494 Mold-Ewloe improvement. This scheme is included in the "longer term consideration" pool of the forward trunk road programme published in the Welsh Office's departmental report, Cm 2815, on 9 March 1995. My right hon. Friend is to announce roads and transport expenditure plans for 1996–97 shortly.

Housing

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will meet the Resident's Association Western Park, Buckley, to discuss his allocation of housing moneys 1996–97 for the modernisation and repair of social housing. [4019]

Mr. Hague: I have no plans to do so. It is for local authorities to decide how to set spending priorities for their housing stock within the resources available to them.

Long-Term Unemployment

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many long-term unemployed there are in each of the constituencies in Wales. [3859]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The data requested are available from the NOMIS database, which can be accessed by the staff of the Library of the House.

Buckley Inner Relief Road

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects the Buckley, Clwyd inner relief road to begin construction; what is its costs when it will be completed; and if he will make a statement. [4016]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: This scheme is the responsibility of Clwyd county council.

Cancer

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people died of cancer in Anglesey, Gwynedd and Wales in each of the last five years for which figures are available; and what are these figures as a proportion of average United Kingdom figures. [2354]

Mr. Richards: The figures for 1990 to 1994 are given in the table. Data for 1993 and 1994 are provisional. Deaths for 1992 and earlier years represent registrations in each year; from 1993 they represent occurrences in each year. New procedures adopted by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys for coding cause of death from 1993, and the absence of medical inquiries, mean that figures for 1993 onwards may not be exactly comparable with those for earlier years. For most conditions, however, including neoplasms, the effects of these changes are small. Further details may be found in OPCS series DH2 for 1993, No. 20, which was published in October 1995. A copy is available in the Library of the House.

The proportions given in the table have been derived by calculating the relevant standardised mortality ratios.

Oil Spillage

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the number and the species of bird that have (a) been discovered oiled and (b) died as a result of the recent oil spillage in Carmarthen bay, south Wales. [4202]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: No complete data are available. Estimates based on information so far received by the Countryside Council for Wales show the following effects:

Species	Number found	Dead
Common Scoter	323	232
Guillemot	13	7
Razorbill	2	1
Total	338	240

Ministerial Visits

Mr Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many official school visits the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones), has undertaken since 1 April; how and when in each case (a) the county council, where the school was non-grant maintained and (b) the hon. Member in whose constituency the school was located, was informed; and if he will make a statement. [4175]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Six. Arrangements are normally made direct with the school and the convention regarding constituency Members of Parliament is observed.

PRIME MINISTER

Lockerbie

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will discuss with the Secretary General of the Arab League the proposal by the Government of Libya to hold a trial in the Hague, under a Scottish judge, under Scottish rules of evidence, of the two Libyans accused of the bombing of Pan AM 103 over Lockerbie. [2208]

The Prime Minister: I have no plans to do so.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 5 December 1995. [2558]

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 5 December. [2559]

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Prime Minister if he will break down the estimates given in his financial statement of the value of the private finance initiative schemes expected to be finalised in 1995–96, 1996–97 and 1997–98 by sponsoring Government Department. [3780]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 4 December 1995]: The capital value of Departments' private finance initiative schemes expected to be agreed in (a) 1995–96 and (b) the three years 1996–97 to 1998–99 are set out in the table. These forecasts are based on departmental estimates. The actual sums involved and precise timing of schemes will depend on the nature of the contractual processes.

Consultants

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list those (a) consultants, (b) outside organisations and (c) individuals employed by his Department each year since 1990, indicating the purposes of their employment and the total payments made to them. [3971]

The Prime Minister: For these purposes my Office is part of the Cabinet Office, Office of Public Service and its agencies. Total numbers of staff can be found in the civil service staff in post summary tables which have been placed in the Library. Staff costs are published in the Cabinet Office departmental report. It is not possible to provide the other information requested without disproportionate cost.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Ministerial Travel, London

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many times in the last year he has used London Buses while on official business; [428]

(2) how many times in the last year he has used the London Underground while on official business. [573]

Mr. Lilley: I have occasionally used both London Buses and the London Underground when travelling to and from the Department of Social Security but have not done so this year while on official business.

Child Support Agency

Mr. Mills: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to change the Child Support Agency rates regarding the calculation of ex-husband obligations; and if he will make a statement. [2579]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The child support maintenance formula is based on income support benefit rates. The rates in protected income for non-householders' housing costs are based on the non-dependent deductions under housing benefit rules. The relevant amounts will increase form April 1996, as announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in his statement on Wednesday 29 November, Official Report, columns 1212–15.

The formula will continue to ensure that no absent parent is assessed to pay more than 30 per cent. of his net income in current maintenance.

Mr. Mills: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to improve the client communications of the Child Support Agency; and if he will make a statement. [2674]

Mr. Mitchell: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the chief executive, Miss Ann Chant. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Ann Chant to Mr. Iain Mills, dated 30 November 1995:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about the Child Support Agency's client communications.

I understand that you may have some specific concerns about a particular case and if that is so I would be happy to look at those for you.

Earlier this year the Child Support Agency reviewed its procedures for dealing with Members enquiries. We looked carefully at our procedures and concluded that not only should we issue a revised set of guidelines to staff on how to deal with enquiries from Members but that we should use those improved guidelines to form the basis of a training brief to raise staff awareness about the important role that MPs play in our business. The training brief is currently being piloted.

The guidelines place the responsibility for providing accurate and comprehensive replies to MP enquiries firmly with the section responsible for that part, or parts, of child support business about which the MP has expressed concern. The guidelines also make it clear that promises of future action and monitoring that action also lies with the section giving that undertaking.

Our business plan makes it clear that we aim to reply to MPs' letters within an average of 20 working days from the date of receipt, with acknowledgments sent within 2 working days. Where a Member contacts one of our Centres by telephone using the specially designated 'MPs hot-line' (set up in late 1993 to meet Members concerns about the speedy resolution of very difficult constituency cases), we aim to return the call within 24 hours with a full explanation made to timescales agreed with the Member or his or her secretary. The time taken to give a full explanation will obviously depend on the individual circumstances of the case but it is important that dialogue continues until the case is cleared to the Member's satisfaction. I would be very interested to know if our procedures are not working properly and are failing to deliver the sort of service we want to offer to MPs.

Where a client contacts one of our centres the call is routed to a team of operators who are trained in all aspects of child support work and who in the vast majority of cases, provide a one stop service to callers. The introduction of these dedicated telephone teams has been very successful, with more than 1 million calls answered since April 1995. The placing of incoming calls to a dedicated section releases staff working in business areas to concentrate on core business activities. In those cases where the team are unable to deal with a particularly complex enquiry then details are taken and passed to the relevant section for a reply. The complexity of our work makes it impracticable for one member of staff to have complete knowledge of every aspect of our business. We do know however, that most of our clients would prefer to have contact with fewer members of staff and we are looking at how best this might be achieved, perhaps by actioning cases within a smaller team of people.

I hope this information is helpful to you, but once again if you have a particular case in mind please do not hesitate to write to me.

Departmental Targets

Ms Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the published recommended response times within which his Department is expected to reply to letters from the public. [3005]

Mr. Burt: There is no published recommended response time for the Department as a whole. The charters of the Benefits, Contributions, Child Support and War Pensions agencies state that these agencies aim to reply to correspondence from the public within 10 working days of receipt.

Maternity and Funeral Expenses

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the definition of the terms "maternity expenses" and "funeral expenses" used in section 138 (1)(a) of the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Roger Evans: Help with maternity expenses and funeral expenses may be given only from the regulated fund. I have today issued additional guidance to social fund officers on the interpretation of the terms "maternity expenses" and "funeral expenses".

The Benefits Agency has issued a bulletin to all district offices notifying them of the new guidance, which will be incorporated in a amendment to the social fund guide as soon as possible.

Details of the guidance have been placed in the Library.

Industrial Injuries

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what response he will make to the recommendations of the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council regarding disorders of the knee and occupational rhinitis. [4706]

Mr. Roger Evans: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has given careful consideration to the recommendations in the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council's reports, Cm 2842 and 1843. The Government accept in full the council's recommendation in respect of occupational Rhinitis that the terms of the current prescription should be more precise and brought into line with current scientific thinking. Regulations will be laid to implement the change from March 1996.

The Government note the council's conclusion that there is insufficient scientific evidence available at present to recommend adding disorders of the knee to the list of prescribed diseases for which industrial injuries disablement benefit can be paid.

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects to receive the report from the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council concerning the regulations relating to chronic bronchitis and emphysema. [4070]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State to the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) on 24 October 1995, Official Report col 627.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received concerning his proposals to limit benefits to people seeking asylum in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [3972]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: Proposals on social security payments to asylum seekers and other persons from abroad were presented to the Social Security Advisory Committee on 11 October. The committee has carried out a public consultation on these proposals and is now evaluating the responses to that consultation and we expect to receive its report during December. We have also received a number of items of correspondence, both from Members of Parliament and from the public.

State Pension

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is (a) the mean and (b) the median state pension received by (i) married women, (ii) widows and (iii) single women. [1845]

Mr. Heald [holding answer 24 November 1995]: The information is set out in the table:

£ per week

	Married women	Widows	Single women
Median	34.80	60.25	58.16
Mean	36.43	63.00	55.59

Benefits Agency

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will instruct the Sheffield office of the Benefits Agency to withdraw its letter, "Urgent-Benefit Leaving", of 31 October 1995; [3477]

(2) if he will ensure that all applicants for benefit under the urgent case regulations are informed of the provisional nature of the announced changes. [3478]

Mr. Roger Evans: The administration of income support is a matter for Mr. Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Paul Flynn, dated 4 December 1995:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Questions asking for the Benefits Agency's Sheffield office to withdraw its letter "Urgent-Benefit Leaving" of 31 October and if the Secretary of State will ensure that all applicants for benefit under the Urgent Case Regulations are informed of the provisional nature of the announced changes.

The letter issued to certain customers in Sheffield advising them that from 8 January 1996 they would not be entitled to benefit under the Urgent Cases Regulations was issued in error as a result of a misunderstanding by the office of the guidance issued by the Branch responsible for Income Support. The error was discovered and the letter withdrawn within 48 hours. Further guidance has been issued to clarify the position to all District Offices and a letter of apology sent to the customers involved.

As legislation is not currently in place it is not appropriate to advise those customers receiving benefit under the Urgent Cases Regulations of the Secretary of State's proposals as details are subject to change. As soon as the legislation is in place, the Income Support awards for customers affected by the changes will be passed to an Adjudication Officer to consider a review. Customers will then be informed of the Adjudication Officer's decision and their subsequent right of appeal.

I hope this reply is helpful.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Careers Service

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the estimated cost of the proposed expansion of the Careers Service; and to what that expenditure will be allocated. [3711]

Mr. Paice: Planned expenditure on the Careers Service is set to rise to £201 million in 1996–97 exclusive of VAT—an increase of £49 million against the expenditure in 1994–95. From April 1994, extra funds have been provided for careers guidance for 13 to 14 year olds. From April 1995 further funds were provided to enhance the quality and coverage of careers guidance for young people from age 13 to 18 as well as for the training of careers advisers and careers teachers.

Employment Data

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will publish the percentage of non-employment among adult males with only basic education in 1979 and in 1995; and the same figures for the other Group of Seven member countries; and if she will make a statement. [3624]

Mrs. Angela Knight: I have been asked to reply.

International comparisons on this basis are not available. However, information on International Labour Organisation unemployment rates for those aged between 25 and 64 with qualifications below upper secondary level in 1992 is available in table R21 of the OECD publication, "Education at a Glance", a copy of which is available in the Library.

Mr. Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will publish the percentage of the labour force with only basic education in the United Kingdom in 1979 and in 1995, and the same figures for the other Group of Seven member countries; and if he will make a statement. [3628]

Mrs. Knight: I have been asked to reply.

The international comparisons requested are not available. However, comparisons of labour force participation rates of those with qualifications below upper secondary level in 1992 are available in table C11 in the OECD publication, "Education at a Glance", a copy of which is available in the library.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

British Academy for Sport

Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when the consultation paper on the British Academy for Sport will be published. [4532]

Mr. Sproat: The Great Britain Sports Council today published the consultation paper on the British Academy for Sport. I have placed a copy in the Library of the House. Copies of the consultation paper are available from the Sports Council at 16 Upper Woburn Place, London WC1H OQP. The purpose of the consultation paper is to promote debate about the details of the structure, siting, management and activities of the academy. The closing date for responses is 31 January 1996. Following this date, the Government wish to encourage application by different groups of sporting, commercial and other public and private interests—possibly in the form of a charitable trust to establish and run the academy. Up to £100 million from the national lottery could be available for capital costs of the academy and, if appropriate, an endowment to provide future revenue costs.

The decision in principle to establish a British Academy for Sport was set out in the policy document, "Raising the Game", published on the 14 July 1995. The academy forms one part of an overall strategy for sport in the United Kingdom, set out in the policy document, for which the other two parts are the restoration of sport in school, with strong emphasis on competitive team games, and the development and strengthening of local sports clubs and their links with local schools.

TREASURY

Valued Added Tax (Utilities)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will list the privatised utilities which charge VAT on advance charge bills; and what estimate he has made of the revenue raised for public funds from this procedure; [2856]

(2) if he will estimate the revenue raised by the Exchequer from the imposition, by British Telecom, of VAT on advance charge telephone bills. [2857]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Basic VAT law provides that tax is due when a VAT invoice is issued or a payment is received in respect of any taxable supply made by a VAT registered trader, if this happens in advance of delivery of the goods or services concerned. The rule applies to privatised utilities in the same way as to other businesses, and to telephone standing charges in the same way as to any other advance charges. No central records are kept of the numbers of trades or the amounts of revenue involved. The amount of VAT paid by an individual trader is a matter of commercial confidence.

Home Care Agencies

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost to public funds of removing VAT on fees charged by private domestic home care agencies. [3619]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 4 December 1995]: There are no figures available to allow an estimate to be made.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to abolish VAT on fees charged by private domestic home care agencies. [3620]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 4 December 1995]: Home care services provided by commercial agencies using medically qualified staff are already exempt from VAT. I announced on 9 October that in certain circumstances where agencies used unqualified staff, they need not charge VAT, provided that there is an appropriate measure of supervision by qualified medical professionals. Customs and Excise is currently holding discussions with representatives of the home care industry to agree the details of this change.

Share Ownership

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of the value of total share, and their total value, were owned by individuals (a) in the latest year for which figures are available and (b) in each year since 1970. [4046]

Mrs Angela Knight: The available information is given in the table.

The table is derived from the publication, "Share Ownership, a Report on the Ownership of Shares at 31st December 1994", produced by the Central Statistical Office and published on 4 December 1995. The publication will be available in the House of Commons Library shortly.

Individuals' ownership of shares in companies quoted on the London stock exchange

Year (at 31 December)	1975	1981	1989	1990	1991	1992	1993	1994
Percentage	37.5	28.2	20.6	20.3	19.9	20.4	17.7	20.3
Value (pounds billion)	16.7	28.0	104.3	90.5	105.3	125.4	141.1	154.6

1. The apparent trend in the series is effected, particularly for the earlier data, by sampling errors and varying degrees of success in the identification of nominee holdings.
2. The series reflect shares held directly by individuals, including those held in personal equity plans, but exclude those held indirectly for example in unit trusts.

EU Budget Contributions

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the net contribution to the EEC by the United Kingdom for each year from 1990 and up to 2001; and what estimate he has made of the respective contribution made by (a) the United Kingdom and (b) other EU countries in this period. [1028]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Government's most recent estimates of the United Kingdom's net contributions to European Community institutions for the financial years 1989–90 to 1994–95, together with the forecast of our contributions up to 1998–99 are set out in the first table. Recent estimates for later years are not available; the Government do not produce such estimates on a regular basis since they are of limited value and need to be treated with particular caution.

The second table sets out indicative net contributions in mecu for all member states for the period 1990–1994. These figures are drawn from the relevant annual report of the European Court of Auditors. The Government do not produce forecasts of the comparative contributions of the member states.

Note:
Administration costs are not fully allocated by member states in the Court of Auditors report. Allocation of administrative spending would be likely to increase the receipts of member states, but particularly for Belgium and Luxembourg, and so reduce the member states' net contributions.

Public Duties (Tax Relief)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will list the individuals for whom exceptional arrangements beyond those indicated in the "Inland Revenue Guide to Benefits and Expenses", booklet 480, applies in connection with their public duties and those of their spouse; how, and under what authority, the additional allowances are arrived at; and if he will make a statement; [331]

(2) if he will list the tax deductions and reliefs in connection with public duties of a taxpayer or of his or her spouse contained in the "Inland Revenue Guide to Benefits and Expenses", booklet 480; and what limit applies to each. [330]

Mr. Jack: The statutory provisions covering tax deductions and reliefs set out in the "Inland Revenue Guide to Benefits and Expenses", booklet 480, apply to employees and officeholders with public duties as much as to others. Section 10 of the booklet explains how expenses incurred by a spouse are treated. There are also statutory provisions to make sure that Members of Parliament qualify for relief on extra expenses they incur in staying overnight away from their only or main home for the purpose of carrying out their duties as Members and on the cost of making trips to certain institutions in the European Union.

Self-assessment (Small Businesses)

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the number of hours per week on average that small businesses will spend on the requirements of the new system of tax self-assessment. [3691]

Mr. Jack: The Inland Revenue undertook very extensive research into the likely impact of the self-assessment changes on the costs to businesses, particularly small businesses, of complying with their tax obligations. The detail of this research is contained in a compliance cost assessment which was published on 29 November 1994. A copy is available in the House Library. It concludes that once the new system has bedded in, costs overall will reduce. The amount will vary from business to business, but it broadly equates with annual savings overall of £125 million to £250 million, after taking account of employer's costs, or between £30 and £60 per year for a typical small business.

Financial Statement and Budget Report

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what considerations led to the inclusion of fewer statistics in table 4.4 of the "Financial Statement and Budget report 1996–97", than in the equivalent table 4A.1 for 1995–96. [3841]

Mr. Waldegrave: In terms of their coverage, both tables 4.4 and 4A.1 of this year's "Financial Statement and Budget Report" are unchanged from the presentation last year. Table 4.4 gives a summary presentation of the forecast of general Government receipts; table 4A.1 gives a more detailed exposition of the short-term forecast of receipts.

Ecofin

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Ecofin Council held on 27 November, giving details of all votes and of all decisions which were determined by unanimity or without dissension. [1973]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [holding answer 4 December 1995]: I represented the United Kingdom at the Economic and Finance Council of the European Union in Brussels on 27 November.

The only formal vote taken by the Council was a unanimous decision to adopt a regulation on the European system national and regional accounts, which will come into effect in 1999. The Council agreed to attach to the regulation a recommendation that where data was available member states should provide them from September 1998.

There was no Council support for a request by Germany that the Commission produce a study on the use of a reduced rate of VAT on the sale of agricultural produce as a means of compensating farmers affected by revaluations in the agri-monetary system.

All other issues at the Council were agreed without dissension.

The Council agreed the following: a report on the implementation of the broad economic guidelines; procedural conclusions on the reports by member states on measures being taken to combat fraud against Community funds; and a draft report on employment, jointly prepared by the Economic and Finance Council, the Social Affairs Council and the Commission. All these will be submitted to the Madrid European Council.

The Council discussed the reference scenario for the transition to a single currency, on which the Council will also report to the Madrid European Council. The Council agreed on the principle that fiscal stability after the beginning of the third stage of economic and monetary union was essential and that further work on achieving this will be required.

The Council discussed the arrangements for guaranteeing European investment bank loans to third world countries. The Council agreed that a decision to revise the guarantee system will be taken within twelve months following an EIB—Commission study. During the interim period current guarantee arrangements will continue.

The Council considered the recent defaults, by Georgia, Armenia and Tajikistan on EU loans granted in 1991 as part of a humanitarian aid package to the former Soviet Union. The Council asked the Commission to produce proposals for a grant aid operation from Community funds to resolve this problem.

The Council welcomed progress made by the Commission on an initiative to improve its financial management and working practices.

The Commission also presented the conclusions of a study into the effect of currency fluctuations on the internal market.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list all those in his Department who have authority to issue public interest immunity certificates; how many such certificates have been issued in each of the last five years; and what were the main reasons for them. [1431]

Mr. Hanley: A claim to public interest immunity relating to departmental documents or information is normally made by the appropriate Minister. There have been four cases in which certificates were used inter partes in proceedings:

(a) Two certificates signed the then Foreign Secretary, the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Hurd), in June 1991 and January 1992, in respect of a case of unfair dismissal brought in an industrial tribunal by a former FCO member of staff;

(b) Two certificates, signed in September 1992 by the then Minister of State, the right hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones) relating to the Matrix Churchill prosecution;

(c) Two certificates, signed by the then Minister of State, the hon. Member for Warwickshire, North (Mr. Maude) in June 1990 and by the then Minister of State, Lord Caithness, in February 1992, concerning the case of the extradition of Lorrain Osman to Hong Kong; and

(d) One certificate, signed by the then Foreign Secretary the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Hurd) in May 1995, in connection with the Ord-Tec appeal.

Algeria

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what changes in guidance have been given to the British embassy in Algeria regarding applications for political asylum. [3266]

Mr. Hanley: None.

Departmental Land

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the land owned in the United Kingdom by his Department. [3027]

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 4 December 1995]: Land at 245 Warwick road, London W8—0.8 hectares. All other land administered by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office or in the process of disposal is held in the name of the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Mrs. Parveen Akhtar

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the hon. Member for Walsall, North will receive a reply to his letter of 6 November, ref. 20802/95. [4111]

Mr. Hanley: The hon. Member's letter of 6 November about Mrs. Parveen Akhtar in Pakistan was sent to the Home Office, rather than the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, which would normally deal with correspondence of this type.

The Foreign Office received a copy of the letter on 1 December.

The Foreign Office migration and visa correspondence unit has asked our high commission in Islamabad for details of the case and will send the hon. Member a substantive reply by 8 December at the latest.

Sexual Offences Against Children (Checks)

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what procedures are available for organisations working with children to gain access to the names of British citizens convicted of sexual offences against children in (a) European Union member states and (b) other countries. [3379]

Mr. Maclean: I have been asked to reply.

Organisations working with children in the statutory sector and in parts of the voluntary and private sectors have access to pre-employment criminal record checks on their staff or volunteers. The check will reveal any record that the police may hold indicating that a person has been convicted of a sexual offence against children. This would include any information which had been received about overseas convictions of British citizens. Such information is often, but not always, supplied through Interpol by the authorities in the country of conviction.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Tobacco Industry

Mr. Hayes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many people were employed in the tobacco industry in the United Kingdom in (a) 1970, (b) 1975, (c) 1980, (d) 1985, (e) 1990 and (f) at the latest available date. [3982]

Mr. Page: The available information is in the table.

Patent Office

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the contractors who have submitted a bid for the Patent Office accommodation services, dispatch, support services and filestore; if he will make a statement on the criteria to be used to determine whether such bids offer better value for money; and if he will make a statement. [3496]

Mr. Ian Taylor: None of the 12 contractors invited to tender has yet put in a bid for the Patent Office accommodation services, dispatch, support services and filestore. Under the timetable laid down by the EC services directive, bids are not required until early January 1996. The criteria to assess value for money have been sent out in the invitation to tender. They are:

> quality of tenderers' proposal, commitment, monitoring and assurance procedures; tenderers' previous relevant experience; financial, commercial and technical capability; TUPE implications, such as proposals for the future of former civil service staff; recruitment, vetting and training procedures; conformance to Patent Office terms and conditions; overall price and pricing profile.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the time scale for the proposed contracting out of the marketing and information directorate, the London front office and the information technology sections; and how many staff are involved. [3495]

Mr. Taylor: No time scales have yet been set for these projects but the process is likely to be completed by autumn 1996. Up to 80 staff will be involved.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make it his policy to require any new work undertaken by the Patent Office to be subject to consultation with trades unions regarding the implications for staff; and if he will make a statement. [3497]

Mr. Taylor: It would be the usual practice of Patent Office management to consult staff and their representatives about any new work undertaken by the agency which has major implications for the staff.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what criteria will be used by Patent Office management to assess staff who have applied for voluntary redundancy; what number and grades will be involved; what time limits are applicable; and if he will make a statement about the future of the services currently offered by the Patent Office. [3498]

Mr. Taylor: Under the terms of its framework agreement, the Patent Office operates the Department's policies for retirement and redundancy. In its current voluntary severance exercise, the essential criterion has been the operational requirement of the office—whether there was a continuing need for a post now and in the foreseeable future and whether that post had to be filled by an established civil servant. Forty eight staff in the executive, clerical and support grades have accepted offers of voluntary severance. Sixteen appeals against refusal of severance terms are under consideration. Severance will take effect from 31 June 1996. The exercise is part of the Patent Office's continuing efforts to maintain and improve the efficiency and cost effectiveness of its service to customers.

Statutory Instruments

Mr. Steen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many statutory instruments his Department sponsored in the last Session of Parliament; and how many of these (a) constituted a new rule or regulation, (b) were introduced to implement European Community directives and (c) amplify the minimum standards set out in an original European Community directive. [2465]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 28 November 1995]: The Department of Trade and Industry sponsored 116 statutory instruments in the last Session of Parliament. It would be possible only at disproportionate cost to provide the further information requested, especially to identify from this total any cases in which the Government have acted on powers in the relevant EC legislation enabling member states to implement provisions going beyond the minimum standards set out in the directives. The Government's policy is, however, to ensure that implementing legislation imposes least cost and provides greatest certainty consistent with meeting our legal obligations.

Legislative Repeals

Mr. Steen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what legislation from his Department passed in the last five years contains provision for statutory repeal or review. [2031]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 27 November 1995]: The Coal Industry Act 1994 and the Gas Act 1995 contain provisions relating to the expiry of certain powers.

The Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994 introduced a new procedure for making deregulation orders to repeal or amend primary legislation where it imposes burdens which could be removed or reduced without removing necessary protection.

Chief Executive (Post Office)

Mr. Eastham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what final lump sum severance payment was paid to the chief executive of the Post Office on leaving that post. [2889]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 29 November 1995]: Mr. Cockburn, the former chief executive, received no severance pay on leaving the Post Office and waived any entitlement to salary in lieu of notice. However, he receives an annual pension under the rules of the Post Office staff pension fund—the Post Office staff superannuation scheme—which is based on his length of service, his age and his final salary. Under those rules he receives a lump sum payment equivalent to three times his annual pension. That lump sum payment was £285,542.

DEFENCE

Ashchurch Vehicle Storage Depot

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many "A" vehicles will be stored at his Department's centralised vehicle storage depot at Ashchurch; [3862]

(2) what assessment he has made of the impact on the local road network of centralising his Department's vehicle storage depot at Ashchurch; what is the maximum weight of Army vehicles using the local roads; and what assessment he has made of the consequences of transport of such vehicles over the Ashchurch road bridge; [3863]

(3) what discussions he has had with the local authority responsible for Newbury on the implications of transporting Army vehicles on the A34 through the centre of the town. [3864]

Mr. Soames: These matters are for the Army Base Storage and Distribution Agency, ABSDA, under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Brigadier K. J. W. Goad to Dr. David Clark, dated 5 December 1995:

The Secretary of State for Defence has asked me, as Chief Executive of the Army Base Storage and Distribution Agency, to respond to your recent Parliamentary Questions regarding the storage and movement of Army vehicles. My responses are detailed below:

"To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, what discussions he has had with the local authority responsible for Newbury on the implications of transporting Army Vehicles on the A34 through the centre of town".

When large vehicles are to be transported by road, the military authorities, where appropriate, clear the route in advance, with the respective authorities, such as Police, County Highway, British Water Board, British Rail, British Gas, etc. Such arrangements have been in operation, throughout the country, for many years.

As a general policy, we are seeking to increase the use of rail to move 'A' Vehicles but not all are within guage (for example Main Battle Tanks) and are therefore too large for rail movement. These must continue to be transported by road.

"To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, how many 'A' vehicles will be stored at his Department's centralised vehicle storage depot at Ashchurch."

The current planning figure for the number of vehicles to be stored at Ashchurch is 10106. 'A' vehicles make up a small but important part of this total. The majority of these vehicles will be placed in high density, long-term storage adopting a "leave it alone" policy.

"To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, what assessment he has made of the impact on the local road network of centralising his Department's vehicle storage depot at Ashchurch; what is the maximum weight of Army vehicles using the roads; and what assessment has he made of the consequences of transport of such vehicles across the Ashchurch road bridge."

Ashchurch has close and easy access to the M5 motorway and transportation of vehicles into and out of the depot will have little effect on the surrounding local road network. The largest vehicles that will be using the depot will be Main Battle Tanks. These vehicles with their transporters weigh 102 tonnes. The local authority are aware of this requirement and we do not anticipate any problems in the use of the Ashchurch road bridge.

I trust that my reply has fully answered your questions. If you have any further questions or require further clarification on any of the answers I have given, please contact me.

Hawk Aircraft

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which countries purchased Hawk aircraft from the United Kingdom in each of the past seven years; and to what military purposes they were deployed. [3643]

Mr. Arbuthnot: I refer the hon. Member to the answers I gave to the hon. Member for Ynys Mon (Mr. Jones) on 27 November, Official Report, column 488.

Royal Irish Regiment (Lisnaskea Base)

Rev. Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the Government's plans for the Lisnaskea Royal Irish Regiment base and St. Angelo's, Enniskillen. [3775]

Mr. Soames: The requirement for bases and installations is kept under continuous review. Following the announcement by my right hon. and learned Friend the Northern Ireland Secretary on 2 November that the Fermanagh Roulement Battalion would not be replaced when its six-month emergency tour ended, it was decided that the small number of Royal Irish Regiment soldiers based at the Lisnaskea Royal Ulster Constabulary station should operate in future from the recently refurbished Army base in Clogher. The buildings formerly occupied by these soldiers in Lisnaskea RUC station will, however, be maintained in case they are needed in future. It was also decided that the company of Royal Irish Regiment soldiers based at St. Angelo should in future operate from Grosvenor barracks, Enniskillen. Their former premises at St. Angelo will be demolished.

Rev. Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the threat posed by terrorists to the Lisnaskea Royal Irish Regiment base and to the people of the area. [3777]

Mr. Soames: The threat posed by terrorists is continually assessed by the Royal Ulster Constabulary. The armed forces remain fully committed to, and capable of, providing whatever support the RUC requires.

Weapons Dumps

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list all weapons dumped since 1995 west of the Hebrides showing (a) the date, (b) the amount (c) the sources and (d) the exact location. [3176]

Mr. Soames: Surviving records give no indication that weapons have been dumped west of the Hebrides since 1965.

Land Mines

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what new proposals he has to reduce worldwide fatalities caused by land mines; and what new restrictions he intends to put in place to avoid future death caused by mines that have time limited detonators or self destruct. [3644]

Mr. Arbuthnot: We want tighter international restrictions on the use and export of all anti-personnel mines to prevent their indiscriminate and irresponsible use and, thereby, to minimise the dangers posed to civilians. In particular, we are working towards incorporating such restrictions into a strengthened UN weaponry convention, protocol II of which, on mines, is currently under review internationally.

Defence Expenditure

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the percentage of United Kingdom spending on defence expressed as a percentage of gross domestic product in each of the past five years. [3645]

Mr. Soames: The percentage of UK gross domestic product spent on defence in each of the past give years is:

4.0	4.2	3.8	3.6	3.3

Recruitment Costs

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the average total recruitment cost for each new recruit to the (a) RAF, (b) Navy and (c) Army in each of the last five years. [3646]

Mr. Soames: My noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence will write to the hon. Member and a copy of the letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. David Hart

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if Mr. David Hart has declared any financial or other interest in any organisation potentially interested in or able to benefit from the proposed transfer of the Ministry of Defence married quarters' estate to the private sector. [4203]

Mr. Soames: All the independent advisers involved in our work on the transfer of ownership of the married quarters estate to the private sector have given formal undertakings designed to ensure that there is no conflict of interest in their involvement and that they have no financial stake in the outcome of the transaction.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the extent of the involvement of Mr. David Hart in (a) the formulation of his proposal to transfer the ownership of the Ministry of Defence married quarters' estate to the private sector and (b) discussions about this policy with NatWest Markets. [4204]

Mr. Soames: As my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces said in his answer of 22 March to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), Official Report, column 218, Mr. Hart is one of several independent advisers who have contributed to the development of proposals for the married quarters estate. His involvement has included, from time to time, participation in discussions on the proposed transfer of ownership with Ministers, officials, and others advising on the proposals, including NatWest Markets.

Eurofighter 2000

Sir David Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to take steps to procure a medium range air-to-air missile for Eurofighter 2000. [4482]

Mr. Arbuthnot: I am pleased to announce that we are today inviting competitive tenders for a medium range air-to-air missile for Eurofighter 2000. This weapon—the future medium-range air-to-air missile, FMRAAM—will give EF2000 a formidable beyond-visual-range capability, complementing the advanced short range air-to-air missile, ASRAAM, already on contract. We expect other European countries will join us in the tender assessment.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Colleges of Nursing and Midwifery

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern ireland what are the funding arrangements for the integration of the colleges of nursing and midwifery with the Northern Ireland universities. [2533]

Mr. Moss: It is proposed that the funding arrangements for the integration of the colleges of nursing and midwifery with the Northern Ireland universities will be taken forward within the joint declaration of principles agreed in July 1995 between the national health service executive and the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals of the universities of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made towards the integration of the colleges of nursing and midwifery with the Northern Ireland universities. [2534]

Mr. Moss: Considerable progress has been made towards the integration of the colleges of nursing and midwifery with the two Northern Ireland universities. The process has, however, taken longer than expected due to the need to clarify a number of issues with the parties concerned. However, my Department and the Department of Education for Northern Ireland expect to make an announcement in the new year. I can assure the hon. Member that I and my Department are committed to securing high quality education and training for nurses, midwives and health visitors in Northern Ireland.

Terrorism

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons convicted since 1974 for terrorist offences have subsequently re-offended on their release from prison. [2898]

Sir John Wheeler: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) on 4 July 1995, Official Report columns 157–58.

University Students

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his answer of 22 November 1995, Official Report, column 156, how many Northern Ireland students attend (a) Northern Ireland; and (b) Republic of Ireland universities; and how many there are in the same academic specialisms referred to in that answer. [3642]

Mr. Ancram: The numbers of Northern Ireland domiciled students enrolled at Northern Ireland universities in 1994–95 by academic specialism are as follows:

	Northern Ireland Universities
Medicine and dentistry	1,028
Subjects allied to medicine	2,047
Biological sciences	1,795
Veterinary sciences	14
Agriculture and related subjects	264
Physical sciences	1,346
Mathematical/computer sciences	1,991
Engineering and Technology	2,129
Architecture, building and planning	947
Social, economic and political students/law	3,720
Business and administrative studies	4,583
Librarianship and information science	365
Languages	1,022
Humanities	1,124
Creative arts	988
Education	2,010
Combined	1,962
Unknown	9
Total	27,344

In 1994–95 there were 816 Northern Ireland domiciled students enrolled at universities in the Republic of Ireland. A breakdown by academic specialism is not available.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Cabinet Committees

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will list the Cabinet committees he (a) chairs and (b) sits on. [3563]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton (Dr. Twinn), Official Report, 19 July 1995, column 1005.

HMSO

Mr. Caborn: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what plans he has to inform hon. Members of progress on the proposed privatisation of HMSO; and if he will make a statement. [3746]

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) on 27 November, Official Report, column 447.

Deregulation

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 22 November, Official Report, column 136, if he will list the salaries of the staff in the deregulation unit in 1994–95 and 1995–96. [4066]

Mr. Freeman: Details of the deregulation unit's staffing by grade are given in an organogram, form C, which is included as part of the unit's management information system for Ministers—MINIS—for 1994–95 and 1995–96 published by the Department of Trade and Industry, copies of which are in the House Libraries. Details of the salaries for the various grades are listed in the civil service management code which is also available in the House Libraries.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what estimate the deregulation task force has made of the number of regulations and enforcement measures upon which it has made recommendations which were introduced since 1979; and what information his office has received on this matter. [4069]

Mr. Freeman: The deregulation task force made 52 recommendations in its first annual report, of which the Government have accepted 46 in whole or in part. Many of the recommendations were of a general nature or related to an area of regulation rather than to specific regulations or enforcement measures. The task force has not sought to estimate how many of its more specific recommendations concerned regulations or enforcement measures introduced after 1979 as its aim has been to assist the Government in removing unnecessary burdens on business and the voluntary sector regardless of when they were introduced.

Ombudsman (Civil Service Guidance)

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he proposes to publish the Office of Public Service guidance for civil servants on the work of the ombudsman as recommended in the first report from the Select Committee on the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration of Session 1993–94, HC33. [4112]

Mr. Freeman: The guidance will take the form of a booklet, "The Ombudsman in Your Files". It will be circulated to Departments from 7 December 1995 and I will arrange for copies to be placed in the Libraries of the House at the earliest opportunity.

SCOTLAND

Executive Agencies (Overseas Travel)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each of his executive agencies for the last financial year in respect of overseas travel by staff of the agency (a) the cost, (b) the countries visited and (c) the posts held by the staff involved. [2365]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: As this question relates to a purely operational matter, my right hon. Friend has asked the chief executive of his agencies to write direct to the hon. Member.

Letter from Michael Ewart to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 5 December 1995:

Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question about overseas travel.

The Scottish Court Service became an executive agency on 3 April 1995. Since then, no member of staff has travelled abroad on official business.

Letter from K. MacRae to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 5 December 1995:

In response to the Written PQ which you tabled recently, the Secretary of State for Scotland has asked me to provide you with information about overseas travel by staff of the Student Awards Agency for Scotland.

It is not part of the normal business of the Student Awards Agency for Scotland to require staff to travel abroad. For financial year 1994–95, therefore, the answer is nil.

I trust this is the information you were seeking.

Letter from Norman MacLeod to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 5 December 1995:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your Question about overseas travel by staff of executive Agencies, so far as the Scottish Office Pensions Agency is concerned.

None of the staff of this Agency have so far been required to travel overseas on official business.

Letter from Dr. R. K. M. Hay to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 5 December 1995:

You asked the Secretary of State for Scotland for details of the overseas travel undertaken by staff in his executive agencies in the last financial year. I have been asked to reply in respect of the Scottish Agricultural Science Agency since travel by staff at this Agency is a matter for which I, as Chief Executive, have a delegated responsibility.

The attached list sets out the posts held by officials at SASA who travelled abroad in the course of their work in financial year 1994/95 and the countries they visited. We have provided a total estimated figure for the travel and subsistence costs of these journeys. We do not have easily available information on the travel and subsistence costs per visit as this was dealt with centrally by The Scottish Office on a Department-wide rather than on an individual Agency basis at that time.

Please do not hesitate to contact me if you require further information either about the cost of overseas travel or the purpose of the journeys undertaken.

The following staff from SASA travelled abroad during the financial year 1994/95

Post held	Country visited
Director, SASA	Italy
Deputy Director, SASA	USA France
PSO, Head of Official Seed Testing Station (OSTS)	Netherlands France Germany

SSO, Zoology	Belgium
SO, Zoology	Netherlands

The estimated cost of foreign travel and subsistence was £19,000 of which a proportion was reimbursed by the EC.

Letter from P. E. Du Vivier to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 5 December 1995:

The Secretary of State for Scotland has asked me to reply on behalf of the Scottish Fisheries Protection Agency to your request for information on overseas travel by staff of executive agencies.

So far as SFPA is concerned the information which you have requested for the last financial year is as follows:

SFPA: Foreign Travel 1994/95

Letter from Graeme N. Munro to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 5 December 1995:

The Secretary of State for Scotland has asked me to reply to your recent question about overseas travel by Historic Scotland staff in the last financial year.

I am attaching a table which details the information you have requested. I have included both travel and subsistence costs.

The reasons for travel fall into two main categories: the promotion of Historic Scotland's monuments to the travel trade abroad and participation in specialist international conferences by our professional staff. In a number of cases the cost to the Agency has been mitigated by contributions from other sources (eg where a member of Historic Scotland staff has been invited to give a paper).

All foreign travel has to be approved by me in advance. Before giving approval I satisfy myself that the expenditure can be justified in terms of the Agency's aims and objectives.

I hope this information is helpful to you.

Letter from E. W. Frizzell to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 5 December 1995:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your Question about overseas travel by staff of the Scottish Prison Service during the last financial year.

The information in relation to travel for which claims were processed by the Scottish Prison Service is as follows:

Cost (£)	Countries visited	Post held
2,200.00	Brazil	Governor in Charge
1,217.43	Canada/USA	Area Director

I myself paid a short visit to the Swedish Prison Service during the year, and a Governor spent time with the Hong Kong Prison Service as part of an exchange arrangement. However, I regret that information on the cost of both those visits and details of any other visits made by Scottish Prison Service staff for whom claims were processed by the Scottish Office, have not been made available to me by the Scottish Office on the grounds that the information is not accessible except at disproportionate cost.

I am sorry I cannot give you a fuller reply.

Letter from Patrick Cadell to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 5 December 1995:

The Secretary of State for Scotland has asked me to reply to your question.

To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, if he will list for each of his executive agencies for the last financial year in respect of overseas travel by staff of the agency (a) the cost, (b) the countries visited and (c) the posts held by the staff involved.

The answers for the Scottish Record Office are as follows:

(a) £7,254 was the sum spent on foreign travel in 1994/95.

(b) Countries visited were Australia, Belgium (EU), Canada, France (including Council of Europe), Greece, Ireland, Italy, Nigeria, Spain, Turkey, and the USA.

(c) This travel was carried out by the Keeper (Grade 5), the Deputy Keeper (Grade 6), and 2 Curatorial Grade 7s.

Letter from Alan Ramage to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 5 December 1995:

The Secretary for State for Scotland has asked me to reply to your written PQ asking for information on overseas travel by Agency staff in the last financial year and I can confirm that no member of the Agency travelled overseas in this period.

Algrade Trust

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland further to the Lord Advocate's letter of 24 July 1995, what evidence he has that one of the new trustees of the Algrade Trust has a background in the specialist teaching of people with learning difficulties. [3338]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The evidence comes from an account of the qualifications of the new trustees given by their legal advisers. One of the trustees is Mrs. Ethel Marsh, Dip.C.E. who was head teacher of the James Gillespie school between 1976 and 1993. This lady was the convenor of the primary, nursery and special section of the Lothian Head Teachers Association involving the educational needs for pupils with special learning difficulties.

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a further statement on the investigation of the affairs of the Algrade Trust by the Scottish Charities Office, with special reference to the underspending of money paid to the trust for the care and accommodation of handicapped people; the expenditure by the trust on the purchase of properties and the conveyancing of property purchased with trust funds to other parties. [3339]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Scottish Charities Office continues to make inquiries into the past circumstances of the Algrade Trust, including its accounting and expenditure as well as the purchase and conveyance of properties. The nature and extent of these inquiries is such that it will be some time before they are completed and the results are known.

Planning, Industrial and Economic Development Advisers—PIEDA

Dr. Hendron: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland on how many occasions his Department has commissioned PIEDA to carry out educational reports. [3184]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: PIEDA was commissioned in August 1995 to carry out a study of the funding of further education in the islands. The study covers Orkney, Shetland and Lewis where there are existing further education colleges. The study is due to report by the end of 1995. PIEDA has also carried out work in the educational sector in Scotland which has been commissioned by others.

Long-stay Beds

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the numbers of long-stay beds in the NHS in Scotland in 1990, broken down to show the numbers for the (a) elderly, (b) psychiatry, (c) learning difficulties and (d) chronic young sick, categories; what are the figures under these categories for 1 April; and if he will estimate in these categories the number of available long-stay beds in the NHS in Scotland by (i) 1 April 1998 and (ii) 1 April 2000. [3445]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Future bed numbers in each health board area are a matter for local determination based on a thorough assessment of local health needs.

The information requested for 1990 and 1995 is as follows:

NHS and joint-user and contractual hospitals in Scotland—average available staffed NHS beds; by selected specialty; years ending 31 March

	1990	1995
All selected beds	29,218	22,231
Geriatric long stay	9,132	7,442
Psychiatric specialities	14,407	11,034
Learning difficulties	5,283	3,468
Young chronic sick	396	287

1. The figures in the table relate to long stay beds for geriatric and young chronic sick patients, and to total beds for psychiatric and learning difficulty patients. Around 40 per cent. of psychiatric beds and 10 per cent. of learning difficulty beds are used for the care of short stay patients.

2. The figures show information on the average daily number of available staffed beds. This indicates the number of beds which are staffed and are available for the reception of in-patients and day cases.

Minebea Electronics

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much money has been paid to Minebea Electronics, Kelburn business park, Port Glasgow, in public grants; and what is the type of grant aid by which such money was given to the company. [2794]

Mr. Kynoch [holding answer 4 December 1995]: None. The company has, however, accepted an offer of regional selective assistance. No payments have, as yet, been made; in the event of a payment being made, details of the RSA offer will be published in "Labour Market Trends".

Forestry Planting (Greenlawdean)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to be in a position to make a decision about the outstanding forestry planting application at Greenlawdean in Berwickshire; and if he will make a statement. [3564]

Mr. Kynoch: My noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland visited Greenlawdean on November 13 and has decided not to call for an environmental assessment of the forestry planting proposals.

Asbestos (East Kilbride)

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when the management of East Kilbride development corporation first became aware of the presence of asbestos in the internal construction of houses in the Telford road area of the new town; and when the board of development corporation was notified of the problem. [4121]

Mr. Kynoch: Officials at the development corporation were formally advised of the presence of asbestos in the corporation's homes in Telford road on 1 February 1995. The board was notified on 14 March 1995.

ENVIRONMENT

Rural Businesses

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of the number of rural businesses which have closed in each year since 1990. [2573]

Mr. Clappison: We do not hold information in this form.

Battersea Power Station

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussion he has had, and with whom, regarding the future development of Battersea power station; and if he will make a statement. [3172]

Sir Paul Beresford: None. Discussions are continuing between Wandsworth council, English Heritage and the owners about the future of the Battersea power station site. The Government are not party to those discussions but would like to see the future development of this important site on the River Thames resolved as soon as possible.

Dorset County Council

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment by how much in monetary and percentage terms Dorset county council has budgeted to overspend or underspend on each of its standard spending assessments for the current year. [3443]

Sir Paul Beresford: The following is the information.

Dorset county council budgeted net revenue expenditure compared to SSA, 1995–96

	SSA £ million	Budgeted net revenue expenditure £ million	Difference £ million	Percentage
Education	198.0	213.5	15.5	7.8
Personal social services	77.6	73.8	–3.8	–4.9
Fire	12.4	14.4	2.0	16.1
Highway maintenance	24.8	26.1	1.3	5.2
Other services	25.4	30.7	5.3	20.9
Capital financing	20.1	0.1	–20.0	–99.5
Total	358.3	358.6	0.3	0.1

Note:

Budgeted net revenue expenditure for the first five SSA blocks include an estimate of capital expenditure charged to revenue account—CERA—calculated by apportioning the total CERA of £27.4 million as reported by Dorset county council, to those SSA blocks in proportion to net current expenditure.

Revenue Support Grant

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much revenue support grant was paid to each metropolitan district for 1994–95; and what was the percentage movement from the previous year. [3198]

Sir Paul Beresford: The information is as follows:

Table to show the 1994–95 RSG for the metropolitan districts, and the percentage change relative to the previous year

Local authority	1994–95 RSG (£ million)	Percentage increase over 1993–94

Commission for the New Towns

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what advice he has received from the Commission for the New Towns on the likely effect of his Department's current land sales programme on market prices. [3455]

Mr. Curry: The Commission for the New Towns' strategy for the disposal of land is discussed with it in the context of its corporate plan. It attaches importance to phased release to local markets.

Nursery Voucher Scheme

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what effect the pilot scheme for vouchers has on the rate support grant of those authorities taking part in the scheme; in (a) the first and (b) the second year of its operation. [3267]

Sir Paul Beresford: Authorities taking part in phase 1 of the scheme will receive less revenue support grant because they have a reduced standard spending assessment for education. But if they continue to attract the same number of nursery pupils as in the past, their income from vouchers would equal the reduction in their RSG.

We will take decisions on the second year of the scheme in the light of experience in the first year.

Health and Safety Executive

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total amount payable to the chairman of the Health and Safety Executive; and for how many hours a week is his appointment. [3613]

Sir Paul Beresford: The annual salary of the chairman of the Health and Safety Commission is currently £58,456. The appointment is pensionable and reasonable travel and subsistence expenses are payable in connection with commission business. The appointment is for three days a week.

Drinking Water

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has made in pursuit of a derogation for the United Kingdom Government from the obligation in Com(93)680 final to reduce nitrates in drinking water below their natural level. [3491]

Mr. Clappison: The European Commission's proposal for a directive on the ecological quality of water, COM(93) 680 final contains no such requirement in respect of nitrates.

Consultants

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those (a) consultants, (b) outside organisations and (c) individuals employed by his Department in each year since 1990, indicating the purposes of their employment and the total payments made to them. [3963]

Sir Paul Beresford: The information requested is not held centrally by my Department and is obtainable only at disproportionate cost.

Cement Kilns

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to issue a full reply to the second report of the Environment Select Committee on the burning of secondary liquid fuel in cement kilns HC 479 of Session 1994–95. [3792]

Mr. Clappison: The Government expect to make a full response early in the new year.

Mr. Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 28 November, Official Report, column 557, what reports he has received from Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution concerning persistent plume grounding at Castle Cement in Clitheroe; and what assessment he has made of the possible risks to public health in the vicinity. [3790]

Mr. Clappison: Ministers are fully aware of the reported incidence of plume grounding and the investigative monitoring that national physical laboratory carried out on behalf of HMIP. The results of this investigation are being reviewed by the Department of Health.

Boundary Review

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what instructions his Department has given to the Local Government Commission on the review of boundaries of metropolitan areas; and if he will make a statement. [4097]

Sir Paul Beresford: None. We are considering what reviews the commission should undertake in addition to its statutory responsibilities for periodic electoral reviews.

Manchester Airport

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment by what date he now expects to receive the inspector's report on Manchester airport's planning application for a second runway; and if he will make a statement. [3190]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: I expect to receive the report by autumn 1996. The public inquiry lasted about nine months and there is a very considerable weight of evidence from the main parties, conservation groups, local residents and business people to evaluate.

Standard Spending Assessments

Sir Peter Hordern: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list (a) the change in standard spending assessment for county councils in England for (i) 1995–96 and (ii) 1996–97, identifying the standard spending assessment for education separately and (b) the amount of total external support for each county council, together with the percentage change from 1995–96 in order from the highest increase to the lowest. [3927]

Mr. Curry: The information is as follows:

Local authority	Change in total SSA 1995–96 (£ million)	Percentage change in total SSA 1995–96 (Percentage)	Change in education SSA 1995–96 (£ million)	Percentage change in education SSA 1995–96 (Percentage)

Housing Corporation

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of the likely receipts from sale of the Housing Corporation's loan portfolio to the private sector; and what proportion will be re-invested in housing. [4335]

Mr. Clappison: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment announced on 28 November that he would shortly be appointing financial advisers to carry out detailed investigations into the options for sale and prospective disposal receipts of the corporation's loan portfolio.

In the event of sale, the proceeds would be applied to redemption of the Government's corresponding borrowing from the national loans fund.

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the relationship between the figure announced on 28 November for housing associations in 1996–97 and the sum previously announced for the same period; and what assessment he has made as to the effect of the change on the number of homes likely to be constructed. [4336]

Mr. Clappison: As announced on 28 November, the Housing Corporation's approved development programme—ADP—for capital investment by housing associations in 1996–97 is £1,022 million, including £19 million for city challenge schemes. The figure announced last year for the same period was £1,127 million.

The Department's provisional estimates of the lettings from the new approved development programme, compared with the previous year's estimate, is:

	1996–97	1997–98	1998–99
Provisional estimate	42,000	37,300	42,900
Previous estimate, 15 December 1994	41,200	41,100	n/a

The current provisional estimates reflect reduced development costs and other factors.

The ADP, together with lettings from other sources, is expected to achieve an average of around 60,000 new social lettings a year over the next three years 1996–97—1998–99.

Queen Elizabeth Military Hospital

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) when he expects to (a) receive a report and (b) make a decision on the proposed redevelopment of the former Queen Elizabeth military hospital, Woolwich; [4207]

(2) when he expects the planning inquiry into the redevelopment of the Queen Elizabeth military hospital, Woolwich to be held; and if this conforms to the time scale set out in the inquiries procedure rules. [4206]

Sir Paul Beresford: The local inquiry has been arranged for 23 April 1996. This is seven weeks beyond the recommended time scales but it was the earliest practicable date when a suitably qualified inspector would be available. Once the Government office for London has received the inspector's report, we will issue the decision as quickly as possible.

West Country Development Corporation

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will publish the report by the regional director of the Government office for the south-west on the outcome of his work in respect of the reports that the West Country development corporation commissioned from Coopers and Lybrand on needs and resources in Devon and Cornwall. [4679]

Mr. Curry: I am publishing the regional director's report today and I and the Minister for Trade have had a useful meeting with the chairman and other representatives of the West Country development corporation.

We have listened to the messages from local agencies in the west country.

The regional director's report has explained that while needs in Devon and Cornwall remained substantial benefits are being delivered through increased Government spending, with improvements in many areas.

We have today pledged the Government's continuing commitment to working with agencies in Devon and Cornwall to ensure that the counties' business development and regeneration needs are being met. Devon and Cornwall will benefit from more than £240 million of United Kingdom and European funds aimed at regenerating the local economy over the next few years.

With the Government office and local partners working together in co-operation we shall build on the strengths of Devon and Cornwall to develop a strong and prosperous local economy.

TRANSPORT

M42, Meriden

Mr. Mills: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has finalised his plans for the future of the M42 motorway in the constituency of Meriden. [2645]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Iain Mills, dated 5 December 1995:

As you know, the Minister for Railways and Roads, Mr John Watts, has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking the Secretary of State for Transport, if he has finalised his plans for the future of the M42 motorway in the constituency of Meriden.

Following the recent review of the roads programme, we will be concentrating on the section of the motorway in the Meriden constituency ie between junctions 3A and 7, where the greater problems exist. In line with other decisions taken in the review the scheme will no longer contain provision for a fifth lane in each direction between junctions. In taking the scheme forward, we shall take into account the responses to public consultation in June 1994 on the full scheme. We shall also be considering the scope for other reductions in scale.

Severn Bridge Tolls

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the amounts collected in tolls from the Severn bridge for each year since construction for which figures are available in constant 1995 prices; and if he will make a statement. [2171]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Elfyn Llwyd, dated 5 December 1995:

As you know, the Minister for Railways and Roads, Mr John Watts, has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking the Secretary of State for Transport, if he will list the amounts collected in tolls from the Severn Bridge for each year since construction for which figures are available in constant 1995 prices; and if he will make a statement.

I attach a table listing the amounts collected in tolls from the Severn Bridge for each year since its construction. The first column shows the actual amounts of tolls collected. The second column shows the figures in 1995 prices.

I hope that this information is helpful.

1993	34,366,00	36,599,790.00
1994	39,201.00	40,769,040.00

1. The amount shown for 1966–67 relates to tolls collected for the period from 9 September 1966 to 31 March 1967, i.e. approx. 7 months only.

2. The amounts for 1991–92 is for the period from 1 April 1991 to 25 April 1992.

3. The amount shown for the year 1992 relates to tolls collected from 26 April 1992 to 31 December 1992.

4. The Retail Price Index used for adjustment to 1995 prices is the index published for October 1995.

The Government's policy is to ensure that implementing legislation imposes least cost and provides greatest certainty consistent with meeting our legal obligations.

Carriage of Dangerous Goods Regulations

Sir Mark Lennox-Boyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will re-negotiate with his European colleagues changes in the European agreement on the carriage of dangerous goods by road to enable withdrawal of the Carriage of Dangerous Goods by Road and Rail (Classification, packaging and labelling) Regulations 1994 to take place without contravention of EU laws; [3544]

(2) if he will withdraw the Carriage of Dangerous Goods by Road and Rail (Classification, Packaging and Labelling) Regulations 1994. [3543]

Mr. Norris: To seek to negotiate the extensive changes in Community legislation and in other international agreements that are implicit in my hon. Friend's questions would be impractical. However, the Health and Safety Commission has just published a consultation document containing a draft of a revised version of these regulations. Any comments on the draft should be submitted to the commission by 1 March 1996.

Sir Mark Lennox-Boyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) for how long the derogation from the Carriage of Dangerous Goods by Road and Rail (Classification, Packaging and Labelling) Regulations 1994, set out in the verbal protocol to the Sanitary Medical Disposal Services Association of 12 June remains in force; [3546]

(2) if he will instruct the Health and Safety Executive to put in writing the protocol reached with the SMDSA on 12 June regarding derogation from the Carriage of Dangerous Goods by Road and Rail (Classification, Packaging and Labelling) Regulations 1994 to the clinical waste management industry. [3545]

Mr. Norris: I am advised that the Health and Safety Executive will be writing before the end of the year to the SMDSA about the current position regarding the transport of clinical waste.

A1 Development Inquiry

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the air quality samples taken at the Ferrybridge junior and infant school used as evidence at the public inquiry into the A1 Ferrybridge to Hookmoor proposals; and if he will make a statement. [3720]

Mr. Watts: The effect of the proposed scheme on air quality was outlined in the air quality report included in the environmental statement published in February 1995. Further information about air quality was published during the public inquiry held between 18 October and 3 November.

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what kind of transcript service was used at the public inquiry into the proposed A1 development from Ferrybridge to Hookmore. [3717]

Mr. Watts: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave on 8 November 1995, Official Report, column 899.

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if the prevailing winds were taken into consideration when assessing the air quality at the Ferrybridge junior and infant school for the purpose of evidence at the A1 Ferrybridge to Hookmoor proposals. [3715]

Mr. Watts: Yes.

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration led to the decision to take no samples of particulates by the air quality witness at the public inquiry into the proposals for the A1 Ferrybridge to Hookmoor proposals. [3719]

Mr. Watts: Sampling is not normally carried out for new road schemes. In this case particulate levels have been predicted using the methodology in the design manual for roads and bridges. Estimates of particulates were made at 43 selected properties alongside the new route. All the levels were found to be well within the EC limit.

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport who decided the length of time allocated to the public inquiry into the A1 Ferrybridge to Hookmoor proposals. [3716]

Mr. Watts: The independent inspector, appointed by the Secretaries of State for the Environment and for Transport, on the nomination of the Lord Chancellor, is fully responsible for the conduct and overall length of the inquiry.

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the involvement of the Highways Agency in a public inquiry into a major motorway within the terms of the answer of 8 November, Official Report, column 899. [3718]

Mr. Watts: When my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for the Environment and for Transport announce the intention to hold a public inquiry, it is for the Highways Agency to arrange it, though the conduct of the inquiry remains the sole responsibility of the inspector. Agency representatives would also attend the inquiry to give evidence in support of the proposals.

Road Toll Schemes (Tagging Devices)

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what tagging devices are currently being considered for road toll schemes; and how many of them involve radiation emissions. [3751]

Mr. Watts: Three of the consortiums that we have invited to take part in our forthcoming trials offer, as part of their electronic tolling systems, tags which could emit low-level radio frequency transmissions, at levels well below those emitted by, for example, mobile telephones.

Motorway Lighting

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what criteria his Department uses when determining which sections of motorway require lighting. [3203]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Sir Irvine Patnick, dated 5 December 1995:

As you know, the Minister for Railways and Roads, Mr. John Watts, has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking the Secretary of State for Transport, what criteria his Department uses when determining which sections of motorway require lighting.

The decision whether to light in a particular case is taken following consideration of a full appraisal of the proposed scheme. This includes an economic assessment of the capital, maintenance and energy costs set against the potential savings as a result of the reduction in night time personal injury accidents, calculated over the life of the lighting scheme. A full assessment of environmental factors is taken into account.

M1 Road Works

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport between what date road works will be removed from the M1 during the Christmas and new year periods; and if he will make a statement. [3201]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Sir Irvine Patnick, dated 5 December 1995:

As you know, the Minister for Railways and Roads, Mr. John Watts, has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Question asking the Secretary of State for Transport, between what dates roadworks will be removed from the M1 during the Christmas and New Year periods; and if he will make a statement.

Roadworks will be removed from the M1 between Junction 38 and 42 from Friday 22 December at 06.00 hrs to Wednesday 3 January at 08.00 hrs.

The works to widen the M1 between Junctions 21 and 21A are continuing and due for completion in March 1996. Three lanes of traffic will be maintained in each direction through the widening works on this section of the M1 from Friday 22 December at 05.30 hrs to Tuesday 2 January at 21.00 hrs.

There are no other roadworks planned on the M1 over the Christmas and New Year period.

British Rail (Noise and Air Pollution)

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 21 November 1995, Official Report, column 53, on prosecution for noise and air pollution, what was the nature of (a) the successful prosecution against British Rail and (b) the two abatement notices. [3337]

Mr. Watts: Abatement notices were served on British Rail requiring a reduction in excessive noise at Paddington station, London and at Trafford Park Euro-terminal, Manchester.

The notice served at Paddington required a reduction in the noise created by the engineering work involved in the remodelling of the track layout on the approaches to the station. The use of a tamping machine on one particular night, close to residential premises, led to a prosecution. BR was unable to prove that it had done all that it possibly could to avoid the use of the machine on the night in question and a plea of guilty was entered.

The notice served at Trafford Park related to a new road-rail terminal constructed for channel tunnel freight traffic. The terminal is adjacent to residential properties, the owners of which complained of excessive night time noise after the terminal opened in 1994. In the hearing before the stipendiary magistrate at which the board's appeal against the notice was heard, the board suggested a number of measures to reduce the level of noise received by residents. The board has taken the steps necessary to implement these measures.

Birmingham Northern Relief Road

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what is the estimated date for submission to his Department of the inspector's report following the planning inquiry into the Birmingham northern relief road; and when he expects to be in a position to make a decision and when an announcement on whether the road is to be approved; [3188]

(2) what has been the overall cost of conducting the planning public inquiry into the Birmingham northern relief road (a) excluding and (b) including the fees of the inspector. [3189]

Mr. Watts: Given the length of the inquiry, the report cannot be expected for some time. When it has been received, my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for the Environment and for Transport will reach their joint decision as quickly as possible.

The final cost of the inquiry to the Highways Agency is estimated at £1.59 million, of which £210,000 is the fees for the inspector and his team.

Bicycles (Carriage by Rail)

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures he is taking to encourage cyclists to take their bicycles with them when travelling part of their journey by train. [3460]

Mr. Watts: The Department assisted with the production of the Cyclists' Public Affairs Group's document, "Bike and Trains—Opportunities for the New Operators", which explains how train operators can make their services more attractive to cyclists. The document includes advice on the carriage of bicycles on trains and the provision of bicycle facilities at stations.

The franchising director will require franchisees, through the franchise agreement, to carry bicycles where practicable and to ensure that any charges made are reasonable.

Statutory Instruments

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many statutory instruments his Department sponsored in the last Session of Parliament; and how many of these (a) constituted a new rule or regulation, (b) were introduced to implement European Community directives and (c) amplify the minimum standards set out in an original European Community directive. [2459]

Mr. Watts [holding answer 28 November 1995]: A total of 107 general statutory instruments were made in the Session 1994–95. Of these, based on data for the first six months of 1995, we estimate that:

> almost 20 per cent. revoked earlier instruments or substituted a more favourable regime for business;
> more than 15 per cent. implemented EU or other international obligations including measures to facilitate intermember state trade;
> two per cent. facilitated privatisations and competitions;
> almost 50 per cent. updated fees and charges, or concern local legislation.

Twelve statutory instruments implemented EC legislation. In implementing the directives, none of these instruments go beyond the minimum standard required.

North West Regional Railways

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects North West Regional Railways Ltd. to be offered by franchise to the private sector. [3948]

Mr. Watts: The franchising director expects to offer the North West Regional Railways franchise to the private sector during 1996 or later.

Leeds Supertram

Dr. Hampson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if it is his intention to make provision for work to start on the Leeds Supertram in 1996–97; and if he will now announce his approval of the scheme. [4007]

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what plans he has to provide funding for work on Leeds Supertram to commence in 1996–97; [4189]

(2) if he will announce whether he will approve plans for a Leeds Supertram; and if he will make a statement. [4290]

Mr. Norris: West Yorkshire passenger transport Authority has bid for funding for Leeds Supertram in the 1996–97 local transport settlement. We will be announcing details of the settlement later this month.

Salford Quays and Eccles Metrolink

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much public sector funding will be required to meet the costs of constructing the Salford Quays and Eccles Metrolink extension. [3953]

Mr. Norris: Greater Manchester Passenger Transport authority has yet to obtain powers under the Transport and Works Act 1992 for the extension of Metrolink between Salford Quays and Eccles. GMPTA have bid for funding for the extension as far as Salford Quays in the 1996–97 local transport settlement. We will be announcing details of the settlement later this month.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Pre-sentence Reports

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the proportion of cases where the recommendation in the pre-sentence report was adopted by the magistrates courts during 1994 for each ethnic category. [3653]

Mr. Maclean: I have been asked to reply.

The information requested is not available. The available information for 1993 was published in tables 15C, 15.7 and 15.8 of "Probation Statistics England and Wales 1993," a copy of which is in the Library.

HEALTH

NHS Trusts

16. Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent representations he has received from national health service trusts about budgetary constraints. [2188]

Mr. Horam: None. National health service trusts are no longer given budgets, but earn their income from providing services to purchasers of health care. The level of income a trust receives is subject to contractual negotiation with purchasers each financial year.

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to ensure that national health service trusts retain flexibility over whether or not to contract out specific services. [2185]

Mr. Horam: The only requirement on trusts is to market test catering, domestic and linen-laundry services at regular intervals. Otherwise it is for individual trusts to decide which services to market test, and when, in order to reflect local circumstances and needs.

In-patients

17. Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total number of in-patients treated by Warwickshire trusts or equivalent areas in (a) 1994 and (b) 1993. [2189]

Mr. Horam: Warwickshire national health service trusts admitted 69,091 in-patients in 1993–94, rising to 70,077 in-patients in 1994–95.

Source: SD2A; KP70 return.

Redundancy and Retirement

18. Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary for Health what guidelines his Department is giving regarding redundancy payments and retirement packages in the national health service. [2190]

Mr. Malone: Arrangements for redundancy and premature retirement for national health service staff employed in health authorities and NHS trusts on national terms and conditions of service are set out in sections 45 and 46 of the General Whitley Council handbook. Guidance on severance payments for general and senior managers on short-term rolling contracts was issued in circulars HSG(94)18 and TEL(94)3. Staff employed on NHS trust terms and conditions of service will be covered by their trust's contractual terms.

Guidance on early retirement for NHS pension scheme members was issued in circular HSG(95)25. Additionally, a guide covering pension entitlement on redundancy and early retirement has been issued by the NHS Pensions Agency to all NHS pension scheme members. More specific information is available in the booklet "Early Retirement". Copies of all documents are available in the Library.

Hip Replacements

19. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hip replacement operations have been carried out by the national health service on patients over the age of (a) 90, (b) 95 and (c) 100 years in the last five. [2191]

Mr. Horam: The information is in the table:

Hip replacements and other arthroplasty operations of the hip

Year	Age 90–94	Age 95–99	Age 100 and over
1989–90	1,325	374	40
1990–91	1,866	463	45
1991–92	1,942	454	51
1992–93	2,122	426	72
1993–94	2,226	492	29

Hip operation codes—shortlist code WC1 and WC3.

OPCS4R codes W37–W39, W46–W48.

Prescription Charges

20. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total income from prescription charges in 1994–95. [2192]

Mr. Malone: The total income from prescription charges in 1994–95 including income from the purchase of prepayment certificates was £287 million.

NHS Private Sector Purchasing

21. Ms Corston: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much money has been spent by the national health service on buying services from the private sector in the last four years. [2193]

Mr. Horam: This information is not available centrally.

28. Mr. Stevenson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what amount is estimated to be spent by the national health service in 1995–96 on purchasing care from the private sector. [2200]

Mr. Malone: This information is not available centrally.

Private Sector Nurses

22. Mr. Etherington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement of the number of nurses currently working in the private sector. [2194]

Mr. Horam: I refer the hon. Member to the publication "Private hospitals, homes and clinics registered under section 23 of the Registered Homes Act 1984", which contains numbers of staff in post for non-national health service establishments. Copies of this publication are available in the Library.

Doctors and Dentists

23. Sir David Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many doctors and dentists undertake national health service work at the most recent count; and what was the equivalent figure in 1979. [2195]

Mr. Malone: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave him on 31 October 1995, Official Report, column 199.

Hospital Wards

24. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress he is making towards the establishment of a choice between single sex and the mixed wards for all hospital patients; and if he will make a statement. [2196]

Mr. Horam: It is for the trusts and health authorities to decide for themselves how to use the resources available to them. The national health service executive has commissioned a survey of the current position on mixed-sex wards and will consider what action, if any, is required when the report of that survey is received.

Edgware General Hospital

25. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects the regional and district health authorities to announce the replacement facilities due at Edgware general hospital, to compensate for the closure of the accident and emergency department in 1997; and if he will give the outline arrangements agreed with his Department. [2197]

Mr. Malone: The health authority is undertaking consultation on detailed proposals for the facilities to be provided at Edgware hospital. Decisions will be made in the new year.

United Leeds Hospital Trust

26. Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the United Leeds hospital trust budget deficit. [2198]

Mr. Horam: This is a matter for the United Leeds Teaching Hospitals national health service trust. The hon. Member may wish to contact the chairman of the trust, Mr. David Hall, for details.

Waiting Times

27. Mr. Thomason: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress is being made to reduce the number of patients who have to wait over one year for treatment. [2199]

Mr. Horam: Excellent progress has been made in reducing the number of patients who wait more than a year for treatment. In September 1990 there were 202,740 people waiting over one year compared with 28,204 in September 1995.

Elderly People

29. Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to ensure that elderly people receive the same entitlement to national health service care irrespective of where they live in the country. [2201]

Mr. Bowis: We have made it clear that elderly people throughout the country should receive national health service care on the basis of clinical need.

Domiciliary Care

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what monitoring his Department has undertaken of public and private domiciliary care. [2184]

Mr. Bowis: We take a continuing interest in the welcome growth, innovation and quality of domiciliary care services.

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proposals his Department has to ensure registration of private domiciliary care. [2186]

Mr. Bowis: Our current review of regulation and inspection of social services will consider whether statutory regulation should be extended to domiciliary care.

Regional Health Authorities

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimates have been made of the savings resulting from the abolition of regional health authorities. [2187]

Mr. Malone: By 1997–98, total annual savings from the abolition of regional health authorities are expected to be around £100 million. A further £50 million has also been saved from the creation of single health authorities at local level. These substantial savings will be retained by the national health service and reinvested in patient care.

Isles of Scilly Community Health Services

Mr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future for community health care on the Isles of Scilly. [3454]

Mr. Horam: The then Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville) gave approval for the Isles of Scilly community health services to integrate into Plymouth Community Services NHS trust from 1 April 1996.

NHS Trusts (Finance)

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what levels of surplus or deficit each national health service trust returned in each year since its inception giving the figures by region; [3246]

(2) how many trusts recorded (a) surpluses and (b) deficits in each region in each year since 1991–92. [3247]

Mr. Horam: The information will be placed in the Library.

Smoking and Drug Addiction (Children)

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the total Department of Health budget for smoking and drug addiction among children in each of the last five years. [3764]

Mr. Bowis: The tables show the amounts spent by the Health Education Authority, on behalf of the Department of Health, on teenage anti-smoking programmes over the last five years, funding provided to health authorities for drug misuse services and expenditure on drug and solvent publicity for all age ranges. Activities relating to smoking and drug addiction among children are also included within other programmes undertaken by the Department of Health, the Health Education Authority and health authorities but specific costings are not available.

Funding for HEA's teenage smoking programme

Financial year	Amount spent on teenage smoking work £
1991–92	£1,746,000
1992–93	752,000
1993–94	864,000
1994–95	863,000
1995–96	880,000

Autologous Blood Transfusion

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to develop an autologous blood transfusion service. [3771]

Mr. Horman: We recognise the value of autologous transfusion for those patients for whom the procedures are applicable. In appropriate cases it can provide a useful supplement to the supply of blood for voluntary donors which the National Blood Service supplies to our hospitals. The medical profession is aware of autologus transfusion and advice is available from medical staff of the National Blood Service and hospital consultant haematologists. Selection of patients for this procedure has to be undertaken with extreme care to avoid any possible clinical risk to that patient.

Meningitis

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cases of meningitis have been notified in each of the health districts of West Yorkshire in each year since 1990. [3695]

Mr. Horam: The information is shown in the table.

Notifications of meningitis and meningococcal menningitis in West Yorkshire, by local authroity districts, 1990–94

GP Commissioning Group

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to finance any general practitioner commissioning groups. [3757]

Mr. Malone: This is for local determination. General practitioners involved in commissioning groups act as advisers to health authorities. It is for health authorities to secure appropriate advice in purchasing, as in other matters.

Out-patients

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his current estimate of the percentage of out-patients seen within 30 minutes; and what assessment he has made of the reliability of the data on which this figure is based. [3762]

Mr. Horam: At 30 September 1995, nationally, 89 per cent. of patients were seen within 30 minutes of their out-patient appointment.

In 1994–95, as part of the national health service performance tables exercise, the Audit Commission found that 93.6 per cent. of trusts' monitoring systems designed to collect the data for this standard were satisfactory.

General Practitioner Consultations

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what was the average annual number of consultations per general practitioner in (a) 1990 and (b) 1994; [3754]

(2) what was the total number of general practitioners consultations in (a) 1990 and (b) 1994. [3756]

Mr. Malone: The information is contained in table 21 on page 56 of the departmental report of the Department of Health and Office of Population Censuses and Surveys, published in 1995, copies of which are available in the Library.

Nitrates in Drinking Water

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what re-assessment he has made of the research published by his

Department in CMO(85)14 on the relationship between nitrate levels in water and cancer incidence. [3489]

Mr. Horam: CMO(85)14 gave advice on the health effects of nitrates in drinking water and concluded that although a theoretical risk of a relationship between nitrate and cancer remained, the epidemiological evidence as a whole gave no support to the suggestion that nitrate was a cause of cancer of the stomach, or other organs. Since 1985 there has been no good evidence for changing this advice and this is supported by evaluations made bythe Committee on the Medical Aspects of the Contamination of Air, Soil, and Water in 1988, the World Health Organisation in 1993 and the National Research Council in the United States in 1995.

St. Bartholomew's Hospital

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what response he has made to the report of the King's Fund Institute on the future of St. Bartholomew's hospital. [3749]

Mr. Malone: None. It will be considered, with other options put forward, by Sir Ronald Grierson's team, which is looking at ways of making the best use of the Smithfield site.

Medical Records

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to investigate the extent of access to patients' medical records, computer and written, in hospitals and general practice by non-authorised persons. [3766]

Mr. Horam: Protection of medical records is the responsibility of the organisation which holds them. Breach of confidentiality is a disciplinary matter. Guidance has been issued to national health service organisations drawing their attention to the laws which protect patient confidentiality, the most recent being, for computer records, the NHS top level security policy 1992. Further guidance affecting both computer and manual records is to be published shortly.

Down's Syndrome

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will issue instructions to health authorities and consultants working for the national health service that no treatment is to be denied to patients on the grounds that they have Down's Syndrome. [3525]

Mr. Horam: National health service treatment is available to everyone on the basis of clinical need. The Department of Health issued guidance in 1992 on health services for people with learning disabilities (mental handicap), HSG(92)42, which made it clear that people with learning disabilities have the same rights of access to NHS services as everyone else.

Long-term Care

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proposals he has to introduce equivalent disregard in respect of long-term domiciliary care subject to those proposed for long-term care in residential and nursing care homes. [3772]

Mr. Bowis: None. It would not be directly relevant to domiciliary care.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) whom he has consulted and whom he intends to consult on the operation of the long-term care package announced in the Budget; [3993]

(2) if he will list the representations his Department has received over the long-term care package announced in the Budget; and if he will list those (a) organisations and (b) individuals which he intends to retain as consultants on the operation of the scheme. [3996]

Mr. Bowis: I have received no representations on these matters following the Budget statement. The consultation will be as announced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Further details will be given in due course.

Hospital Meal Times

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance his Department gives to health authorities and trusts regarding making the times of meals for patients in hospital approximate to normal domestic times; what representations he has had on this matter; and if he will make a statement. [4011]

Mr. Horam: The Department's recently issued "Nutrition Guidelines for Hospital Caterers" commends Patients Association advice that meals should be served at times which reflect the normal eating patterns of the majority of patients and should be eaten in a relaxed and unhurried atmosphere. Availability of food should be adjusted, where necessary, to allow for patients' day treatments, post-operative hunger or lack of appetite, and where admission is made outside ward meal times. The period between the last meal of the day and the following breakfast should not normally exceed 14 hours and a supper drink and snack should also be available, where appropriate.

Reproductive Health and Population Policies, Republic of Ireland

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what (a) assessment of and (b) contributions to his Department he has made regarding the public consultations about reproductive health and population policies currently taking place in the Republic of Ireland; and if he will make a statement. [3990.]

Mr. Horam: None.

Heart and Lung Disease

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) male and (b) female deaths from (i) lung cancer (ICD 162), (ii) heart disease (ICD 410-414) and (iii) chronic obstructive lung disease (ICD 490-492) occurred in each region in 1993. [3980]

Mr. Horam: The information is shown in the table.

The numbers of death occurring in 1993 that were due to malignant neoplasm of the trachea, bronchus and lung (ICD[1] 162), ischaemic heart disease (ICD[1] 410-414) and chronic obstructive pulmonary disease (ICD[1] 490-496) are shown for each sex by regional health authority (England) and Wales.

The figures are provisional.

General Practice Locums

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 28 November 1995, Official Report, column 614, on NHS staff if he will provide comparable information on general practitioner locums. [4289]

Mr. Malone: The information is not available.

Physiotherapy

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to introduce legislation to grant a charter to the physiotherapist profession. [2432]

Mr. Bowis: The Chartered Society of Physiotherapy was incorporated by royal charter in 1920.

Medial and Surgical Posts

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the current structure of medical and surgical posts. [2557]

Mr. Malone: The main hospital career grades are consultant, associate specialist and staff grade. Other career grades are clinical assistant and hospital practitioner.

The training grades are pre-registration house officer, senior house officer and, for doctors in higher specialist training, registrar and senior registrar. The new specialist registrar grade, which replaces the existing registrar and senior registrar grades, is being launched in December 1995 in the specialties of general surgery and radiology, and from April 1996 in all other specialties.

Private Finance Initiative

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 28 November, Official Report, column 608, on the support of local clinicians for the provision of clinical or clinical support services by PFI partners, if he will list the clinicians who will be consulted; what criteria he will use to judge the support of local clinicians; how he will determine that he has gained local clinician's support; if he will consult the local British Medical Association and other professional associations; and if he will make a statement. [4113]

Mr. Horam: Gaining staff support, including the support of clinicians, for any proposal for capital development is the responsibility of trust management. This is true whether the development is to be procured through the private finance initiative, or is to be publicly funded. The capital investment manual, copies of which are available in the Library, emphasises the need to involve staff, including clinicians, in the process of developing a business case for capital investment. The full benefits of capital investment can be realised only through the co-operation of staff, and evidence that this will be forthcoming is one of the factors the NHS executive considers before giving its approval for a capital development.

Queen Elizabeth Military Hospital

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what assessment he has made of the impact on health services for patients in the Bexley and Greenwich health authority area as a result of delay in fully commissioning the new Queen Elizabeth hospital, Woolwich; [4209]

(2) what discussion he has had with the Bexley and Greenwich health authority and the Greenwich Healthcare NHS trust regarding the decision to call in the planning application in respect of the former Queen Elizabeth military hospital, Woolwich; and if he will make a statement; [4211]

(3) if he will make a statement on the progress of the private finance initiative in respect of the conversion of the Ministry of Defence's former Queen Elizabeth military hospital to the NHS Queen Elizabeth hospital, Woolwich; [4213]

(4) what assessment he has made of the possible changes in the planned time scale of building works at the former Queen Elizabeth military hospital as a result of the decision of the Secretary of State for the Environment to call in the planning application; [4208]

(5) when he expects the Queen Elizabeth hospital, Woolwich, to be fully operational; [4210]

(6) what assessment he has made of the effect upon Greenwich district hospital of delay in completing adaptation works to the former Queen Elizabeth military hospital, Woolwich. [4212]

Mr. Malone: Greenwich Healthcare national health service trust is managing the development of the Queen Elizabeth hospital as the main hospital for Greenwich and Woolwich, taking account of the need to explore private finance and the statutory planning process. The trust and the local health authority will ensure that safe and effective services continue to be provided during the transitional period.

Southend Health Authority

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his latest estimate of the relative underfunding of the Southend health authority; and if he will make a statement. [2180]

Mr. Malone: In 1996–97 we plan to give South Essex health authority, which includes Southend, a real terms increase of nearly £11 million, which is the biggest real terms increase to any health authority in the country.

This shows our commitment to bring South Essex health authority to its weighted capitation target as soon as possible.

Registered Homes

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information his Department maintains on closures of private residential care homes. [2785]

Mr. Bowis [holding answer 27 November 1995]: The Department collects information on individual residential care and nursing homes registered under the terms of the Registered Homes Act 1984 at 31 March each year and, for 1993–94, on residential care homes opened or closed by comparison with the previous 31 March.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will provide information about the number of homes registered and deregistered under the Registered Homes Act 1984 by local authority area within each region for each of the last five years. [2784]

Mr. Bowis [holding answer 27 November 1995]: Information is not held centrally in the form requested.

Public Bodies

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the annual income from (a) fees, (b) charges and (c) fines; what was the total number of staff employed (i) part-time and (ii) full-time; and what contribution his Department has made towards the annual running costs in each of the past three years in respect of (1) the Medicines Control Agency, (2) the Good Practice Monitoring Authority, (3) the Medical Devices Directorate and (4) the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority. [2749]

Mr. Horam: [Pursuant to his reply, 28 November 1995, c. 605–8]: I regret that the answer given by my predecessor contained incorrect information about the annual income of the Medicines Control Agency and the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority. An amended table is as follows:

	Annual income (£ million) Fees	Annual income (£ million) Charges	Annual income (£ million) Fines	Total number of staff employed Part-time	Total number of staff employed Full-time	Department's contribution to annual running costs (£ million)

HOME DEPARTMENT

Ministerial Travel, London

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, how many times in the last year he has used (a) London Buses and (b) London Underground while on official business. [377]

Mr. Howard: None.

Home Office Asylum Division

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide a breakdown of the establishment of the Home Office asylum division (a) at the present time, (b) on 1 January 1995, (c) on 1 January 1994, (d) on 1 January 1993, (e) on 1 January 1992, (f) on 1 January 1991 and (g) on 1 January 1988. [559]

Mr. Kirkhope: A breakdown of the establishment of the Home Office asylum division is given in the table. The information is based on the staff in post figures for 1 October of each year in question.

Home Office asylum division: staffing

[1] The asylum division was formed in April 1991. Before that date, asylum determination staff were part of B1 division.

These figures represent an approximate breakdown of the divisional staffing levels by function.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give the civil service grades of those employed solely in processing applications for political asylum, the numbers of such staff in each grade and the average cost in salary and administration costs of a member of staff for each grade. [4073]

Mr. Kirkhope: The available information is given in the following table. The information is based on staffing costs for 1995–96. It relates only to staff employed in the asylum division whose work relates primarily to asylum case processing. These staff have some other responsibilities, such as dealing with applications for family reunion.

The table does not include the cost of the time spent by staff in the immigration service in interviewing asylum applicants and in considering and taking enforcement action in relation to applicants who are liable to deportation or removal.

Administration costs

Includes all non-pay running costs and other apportioned indirect costs (e.g. accommodation, personnel and registry costs).

Local Government

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the Acts of Parliament, including Consolidation Acts, affecting local government which have been introduced by his Department since January 1994. [43]

Mr. Howard: The relevant Acts are as follows:

The Sunday Trading Act 1994

The Police and Magistrates' Courts Act 1994

The Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994.

Director General of the Prison Service

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he is to advertise for a new Director General of the Prison Service; and what qualities he will seek in the successful applicant. [3082]

Mr. Howard: I shall make an announcement in due course.

Police Numbers

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers were in post (a) in England and (b) in each county of England in each year since 1990. [2899]

Mr. Maclean: The information is set out in the table below:

Police strength in England between 1990 and 1995

Total for England	118,661	118,642	119,399	119,100	118,920	118,422

[1] As at 30 September 1995, the latest available figures.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is the total number of police officers in service at present; and what is the starting date of the three-year period for the recruitment of additional police officers; [4032]

(2) what is the date and number of police officers which forms the base on which the additional officers will be recruited in pursuance of the Prime Minister's recent announcement. [4023]

Mr. Maclean: As at 31 March 1995 the total number of police officers in England and Wales was 127,222. The basis on which the additional funding for the extra officers is to be built will be the total police strength in forces at 31 March 1996. Funding for the additional officers announced by the Prime Minister will be available from 1 April 1996.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many additional officers the Government expect police forces to recruit in 1996–97. [4024]

Mr. Maclean: This is a matter for chief constables and police authorities. An extra £20 million has been available in 1996–97. This is sufficient to enable chief constables to recruit 1,000 additional officers by the end of 1996–97 if they choose to do so.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the cost, over the next three financial years, of recruiting 5,000 additional officers to the police service in England and Wales. [4025]

Mr. Maclean: A total of £180 million—£20 million, £60 million, and £100 million—is being made available over the next three financial years. This is sufficient provision to enable chief constables to recruit 5,000 more constables over the period.

Departmental Targets

Ms Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the published recommended response times within which his Department is expected to reply to letters from the public.

Mr. Howard: There is no published overall target for responding to letters from the public because of the diverse nature of the Department's work. Individual units and agencies are, however, required to set clear targets for the time taken to deal with letters from the public, and to monitor performance against those targets. The targets set range from five to 30 working days.

Money Payment Supervision Orders

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many probation service officers in England and Wales are currently engaged in the supervision of money payment supervision orders; and how many of such staff were engaged in that work for each of the years between 1985 and 1993. [3436]

Mr. Maclean: This information is not collected centrally and is not readily available.

Dr. Jones: To ask the Secretay of State for the Home Department how many money payment supervision orders were successfully completed during 1994; and in how many cases the fine was remitted in part or whole. [3435]

Mr. Maclean: There were 4,077 terminations of money payment supervision orders during 1994. In 1,563 cases payment was completed, and in 292 cases payment was remitted by the court.

Dr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many money payment supervision orders have been made by courts in England and Wales to date in 1995. [3433]

Mr. Maclean: The latest estimated figures show that 1,600 persons commenced money payment supervision orders between January and June 1995.

Dr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in how many cases the defendant was (a) over 21 and (b) under 20 years in respect of all money payment supervision orders made by the courts in England and Wales, for the latest year available. [3434]

Mr. Maclean: The table gives the available information.

Number of persons commencing supervision by the probation service under a money payment supervision order by age on commencement, England and Wales 1994

Age on commencement	Number of persons
Under 20	806
20–21	478
Over 21	2,415
All ages	3,699

Dr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many money payment supervision orders have been made by each petty sessional division in England and Wales in each of the last 10 years. [3432]

Mr. Maclean: The information requested is not available.

Underwater Search and Recovery

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which police forces have dispensed with their underwater search and recovery units. [3377]

Mr. Maclean: I understand that Cheshire constabulary, North Wales police, Merseyside police and Greater Manchester police have amalgamated their resources to form a single regional unit and that the Cleveland constabulary and the Gloucestershire constabulary made arrangements with neighbouring forces or private contractors.

Hunting (Policing Costs)

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to permit chief constables at their discretion to recover the costs of police attendance at fox and stag hunts. [3208]

Mr. Maclean: Public order policing at these events falls within the normal law enforcement duties of the police.

Funding for costs incurred by the police in discharging their duty to enforce the law is provided jointly by central and local government.

Clandestine Filming

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take steps to prevent the sale or publication of video or film footage generated by clandestine cameras without the specific and written permission of the subjects of those pictures. [3256]

Mr. Maclean: The Government condemn the irresponsible use of closed circuit television footage for commercial gain. We strongly recommend that all CCTV systems adopt locally developed codes of practice which specify who has access to the images that they capture and for what purpose. Most public CCTV systems have done so. All schemes receiving Government funding for CCTV are required to put in place such codes as a condition of grant. The Home Office guidance booklet, "CCTV—Looking Out For You", contains advice on how to adopt a code of practice and the issues that it should cover.

Racially Motivated Crime

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total number of racially motivated crimes reported during 1994; and how many led to (a) prosecution and (b) conviction. [3650]

Mr. Maclean: Figures for the total number of racially motivated incidents recorded by the police are now collected on a financial year basis. The most recent figures available are those for 1993–94 which were given on 24 June 1994, Official Report, column 330. The definition of a racial incident includes any incident reported to the police which contains any allegation of racial motivation, whether a crime or not. Information about prosecutions and convictions is not collated nationally.

The figures for 1994–95 should be available shortly.

Irish Republic Citizens

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the rights given to citizens of the Irish Republic in the United Kingdom that are not given to the citizens of other countries; and which of these rights are reciprocated by the Republic of Ireland for United Kingdom citizens. [3526]

Mr. Kirkhope: I will write to the hon. Member.

Remand Prisoners

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners were on remand in England and Wales in each year since 1990. [3509]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. Jim Cunningham, dated 5 December 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question asking, how many prisoners were on remand in England and Wales in each year since 1990.

The information is contained in Table one of the Home Office Statistical Bulletin, issue 8/95 'The Prison Population in 1994'. A copy of the bulletin is available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what percentage of prisoners on remand were subsequently acquitted in the last year for which figures are available; [3511]

(2) what percentage of defendants on bail were subsequently acquitted during the last year. [3518]

Mr. Maclean: The latest available figures are published in tables 8.6, 8.9 and 8.10 of the 1994 issue of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales", Cm 3010. The figures quoted in these tables should be taken as broad estimates only, due to data quality problems.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to reduce the time prisoners spend on remand awaiting trial. [3523]

Mr. Maclean: The Government are anxious to ensure that prisoners spend as little time as possible on remand awaiting trial. The number of cases awaiting disposal at the Crown court has been reduced this year through increased numbers of sitting days. Plea and directions hearings, which encourage active case management by the judiciary, are being introduced through a rolling programme and will extend to all Crown court centres in England and Wales by early next year. The Criminal Procedure and Investigations Bill, introduced in another place on 27 November, contains provision to invite a defendant to indicate his plea before magistrates decide whether the trial should proceed in the magistrates court or the Crown court. This, together with the sentence discount provisions enacted in the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, should enable a greater proportion of appropriate business to be retained in the magistrates courts and thereby reduce delay.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of the change in the overall prison population between 1992 and 1994 was the result of changes in the numbers of remand prisoners. [3510]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A.J. Pearson to Mr. Jim Cunningham, dated 5 December 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office to reply to your recent Question asking, what percentage of the change in the overall prison population between 1992 and 1994 was the result of changes in the numbers of remand prisoners.

The information on the prison population by type of prisoner is contained in Table one of the Home Office Statistical Bulletin, issue 8/95 'The Prison Population in 1994', a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Between 1992 and 1994, the prison population increased by 2,977 from 45,817 to 48,794. During the same period, the remand population rose by 2,267 from 10,090 in 1992 to 12,357 in 1994. This amounted to 76 per cent of the rise in the total population.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average length of time a prisoner serves on remand; and what the average length of time was in each year since 1990. [3512]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. Jim Cunningham, dated 5 December 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question asking about the average length of time a prisoner serves on remand; and what the average length of time was in each year since 1990.

Information for the years 1990 to 1993 is given in Table 2.1 of Prison Statistics, England and Wales 1993 (Cm 2893), a copy of which is in the Library of the House. Estimates for 1994 are given in the attached table.

Estimated average time spent in custody for remand prisoners in Prison Service establishments in England and Wales in 1994[1] by sex:

Type of custody	Estimated average number of days in custody[2] Male	Female
Untried[3]	59	44
Convicted[4]	34	29

[1] Provisional figures.

[2] Estimated from number of receptions and average population in 1994.

[3] Time spent in custody before conviction.

[4] Time spent in custody after conviction before sentence.

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, what the total number of defendants in each ethnic category who were (a) bailed by magistrates courts or Crown courts during (i) 1989 and (ii) 1994 and (b) remanded in custody during (iii) 1989 and (iv) 1994. [3648]

Mr. Maclean: Court proceedings data held centrally by my Department does not identify the ethnic origin of those bailed or remanded in custody. Information, which is available only for the last five years, on the ethnic group of prison receptions on remand is given in the tables.

Prison remand receptions by ethnic origin[1] England and Wales 1990

Year	Total	White	West Indian, Guyanese, African	Indian, Pakistani, Bangladeshi	Chinese, Arab, mixed origin	Unrecorded
1990	60,174	50,471	6,171	1,354	1,331	847

[1] A new classification for ethnic origin was introduced in 1992. It is congruent with that used for the census of population. Data for 1990 is shown separately as the classification prior to 1992 is not directly comparable with that in later years.

Prison remand receptions by ethnic origin[1], England and Wales 1994[2]

Year	Total	White	Black	South Asian	Chinese and other Asian	Unrecorded
1994[2]	68,414	57,420	7,937	1,512	553	992

[1] A new classification for ethnic origin was introduced in 1992. It is congruent with that used for the census of population. Data for 1990 is shown separately as the classification prior to 1992 is not directly comparable with that in later years.

[2] Provisional figures.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of defendants on bail committed an offence while on bail during the last year. [3517]

Mr. Maclean: Statistics on offending on bail are not collected at present on a national basis. However, a review of more localised studies was given in Home Office Research Paper No. 65 "Offending while on bail: a survey of recent studies". More up-to-date figures are given in a 1994 report of the Hampshire police and probation service and show that 14 per cent. of persons given bail committed an offence during a period of police or court bail.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many bail hostels have closed since the beginning of 1994. [3519]

Mr. Sackville: Twelve.

Health and Safety Offences

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consideration has been given to setting up special police units to deal with health and safety crime; and if he will make a statement. [3611]

Mr. Maclean: The primary responsibility for the enforcement of health and safety legislation rests with the Health and Safety Executive. Procedures already exist for liaison between HSE, the police and the Crown Prosecution Service where appropriate.

The introduction of specialised police units would be an operational matter for chief officers of police.

Probation Orders

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total number of offenders who were supervised by the probation service on statutory orders in (a) 1989 and (b) 1995; and how many belonged to an ethnic minority. [3661]

Mr. Maclean: The readily available information relates to commencements. There is no information available for 1989 and the information relating to 1993 was published in the 1993 issue of "Probation Statistics England and Wales", tables 15.1—15.6 1994–95, Information will be published in "Probation Statistics England and Wales 1994" in the new year.

Gaming Act Reform

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to publish his consultation paper on the reform of the Gaming Act. [3697]

Mr. Kirkhope: We are reviewing the present controls on bingo clubs and casinos as part of the Government's deregulation initiative. The review is well advanced and we hope to consult on proposals soon.

Stop and Search

Ms Janet Anderson : To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were stopped and searched by (1) the Metropolitan police and (2) all other police forces in England and Wales; and, of these, how many were (a) arrested, (b) cautioned, (c) charged and (d) convicted in (i) 1989 and (ii) 1994, broken down by ethnic background and gender. [3688]

Mr. Maclean: The available information on persons stopped and searched and the number of arrests resulting is published annually in table 1 of Home Office statistical bulletin "Operation of certain police powers under PACE", copies of which are in the Library.

No information is available centrally on the number of persons cautioned, charged or convicted, or on their gender.

Details of the ethnic group of those stopped and searched during 1993–94 was given in the reply to a question from the hon. Member for Tottenham

(Mr. Grant) on 1 December 1994, Official Report, column 844. Similar statistics for 1994–95 should be available shortly.

Ethnic Minority Prisoners

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many defendants in each ethnic category were sentenced to a period of custody; and what percentage of each group were sentenced without a pre-sentence report in 1994. [3649]

Mr. Maclean: Court proceedings data held centrally by my Department does not identify the ethnic origin of those sentenced, nor whether a pre-sentence report was prepared.

Hong Kong (Key Person Scheme)

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list by profession or civil service department the number of heads of household in Hong Kong who have applied for right of abode status in the United Kingdom under the 50,000 key person scheme. [3506]

Mr. Kirkhope: Following is the breakdown of principal beneficiary applications as at 26 November 1995. In cases not yet decided, applicants may be allocated to a more appropriate class.

	Applications

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how may heads of household in Hong Kong have applied for right of abode status in the United Kingdom under the scheme offering 50,000 full British passports to key officials in the colony. [3503]

Mr. Kirkhope: As at 26 November this year, 108,768 principal beneficiary applications had been received. This figure includes invalid, ineligible and withdrawn applications and repeat applications from some of those unsuccessful in the first tranche of the scheme.

Vehicle Removal Charges

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to regulate charges for those vehicle towing services formerly provided by the police. [3655]

Mr. Maclean: There are no plans to set specific charges for vehicle recovery by garage operators who carry out this function under contract schemes which are run by managing agents on behalf of certain police forces.

A statutory charge for the removal of vehicles, currently £105, is prescribed under the Removal, Storage and Disposal of Vehicles (Prescribed Sums and Charges etc.,) (Amendment) Regulations 1993. The police are entitled to charge this sum for the removal of any vehicle which is parked in breach of local traffic regulation orders, or which is causing an obstruction or danger, or which is broken down or abandoned without lawful authority.

Police Funding

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of the additional cash for police authorities announced in the Budget he estimates will be taken up with (a) pension costs, (b) pay increases and (c) additional recruitment of police officers and their training. [4059]

Mr. Maclean: The extra provision for police authorities announced in the provisional settlement for 1996–97 includes (a) £79.9 million for the estimated increase in police pension costs between 1995–96 and 1996–97; (b) £123.6 million for the estimated requirement to fund pay increases and (c) £20 million to enable the police service to employ 1,000 additional constables by the end of 1996–97.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his estimate of the cash needed to meet the pension costs for police authorities in England and Wales in respect of police officers and retired police officers in 1996–97 additional to those of (a) 1995–96 and (b) 1994–95. [4058]

Mr. Maclean: The additional provision required to fund police pension costs estimated by the Government Actuary's Department in 1996–97 is (a) £79.9 million more than the equivalent estimate for 1995–96 and (b) £149.1 million more than for 1994–95.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what reasons the money for additional recruiting of police officers is (a) not treated as a separate item and (b) subsumed in the increase in total police spending of around 4 per cent. shown in Home Office press release 267/95 of 28 November. [4033]

Mr. Maclean: Home Office press release 267/95 of 28 November dealt with overall planned expenditure for Home Office services announced as part of the Chancellor's unified Budget. Section 3 of the draft Police Grant Report (England and Wales) 1996–97, which my right hon. and learned Friend placed in the Library on 30 November, sets out the proposed allocation of police grant, including the additional funding for extra police officers.

Asylum and Immigration Bill

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if he will give the cost in man-hours and money for promoting the Asylum and Immigration Bill in the current Session. [4075]

Miss Widdecombe: At a rough estimate, work on the Bill is likely to take up 8,000 man-hours in the Home Office, at a cost of £210,000. This does not include work on the Bill by other interested Departments.

Correspondence

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the hon. Member for Walsall, North will receive a reply to this letter of 6 November, ref. 20807/95. [4110]

Mr. Kirkhope: I have written to the hon. Member today.

Crime Prevention Agency

Mr. Merchant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the new Crime Prevention Agency announced in his speech of 12 October. [4677]

Mr. Maclean: My right hon. and learned Friend announced the details of the new Crime Prevention Agency on 22 November. The agency will subsume the National Board for Crime Prevention, the Home Office crime prevention unit and the Home Office crime prevention centre.

The work of the agency will be overseen by an agency board which will be an advisory non-departmental public body. I will chair the agency board.

Other members of the agency board are:

Jack Acton: Director, Home Office Crime Prevention Centre

Peter Batchelor: Chair, Vehicle Crime Prevention Group; formerly Executive Director Sales and Marketing, Vauxhall Motors

Ken Pease: Professor of Criminology, University of Huddersfield

David Quarmby: Chair, Retail Action Group for Crime Prevention; Joint Managing Director J. Sainsbury plc

Nick Ross: Broadcaster and journalist

John Stevens: Chief Constable, Northumbria Police: Chair, Association of Chief Police Officers Crime Prevention Sub-Committee

Anthony Tisdale: Councillor and Chair, Surrey Police Authority

Nigel Whiskin: Chief Executive, Crime Concern.

The terms of reference of the agency board are as follows:

The board is appointed by my right hon. and learned Friend and will:

(i) act as the managing board for the Home Office crime prevention unit and the Home Office crime prevention centre;

(ii) co-ordinate the activities of all the key players in crime prevention by:

ensuring their representation on the board; developing stronger links between each other; and maintaining links with other organisations;

(iii) initiate, develop and promote innovative ideas to help prevent crime and reduce the fear of crime by:

following up new research;

identifying good practice; and ensuring guidance and advice is available;

(iv) work with the police, local authorities, business, industry, the voluntary sector, the community and other to target specific types of crime or crime situations by:

setting up groups to examine specific issues, such as the retail group and the vehicle crime group, supporting other groups with similar aims;

(v) ensure that all sections of the community have the opportunity to be involved in crime prevention by:

encouraging the spread of partnerships such as neighbourhood watch, street watch, etc; promoting youth involvement; and publicising effective community activity;

(vi) offer advice to Ministers on the major strategic and policy implications relating to these issues and on other effective crime prevention strategies.

CCTV Challenge Competition

Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he intends to announce a further closed circuit television challenge competition. [4678]

Mr. Maclean: My right hon. and learned Friend announced a new closed circuit television challenge competition on 22 November. A total of £15 million has been made available in the financial year 1996–97 to fund CCTV schemes in England and Wales. Partnerships are invited to bid for a share of this money. A copy of the bidding guidance, which gives information on how to make a bid and details of the criteria by which the bids will be assessed, has been placed in the Library. Copies have also been sent to chief constables, local authorities, police authorities and others who have expressed an interest. The closing date for bids is 29 March 1996.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce fixed-time appointments for asylum applicants attending interviews at the asylum screening unit; what is the average waiting time for persons attending for interviews at the asylum screening unit; and what proportion of them have to wait more than (a) one hour, (b) two hours, (c) three hours and (d) four hours. [3270]

Mr. Kirkhope [holding answer 4 December 1995]: There are no plans to introduce fixed-time appointments for asylum applicants attending interviews at the asylum screening unit. Information about average waiting times is not available.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has collected on those countries which operate white lists of countries excluded for the purpose of asylum seekers and refugee status; if he will publish details of the lists operated by other EC countries; what discussions he has held with his EC counterparts about the effectiveness of such lists and their harmonisation throughout the EC; what parliamentary procedures he intends to use to allow debate and decision on deletion from and addition to such lists; and if he will make a statement. [3683]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 4 December 1995]: Comprehensive information is not available, but our understanding is that Denmark, Finland, Germany and the Netherlands are among the European Union countries which operate procedures based on designation of countries of origin in which there is, in general terms, no serious risk of persecution. Our regular contacts with counterparts from these countries support our view that a designation power would improve our asylum procedures. There are no proposals to harmonise designation lists in the European Union.

Under clause 1 of the Asylum and Immigration Bill, designation orders would be laid before Parliament under the negative resolution procedure. The list of designated countries would be subject to amendment by the same procedure.

Criminal Injuries Compensation Board

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (i) cases were lodged with the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board in each of the last three years and (ii) staff were employed by the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board during each of the last three years; and what was (a) the average time taken to complete each case and (b) the average time taken to respond to an initial application. [3740]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 4 December 1995]: The latest published figures are given in the board's third annual report, Cm 2849, copies of which are held in the Library. Paragraph 3.1 shows that 61,400 applications were received in 1991–92, 65,977 in 1992–93 and 73,473 in 1993–94. Paragraph 3.12 gives information about the time taken to resolve cases and shows, by way of example, that 49 per cent., 57 per cent., and 70 per cent. of cases were resolved within 12 months in the three years respectively. Similar data for 1994–95 will be published shortly.

The average staff complement in the three years was 380, 387 and 430, and currently stands at 480. The board advises that historical data on the time taken to acknowledge initial applications is not available, but the current average is six days.

British Transport Police

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further discussions his Department has had with the Department of Transport on extending the jurisdiction of the British Transport police; what conclusions were reached; and if he will make a statement. [2887]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 29 November 1995]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport on 29 November 1995, Official Report, column 787.

Written Answers to Questions

Wednesday 6 December 1995

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Ferranti/ISC

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Attorney-General what information he has concerning the progress of inquiries, indictments and prosecutions in the United States of America in cases concerning the collapse of Ferranti/ISC. [4242]

The Solicitor-General: The Serious Fraud Office has been informed by the authorities in the USA that James Guerin was sentenced on 10 June 1992 to 15 years in prison. Since that date six other defendants have entered guilty pleas but have yet to be sentenced. Five of those defendants have entered co-operation agreements with the US Government in relation to a trial currently scheduled to commence in January 1996. Other defendants remain outside the jurisdiction of the US courts.

Crown Prosecution Service

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Attorney-General, what was the total staff establishment of the Crown Prosecution Service in England and Wales by each grade; and how many (a) in total and (b) from each grade were from an ethnic minority in (i) 1989 and (ii) 1995. [3651]

The Solicitor-General: Information of the ethnic origin of Crown Prosecution Service staff in each grade is not available for 1989. The earliest available comprehensive breakdown of staff in post by grade and ethnic origin is August 1991, following the Department's first ethnic monitoring survey of all staff. The tables therefore provide the total staff establishment and numbers of ethnic minority staff in each grades as at (i) 31 August 1991 and (ii) 30 September 1995.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Attorney-General how much capital expenditure is forecast to be included in the private finance initiative for the current financial year and the next five financial years. [3838]

The Attorney-General: The Departments for which I am responsible have no capital expenditure included in the private finance initiative for the current financial year. Use of the PFI is considered for projects where appropriate. It is not possible to say how much expenditure is likely to be financed under the PFI over the next five years.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Attorney-General if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative (a) capital and (b) revenue costs to public funds (i) under the PFI and (ii) estimated to have been incurred had the scheme been funded wholly within the public sector. [3805]

The Attorney-General: To date, the Law Officers' departments have not used the private finance initiative for the funding of any schemes. However, use of the PFI is being considered for future projects where appropriate.

PRIME MINISTER

Swiss Visit

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Prime Minister what was (a) the date and (b) the purpose of each visit paid by his predecessor to Switzerland between 1979 and 1990; and if he will list the engagements undertaken. [4361]

The Prime Minister: My predecessor has visited Switzerland on an official basis only once. She paid the first ever official visit to Switzerland by a British Prime Minister in office on 20–21 September 1990. The purpose of the visit was to discuss Swiss relations with the European Community, European Security Architecture and the Gulf crisis.

Scott Inquiry

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Prime Minister (1) what representations he has received from the Government of the United States concerning the Scott inquiry; [4360]

(2) what representations either written or oral he has received from the Government of Switzerland concerning the Scott inquiry; [4362]

(3) what representations he has received from the Government of Belgium, either orally or in writing, concerning the Scott inquiry. [4243]

The Prime Minister: As far as I am aware, none.

HEALTH

Influenza Vaccine

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many flu vaccinations have been given (a) so far this year and (b) in the same period last year. [3767]

Mr. Horam: Information on the number of influenza vaccinations given at any point of time is not available. The total number of doses of influenza vaccine distributed so far this influenza season is just over 6 million. Comparable data for the previous year are not available, but 6.1 million doses were eventually distributed by the end of the 1994–95 influenza season.

Special Hospitals

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will make a statement on the cost of care in medium secure units for patients discharged from special hospitals; and what are the arrangements for the financing of this continuing care; [356]

(2) how many patients from special hospitals are expected to be discharged in (a) 1995, (b) 1996 and (c) 1997; and how many of those are Birmingham residents; [3534]

(3) what impact the discharge of patients from special hospitals will have on the availability of places at Reaside medium secure unit. [3535]

Mr. Bowis: District health authorities are responsible for meeting the costs of care for special hospital patients who require continuing health care including care in conditions of medium security. The costs of such care will depend on the facilities provided and the clinical needs of the patient.

Information on the district of residence of special hospital patients and the anticipated number of discharges from the three special hospitals is not available centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact the chairman of the Special Hospitals Service Authority which is responsible for managing the special hospitals, about these matters.

The impact of special hospital discharges on medium secure units is a matter for consideration by the managers of each unit and the health authorities that purchase its services.

Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list by health authority region the number of (a) deaths from and (b) suspected cases of Creutzfeldt Jakob disease expected in each of the last five years. [3663]

Mr. Horam: Information on the number of deaths and referrals in each regional health authority from 1 May 1990 to 30 November 1995 will be placed in the Library.

Hepatitis C

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research he has (a) commissioned (b) evaluated as to the effectiveness of alpha-interferon in the treatment of hepatitis C. [3760]

Mr. Horam: The national health service standing group on health technology has identified the evaluation of the use of alpha-interferon in the treatment of hepatitis C as a top priority for research. The standing group's recommendations include work to assess the effectiveness and cost effectiveness of alpha-interferon in the early treatment of hepatitis C, and its use in the prevention of relapse. In addition the Medical Research Council, which receives its grant-in-aid from the office of my hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, is currently considering a proposal for research on one particular aspect of the treatment of hepatitis C. My Department is also considering further research priorities relating to hepatitis C.

Meningitis

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many deaths have resulted from meningitis in each health district of West Yorkshire in each year since 1990. [3696]

Mr. Horam: The information is shown in the table.

The deaths data up to 1992 for England and Wales represent the number of deaths registered for each year while deaths from 1993 represent the number of deaths which occurred in each year. Also, new procedures for coding cause of death from 1993, and the absence of medical inquiries, mean that figures for 1993 onwards may not be exactly comparable with earlier years. For most conditions however, including all meningitis, these effects are small. More details may be found in "OPCS Series DH2" for 1993, which was published in October 1995; copies of which are available in the Library.

Deaths from meningitis in each local authority district in West Yorkshire, 1990–1994

1990	3	1	3	4	0
1991	4	3	3	10	3
1992	8	1	2	5	3
1993	7	1	3	7	2
1994	5	3	3	2	1

Information is not available at district health authority level. (ICD codes for Meningitis are 013.0, 036.0, 047.0, 047.1, 047.8, 047.9, 049.0, 049.1, 053.0, 0.72.1, 091,8, 094.2, 320, 322).

Prescriptions

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what fee appliance contractors get for the provision of an appliance under the NHS; what fee a pharmacist gets for the provision of a similar appliance under NHS provision; what consideration has been given to altering the system; and if he will make a statement. [3612]

Mr. Malone: Appliance contractors are paid between 15.8 per cent. and 25 per cent. of the cost of the appliance depending on the volume dispensed plus a fee of between 2p and 78p depending of the type of appliance. Pharmacy contractors are paid a basic fee of either 85p or 94.6p plus and additional fee of between 69p and £1.97, according to the type of appliance and its cost. Pharmacy contractors can also be paid a professional allowance once they reach a monthly threshold of prescriptions dispensed and an additional fee for every expensive items. The Department keeps these systems of payment under review.

Tobacco Advertising

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much was spent by the tobacco industry on advertising by means of (a) press advertising, (b) outdoors (billboard) advertising, (c) shop front and point of sale advertising and (d) direct mail in 1994–95. [3981]

Mr. Horam: Information provided by the tobacco industry to assist in monitoring the voluntary agreement on tobacco products advertising and promotion is commercial in confidence.

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has carried out into the effects of the voluntary agreements on tobacco advertising and sponsorship. [3978]

Mr. Horam: The Committee for Monitoring Agreements on Tobacco Adverting and Sponsorship—COMATAS—was established to monitor both the voluntary agreement on tobacco products' advertising and promotion and the voluntary agreement on sponsorship of sport by tobacco companies in the United Kingdom. This committee reports annually on the progress and operation of the voluntary agreements. The eighth report of COMATAS was published on 18 July this year, and copies are available in the Library.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library the documents agreeing the type and level of service to be provided by the healthcare group under the PFI to South Buckinghamshire NHS trust. [4082]

Mr. Horam: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) on 4 December at columns 43–44.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much capital expenditure is forecast to be included in the private finance initiative for the current financial year and the next five financial years. [3827]

Mr. Horam: I refer the hon. Member to table 6.5 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report 1996–97" which was laid before the House on 28 November 1995.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative (a) capital and (b) revenue costs to public funds (i) under the PFI and (iii) estimated to have been incurred had the scheme been funded wholly within the public sector. [3815]

Mr. Horam: The private finance initiative will further develop our excellent record of co-operation with the private sector and ensure new national health service capital schemes are provided promptly and run efficiently, for the benefit of all NHS patients. Before any PFI scheme with significant expenditure consequences for the NHS is approved, a business case is produced a demonstrate the cost-effectiveness of the proposal and assess the public spending implications. Approval to PFI schemes is given only if the business case demonstrates that a PFI approach increases the cost-effectiveness of the scheme for the NHS and if any expenditure implications are affordable to NHS purchasers. The specific information requested is not available centrally.

Oral Contraceptives

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the difference in cost to the NHS between the licensed morning-after pill and the pharmacologically equivalent oral contraceptive; and if he will make a statement. [4106]

Mr. Malone: Information on the prices of oral contraceptives, including the morning-after pill, is in the latest edition of "British National Formulary", copies of which are available in the Library.

NHS Trusts

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many executive directors of NHS trusts received annual salaries of more than £90,000 and £100,000 in (a) 1993–94, (b) 1994–95 and (c) 1995–96; and if he will list each trust giving an annual salary of more than £100,000 to its executive directors in each of these years. [4458]

Mr. Malone: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave her on 28 November at column 604.

Chiropody

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when an announcement will be made regarding access by state registered chiropodists to a restricted group of prescription only medicines, following the submission of proposals by the chiropodists' board of the Council for Professions Supplementary to Medicine earlier this year. [3279]

Mr. Bowis: This proposal is currently being considered.

Draft Medicines Advice Leaflet "MAL 8"

Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) on what date the revised medicines advice leaflet, "MAL 8" draft 3, dated 30 October, was forwarded to (a) the British Herbal Medicine Association and (b) the Society for the Promotion of Nutritional Therapy; and if he will make a statement on the treatment of these organisations in respect of his policy regarding consultation with the Society for the Promotion of Nutritional Therapy; [4114]

(2) if he will list all those organisations which have so far been consulted about the medicines advice leaflet, "MAL 8", draft 3, dated 30 October; and if he will list the dates of meetings which officials of his Department have had with each of those organisations. [4115]

Mr. Malone: The Medicines Control Agency—MCA—has discussed the contents of Leaflet MAL 8 with the Aromatherapy Trades Council—ATC—the British Herbal Manufacturers' Association—BHMA—the Cosmetic Toiletry and Perfumery Association—CTPA—the Council for Responsible Nutrition—CRN—the Health Food Manufacturers' Association—HFMA—the Natural Medicines Association UK Ltd.—NMA—and the Proprietary Association of Great Britain—PAGB.

The MCA met the ATC, BHMA, CTPA, HFMA, NMA and PAGB on 6 September and again, with the exception of the CTPA, on 19 September. The agency met the CRN on 5 October, and the HFMA for a third time on 21 November.

"MAL 8" provides non-statutory guidance to industry and trade associations on whether a product is medicinal. The draft of "MAL 8" dated 30 October was sent on 6 November to the BHMA and other manufacturers' trade associations. It was not sent to the Society for the Promotion of Nutritional Therapy—SPNT—or to other non-manufacturing bodies. The SPNT is amongst those organisations which would be consulted by the MCA on statutory issues.

Road Traffic Act Charges

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to review the procedure for trusts being reimbursed for the treatment of patients injured in road traffic accidents. [4343]

Mr. Horam: The level of charges is periodically reviewed.

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total amount of claims made by all NHS hospitals in real terms under section 157 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 in each of the last five years; and what estimate he has made of the relationship between the amount claimed and the amount that could be claimed if all claims were submitted by every trust. [4341]

Mr. Horam: Information on the number of claims is not available centrally. All national health service hospitals are empowered to collect charges under section 157 of the Road Traffic Act 1988.

Intensive Care Units

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the number of high dependency units and intensive care units in each NHS region in each of the last five years. [4340]

Mr. Horam: This information is not available centrally.

Colostomy Bags

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to restrict the present list of colostomy bags available on the NHS or their availability on the NHS or their availability free of charge to patients. [4347]

Mr. Malone: None. People who have a permanent fistula are exempt from prescription charges, and this includes people who use colostomy bags.

Road Traffic Accidents

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the total cost to the NHS in each of the last five years of treating patients with injuries resulting from road traffic accidents. [4342]

Mr. Horam: This information is not available.

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients were treated in each of the last five years for injuries caused by road traffic accidents. [4344]

Mr. Horam: The information available centrally is shown in the table. This information covers only admissions to hospital.

External cause of admission—motor vehicle traffic accidents (Code E810-E819)

Ultrasound

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of hospitals do not use ultrasound scans while carrying out amniocentesis on pregnant women. [4338]

Mr. Horam: This information is not available centrally.

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate his Department has made of the miscarriage risk of amniocentesis (a) with and (b) without ultrasound; and if he will make a statement. [4339]

Mr. Horam: The Department has not made any estimates of the miscarriage risk with or without ultrasound of amniocentesis.

This is a clinical matter and as such a matter for the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists. The Department of Health has asked the RCOG to consider this issue.

Health Information Services

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will make a statement on the issue of HSG(92)91 to health authorities; and what information is to be collated by this guidance; [4232]

(2) what information is retained by his Department in respect of HSG(92)91; [4233]

(3) if the appropriate bodies within the national health service have supplied the information they are obliged to under HSG(92)91; and what action his Department has taken in respect of those authorities not complying with this guidance. [4234]

Mr. Horam: HSG(92)21, issued in March 1992, required regional health authorities to establish a health information service for the public in their region from 1 April 1992, accessible by an 0345 telephone line. In January 1993, these regional services became the national health information service, accessible by the public through an 0800 telephone line. All regional health authorities established a service and continue to run them as required by the guidelines.

The health information service is required to provide information about local services, patients charter standards, waiting times, common diseases and conditions, how to complain about NHS services and maintaining and improving health.

The Department holds information about the cost of and numbers of calls to the health information service.

Revised guidelines, HSG(95)44, issued on 18 September 1995, supersede HSG(92)21 and should be implemented by health authorities from April 1996.

Unregistrable Children's Homes

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice he has given to representatives of placing local authorities about communicating concerns about poor practice in unregistrable children's homes to area local authorities. [4283]

Mr. Bowis: LAC(93)16, copies of which are available in the Library, advises that authorities placing children in homes in a different area must inform the geographical authority about the placement and that authority should inform themselves about the welfare of those children.

The guidance "Working Together Under the Children Act 1989" issues to local authorities advises that where abuse by a member of staff in a children's home is suspected the local social services department should be informed immediately.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many ministerial visits have been undertaken by each Minister in his Department between 6 July and 1 December; and how many and what percentage of these have involved the Minister travelling abroad. [4235]

Mr. Horam: The information is shown in the table:

	Total number of visits	Total number of visits abroad	Visits abroad as a percentage of total number of visits

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Legal Aid

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what was the total amount paid in legal aid; what was the total amount of (a) individual recipients and (b) other recipients in each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement. [4039]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Unfortunately, in the time available, it has not proved possible to collate the required data. I shall write to the hon. and learned Member as soon as possible.

Bailiffs

Mr. Steen: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will introduce powers to prevent bailiffs from seizing assets in excess of 1000 per cent. of the original debt. [3467]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: A debtor aggrieved by irregularity in the execution of a warrant, which can include excessive seizure, has a right to sue for damages. Further regulation of bailiffs is being considered in the context of the review of the organisation and management of civil enforcement agents.

Financial Penalties (Enforcement)

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when the working group on the enforcement of financial penalties was set up by his Department; what were its terms of reference; and who constitutes the membership. [3431]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The first meeting of the working group on the enforcement of financial penalties was on 19 May 1995. Its terms of reference are urgently to identify ways of improving the enforcement of financial penalties, including fines, compensation orders and confiscation orders, so as to reduce the level of financial penalties in arrears and the level of write-offs, and in particular: to establish the true level and nature of financial penalties in arrears; to promote the identification and wider application of "good practice" in the enforcement of financial penalties, taking note as appropriate of the work of the inspectorate in this area; to recommend procedural, administrative or legislative changes which would improve the enforcement of financial penalties; and to conduct or sponsor further research, if necessary, into the enforcement of financial penalties.

The membership is as specified in the written answer of 19 July 1995, Official Report, column 1300, except for the addition since that date of a representative of the metropolitan stipendiary magistrates.

Dr. Jones: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department on how many occasions a warrant of distress under section 76 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980 was applied for in the case of those defendants who were jailed for fine default during 1994. [3439]

Mr. Evans: The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Dr. Jones: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department on how many occasions an application was made to the High Court or county court for enforcement under section 87 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980, in cases of those defendants who were jailed for fine default during 1994. [3440]

Mr. Evans: The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative (a) capital and (b) revenue costs to public funds (i) under the PFI and (ii) estimated to have been incurred had the scheme been funded wholly within the public sector. [3816]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: For the Lord Chancellor's Department, including the Court Service and the Public Trust Office, no such schemes have yet been approved.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how much capital expenditure is forecast to be included in the private finance initiative for the current year and the next five financial years. [3839]

Mr. Evans: For the Lord Chancellor's Department, including the Court Service and the Public Trust Office, it is forecast that the capital expenditure to be sought from the private sector within the private finance initiative will be nil in 1995–96, £10 million in 1996–97, £29 million in 1997–98, £35 million in 1998–99, £27 million in 1999–2000 and £28 million in 2000–01. There are also 49 magistrates' court building schemes planned for the next five financial years, for which local authorities will need to seek private finance.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

EU Agriculture Council

Mr. Thomason: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Agriculture Council held in Brussels on 29 and 30 November; and if he will make a statement. [4847]

Mr. Hogg: This meeting of the Council took no formal decisions.

The Council again considered the Commission's proposal to alter the calculation of the additional set-aside that farmers are required to make, in the following year, when the regional base area for arable crops has been exceeded. Other member states were prepared to accept a package of amendments to the proposal, one of which was that additional set-aside of less than 1 per cent., should not apply in 1996. I made clear that I did not support this element, because it would illogically discriminate against farmers in areas where the additional requirement fell just the other side of the line.

There was a further discussion of the Commission's proposal for changes to the support system for fruit and vegetables. The Council reached no conclusions and will return to the subject at its next meeting.

In response to questions the Agriculture Commissioner, Mr. Fischler, confirmed that he intended to submit his report on the treatment of veal calves in time for the Council's next meeting.

Sheep Dips

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the certificate of competence scheme for the purchase of organophosphorus sheep dips. [4848]

Mrs. Browning: Following advice from the Veterinary Products Committee, new restrictions on the sale of organophosphorus sheep dips were introduced in 1994. A requirement that such dips may be purchased only by persons holding, or employing someone who holds, a certificate of competence in their use came fully into effect on 1 April this year. I have now set in hand a review to assess the effectiveness of the scheme. The views of a wide range of interests are currently being sought on this land and other aspects of the use of organophosphorus sheep dips. A copy of the consultation letter and circulation list is being placed in the Library of the House.

The Veterinary Products Committee will be asked to review the results of the consultation and I expect to receive the further advice of the VPC early next year.

Public Bodies

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the annual income from (a) fees, (b) charges and (c) fines; what was the total number of staff employed (i) part-time and (ii) full-time: and what contribution his Department has made towards the annual running costs in each of the past three years in respect of (1) the Agricultural Wages Board, (2) the Wine Standards Board, (3) the plant health and seeds inspectorate, (4) the sea fisheries inspectorate, (5) the Animal Health Act inspectors and veterinary inspectorate, (6) the egg marketing inspectorate, (7) the fatstock inspectorate, (8) the horticultural marketing inspectorate, (9) the terrestrial radiological inspectorate, (10) the fisheries radiological inspectorate, (11) the fisheries disease inspectorate and (12) the milk and dairies inspection under ADAS. [2752]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 28 November 1995]: The information is as follows:

Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food

	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95
1. Agricultural Wages Board
Fees and charges	Nil	Nil	Nil
Fines	Nil	Nil	Nil
MAFF contribution to running costs	£140,000	£175,000	£203,647
Staff numbers	Nil	Nil	Nil
The above running cost figures include the cost of secretarial support provided by MAFF of	£88,401	£94,103	£104,477

The board does not employ staff.

	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95
2. The Wine Standards Board
Fees and charges	Nil	Nil	Nil
Fines	Nil	Nil	Nil
MAFF contribution to running costs	£159,000	£284,000	£296,000
Staff numbers	13	13	13

This body is an NDPB, outside the central running cost regime.

	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95
3. The Plant Health and Seeds Inspectorate
Fees and charges	£717,793	£524,854	£530,638
Fines	Nil	£1,500	Nil
MAFF contribution to running costs	£2,820,980	£3,166,293	£3,367,492
Staff numbers	115	110	105

Inspection charges aim to cover the relevant costs of the plant health and seeds inspectorate and other services which contribute to the chargeable services.

	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95
4. The Sea Fisheries Inspectorate
Fees and charges	Nil	Nil	Nil
Fines	Nil	Nil	Nil
MAFF contribution to running costs	£2,215,000	£2,788,000	£2,864,000
Staff numbers	95	117	117

Records of fines imposed by the inspectorate are not readily accessible and in the time available it has not been possible to obtain the necessary details.

	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95
5. The Animal Health Act Inspectors and Veterinary Inspectorate
Fees and charges	£1,674,897	£1,838,261	£1,492,415
Fines	n/a	n/a	n/a
MAFF contribution to running costs	£1,674,897	£1,838,261	£1,492,415
Staff numbers	88	76	48

The inspectorate has no powers to impose fines. The courts do this but in the time available it has not been possible to access the records. The question relates to animal health inspectors and the veterinary inspectorate. No structure of this nature exists in MAFF. Therefore, it is assumed the question refers to those parts of the "Animal Health and Veterinary Group" which carry out functions of a similar nature. Fees and charges are set to recover the full cost of the service.

	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95
6. The Egg Marketing Inspectorate
Fees and charges	Nil	Nil	Nil
Fines	£4,418	£11,680	£7,354
MAFF contribution to running costs	£1,450,000	£1,470,000	£1,100,000
Staff numbers	35	35	37

Fines are administered by courts as the Inspectorate has no powers to impose fines. In the time available it has not been possible to access the relevant records.

	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95
7. The Fatstock Inspectorate
Fees and charges	£494,547	£458,097	£390,987
Fines	Nil	Nil	Nil
MAFF contribution to running costs	£428,314	£481,276	£480,069
Staff numbers	12	12	10

No fines are imposed. The Intervention Board Executive Agency commissions the work. Fees and charges aim to achieve full cost recovery.

	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95
8. The Horticultural Marketing Inspectorate
Fees and charges	£231,678	£252,000	£258,000
Fines	Nil	Nil	Nil
MAFF contribution to running costs	£231,678	£252,000	£258,000
Staff numbers	3	4	6

The fees above are payments from the IBEA for enforcement work on CAP in England and Wales and work for the London commodity market exchange for potatoes. The fees above are set to recover the full cost of the Inspectorate.

	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95
9. The Terrestrial Radiological Inspectorate
Fees and charges	£1,379,110	£1,526,663	£1,535,375
Fines	Nil	Nil	Nil
MAFF contribution to running costs	£1,379,110	£1,526,663	£1,525,375
Staff numbers	12	11	13

Fees and charges are set to recover the full cost MAFF incurs in providing this service. Only Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution, an agency of the DOE, can impose fines.

	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95
10. The Fisheries Radiological Inspectorate
Fees and charges	£1,855,130	£2,274,724	£2,086,609
Fines	Nil	Nil	Nil
MAFF contribution to running costs	£1,855,130	£2,274,724	£2,086,609
Staff numbers	32	35	35

Fees and charges are set to recover the full cost MAFF incurs in providing this service. Fines are imposed by HMIP as above.

	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95
11. The Fish Disease Inspectorate
Fees and charges	£2,111	£821	£606
Fines	Nil	Nil	Nil
MAFF contribution to running costs	£534,638	£1,239,853	£1,326,678
Staff numbers	10	21	23

Fees relate to ad-hoc additional services for export certification as requested by the exporter. No charge is made for domestic or European Union certification. The inspectorate has no powers to impose fines. Staff figures in the respective years include 5, 12 and 13 administrators engaged in other parts of the fish health programme, including diagnostic work on import licensing.

	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95
12. The Milk and Dairies Inspection under ADAS
Fees and charges	£1,348,330	£1,267,496	£1,341,440
Fines	Nil	Nil	Nil
MAFF contribution to running costs	£1,804,560	£1,384,757	£1,392,426
Staff numbers	29	28	27

1. Staff numbers shown above include full-time and part-time employees (full-time equivalents).
2. All figures are rounded to the nearest whole number.
3. Except where full cost recovery is indicated, "MAFF's contribution to running costs" shown above represents cash costs of pay and work related personal expenses.

Animal Welfare

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to ensure that full consultation takes place on the draft animal transportation guidelines; and if he will make a statement. [3178]

Mrs. Browning: The consultation package on the new EU rules on animal welfare during transport was sent to some 600 interested organisations and individuals on 23 October. It was drawn up on the basis of preliminary discussions with the major interest groups; we are having further meetings and discussions as the consultation process progresses. Further public consultation will take place on the legal texts which will be drawn up after the present exercise concludes on 15 December.

Frogs' Legs

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the countries of origin of frogs' legs imported by the United Kingdom in (a) 1993 and (b) 1994; and if he will make a statement on the import by the United Kingdom of frogs' legs from Bangladesh in (a) 1993 and (b) 1994. [3204]

Mrs. Browning: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave him on 31 October 1995, Official Report, column 225–26. There were no imports of frogs' legs direct from Bangladesh into the UK during 1993 and 1994 or into the EU countries from which the UK imported frogs' legs in 1993 and 1994.

Fishing Vessels

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many Spanish-owned but British-registered fishing vessels were prevented from fishing in United Kingdom waters under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1988 now overturned by the European Court; what action was taken against those vessels; how many were subsequently (a) tied up in Britain, (b) tied up in Spain, (c) transferred to Spain to continue fishing and (d) sold to other owners; what investigation has he made into each vessel's claim for compensation; and what records each will be required to produce to substantiate that claim. [3689]

Mr. Baldry: Some 150 vessels were removed from the UK fishing vessel register in 1989. About 95 of these vessels have returned to the UK register or have had their licences placed on other UK-registered vessels. Detailed information is not held on the whereabouts of those vessels which have not returned to the UK register.

The issue of whether compensation is payable to vessels removed from the register is awaiting a ruling by the European Court of Justice. The Advocate General, in his opinion of 28 November, was of the view that national Governments are liable to pay damages to individuals where the legislature has passed a national law which is incompatible with Community law, provided that the obligation imposed on the state from which the individual's right is derived is clear. The Advocate General's opinion is not binding, however, and we must await the ruling of the court itself. If the court took a similar view to the Advocate General it would be for the UK courts to determine its application in individual cases.

Nitrate Levels (Lettuces)

Mr. Cash: To ask the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the research by Aberdeen university on nitrate levels in lettuces. [3490]

Mrs. Browning: This study at Aberdeen university on the metabolism of dietary nitrate in man is funded by the Ministry and started earlier this year. Preliminary results indicate that nitrate in the diet, which derives mainly from leafy green vegetables, including lettuce, may play a significant role in protecting the body from infection by pathogenic organisms. A full assessment of this work will be made on its completion.

Monkfish

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals he has to amend the United Kingdom quota for monkfish to take account of the practicalities of fishing in the English channel. [4013]

Mr. Baldry: For 1996 I propose to support an increase in the total allowable catch and hence the UK quota for monkfish in International Council for the Exploration of the Seas area VII. This includes the English channel.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative (a) capital and (b) revenue costs to public funds (i) under the PFI and (ii) estimated to have been incurred had the scheme been funded wholly within the public sector. [3817]

Mr. Boswell: Several projects are currently being assessed for their potential but no schemes have so far been agreed under the private finance initiative.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much capital expenditure is forecast to be included in the private finance initiative for the current financial year and the next five financial years. [3822]

Mr. Boswell: I refer the hon. Member to table 6.5 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report 1996–97", which was laid before the House on 28 November 1995.

ENVIRONMENT

Health Care Waste

Sir Mark Lennox-Boyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will instruct his officials to hold discussions with the Sanitary Medical Disposal Services Association in respect of the definition of hazardous health care wastes; [3549]

(2) if he will instruct his officials to have discussions with officials at the Department of Transport to ensure that the definition of infectious waste applied to the transport of infectious waste is identical to the definition of infectious waste applying to the disposal of infectious waste; [3550]

(3) if he will ensure that the waste management paper No. 23 to be implemented in 1996 will specify that hazardous health care waste should be interpreted to include only notifiable disease waste. [3548]

Mr. Clappison: I know that the Sanitary Medical Disposal Services Association is concerned lest developments in the regulation fo health care wastes might damage its members' business. The association can at any time initiate new discussions with my Department. The association may also wish to comment on the Health and Safety Commission's draft revised version of the Carriage of Dangerous Goods by Road and Rail (Classification, Packaging and Labelling) Regulations 1994. Consultation among Departments would depend to some extent on the nature of the association's concerns. But since I wish to minimise inconvenience to business and to ensure proper arrangements for environmental protection and health and safety, my Department will in any case consult further with the Department of Transport. If alterations in the UK statute were the right course, that would be done in the normal way: waste management papers cannot alter statute or the rules of statutory interpretation.

Employment Medical Advisory Service

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many staff were employed in the employment medical advisory service of the Health and Safety Executive in (a) 1980 (b) 1985 and (c) each of the last five years. [3610]

Sir Paul Beresford: The table shows the number of staff employed by the employment medical advisory service of the Health and Safety Executive in (a) 1980 (b) 1985 and (c) each of the last five years.

Year
(1 April)

1980: 145.5

1985: 106.5

1991: 93.5

1992: 100

1993: 108

1994: 98.5

1995: 78.34

Village Halls

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimates he has made of the number of village halls in England (a) in 1979 and (b) at present. [3947]

Mr. Clappison: I understand from Action with Communities in Rural England that the number of village halls in England was (a) 8,350 in 1979 and (b) 8,600 at present.

Mr. Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to increase the resources available to fund capital projects for charitable village halls. [3946]

Sir Paul Beresford: The White Paper on Rural England published by my Department and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in October recognised the important role village halls play in small communities. My Department has recently agreed that the Rural Development Commission should increase to £1.15 million the amount it will make available to communities for the construction, renovation or improvement of village halls and community centres during 1995–96.

In many cases, funding for capital spending on village halls is administered by the local parish or town council. To fund capital spending a council may use any revenue funds or capital receipts that are available to it or may choose to borrow. The Local Government Act 1972 requires parish and town councils to apply for a specific borrowing approval from the Secretary of State. Borrowing approvals are subject to an overall national limit for each financial year. The national limit for England in 1995–96 was increased to £6.195 million. The national limit for 1996–97 will be announced next February.

Fur Imports

Mr. Heppell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) when he expects to implement European regulation 3254/91; [3916]

(2) if he will list the countries which under the European Regulation 3254/91 are banned from importing certain furs to the European Union. [3917]

Mr. Clappison: Under EC regulation 3254/91, use of the leghold trap has been banned in the European Union since 1 January 1995. The ban on the import of certain furs was postponed until 1 January 1996. The college of Commissioners intends to submit proposals to the Council of Ministers and the European Parliament seeking postponement of the import ban. We will consider these when we see the details.

Local Authority Attendance Allowances

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the percentage change in attendance allowances between 1995–96 and 1996–97 for each local authority in England; and for each local authority, which political party is in control. [3796]

Sir Paul Beresford: My Department neither collects nor holds information in respect of attendance allowances set by local authorities.

Government Offices

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the budget for each regional Government office in (a) 1994–95 and (b) 1995–96; and what is to be the budget for 1996–97. [4318]

Sir Paul Beresford: Detailed information about the budgets for the Government office in each region in 1994–95 and 1995–96 is provided in "GO MINIS 1", copies of which were placed in the Library in July. The budgets for 1996–97 have not yet been agreed.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of the number of refugees who will be in need of accommodation following the implementation of the social security orders in January; and what provision he has made to provide emergency accommodation for such refugees. [4074]

Mr. Clappison [holding answer 5 December 1995]: Following implementation of the Social Security (Persons From Abroad) Miscellaneous Regulations 1995, asylum seekers who apply for asylum after entering the United Kingdom, and those whose applications for asylum have been refused, will have no entitlement to social security benefits and will be expected to make their own arrangements for accommodation while they are in this country. Asylum seekers who meet the statutory homelessness criteria will continue to be eligible for assistance under the homelessness legislation.

Under provisions in the Asylum and Immigration Bill, currently before Parliament, the Secretary of State would have the power to specify by order classes of persons requiring leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom who would not be eligible for assistance under the homelessness legislation, and classes of persons who would not be entitled to be allocated council accommodation. We intend to use these powers to align the entitlement to public housing assistance of persons who require leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom, including asylum seekers, with their entitlement to social security benefits.

Persons who are granted refugee status, or exceptional leave to remain in the United Kingdom, will continue to be entitled to public housing assistance.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his oral statement on last year's local government finance 30 November, Official Report, columns 1333–39, if the increased resources for education announced by her Majesty's Government will be included in the standard spending assessments for financial year 1996–97; and how many councils who are also local education authorities will have increases in their revenue support grant that will permit them to expand their annual resources on education without reducing the levels of other services provided in 1995–96 or increasing the amount of council time levied in that year. [4178]

Sir Paul Beresford [holding answer 5 December 1995]: Education standard spending will increase by 4.5 per cent. in 1996–97. The provisional capping criteria will allow all authorities to increase their spending in line with the increase in their education SSAs. Aggregate external finance, which includes revenue support grant and is not hypothecated, will increase by 2.8 per cent., as against an increase in total standard spending, excluding the provision for local government reorganisation, of 3.1 per cent.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of the likely reduction in private funding in housing through the private finance initiative as a result of the reduction in funding to housing associations announced in the recent Budget. [4334]

Mr. Clappison [holding answer 5 December 1995]: An estimate of the private finance which is expected to be attracted by the Housing Corporation's approved development programme will be available in late January, when the programme has been finalised.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much capital expenditure is forecast to be included in the private finance initiative for the current financial year and the next five financial years. [3825]

Sir Paul Beresford: The projected figures for the years 1995–96 to 1998–99 are set out in the table. Estimates for subsequent years are not yet available.

Year	Forecast private finance (£ billion)
1995–96	4.5
1996–97	6.0
1997–98	6.0
1998–99	5.0

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative (a) capital and (b) revenue costs (i) under the PFI and (ii) estimated to have been incurred had the scheme been wholly funded within the public sector. [3820]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Department of the Environment and its sponsored bodies attracted around £4 billion in private investment in support of its programmes in 1994–95 and expects to increase that figure in 1995–96. This will assist the delivery of a very large number of projects, most notably ones relating to housing, inner cities and regeneration. It is not practicable for the Department to collect detailed information on each project being advanced under private financing arrangements.

Yorkshire Water

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received over the last year from individuals and organisations expressing concerns about the ability of Yorkshire Water to supply water, and its investment programmes; and what action he or his officials have taken following such representations. [4214]

Mr. Clappison: A number of representations have been received over the past year from interested parties about various aspects of Yorkshire Water's activities. The Government have announced a review of the lessons to be learnt from this summer's drought and of the action to be taken to enable a sensible balance to be struck between customers' expectations and costs of providing the service and protecting the environment.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) on what dates in the last year he, other Ministerial colleagues or officials have met (a) representatives of Yorkshire Water and (b) the director of Ofwat or Ofwat officials to discuss matters relating to Yorkshire Water; [4215]

(2) how many representations and on what dates he has received from Ofwat over the past three years, about the ability of Yorkshire Water to supply water to all its customers during periods of drought; and on what dates he or his officials made contact with Yorkshire Water about such representations; and if he will make a statement. [4216]

Mr. Clappison: Ministers have met Yorkshire Water officials on several occasions over the year. There is frequent contact between officials and the Director General of Water Services and his officials. No representations have been made by Ofwat to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment about Yorkshire Water.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will establish an independent public inquiry into all aspects of Yorkshire Water; [4217]

(2) what plans he has for encouraging Yorkshire Water to invest more in infrastructure to enable it to move water within the region and to repair leaks and maintain pipes. [4218]

Mr. Clappison: A public inquiry would not be appropriate. The performance of Yorkshire Water is a matter for the Director General of Water Services, who has already written to the company about various aspects of its operations.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many ministerial visits have been undertaken by each Minister in his Department between 6 July and 1 December; and how many and what percentage of these have involved the Minister travelling abroad. [4226]

Mr. Curry: I undertook 17 ministerial visits between 6 July and 1 December this year, of which one involved travelling outside the United Kingdom. The Secretary of State undertook 29 visits, of which seven involved travelling outside the UK. My right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Countryside, Earl Ferrers, undertook 10 visits, of which two involved travelling outside the UK. The Minister for Construction, Planning and Energy Efficiency, my hon. Friend the Member for West Hertfordshire (Mr. Jones) undertook 20 visits, of which three involved travelling outside the UK. The Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon Central (Sir Paul Beresford) undertook 16 visits, none of which involved travelling outside the UK. The Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) undertook 20 visits, of which three involved travelling outside the UK.

DEFENCE

Rucker Report

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) when he expects to publish the Rucker report on the guarding of MoD establishments; [3333]

(2) what consultations have so far taken place on the Rucker report. [3334]

Mr. Soames: Details of our proposals for the future of Defence police and guarding structures are being published today. Copies of the consultative document are being sent to staff associations and trade unions. Copies will also be placed in the Library of the House.

Bosnia

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration he has given to the charter of transport facilities for British troops being deployed to Bosnia. [4351]

Mr. Soames: No transport facilities have been chartered to move British troops to Bosnia as this task is being undertaken by the RAF's air transport force. Two US Navy ships have been chartered to move the equipment for United Kingdom forces. Other shipping will be chartered as necessary.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what instructions have been given to the members of the armed forces serving in Bosnia who are in situations where alleged war criminals are present. [4352]

Mr. Soames: UNPROFOR troops are not mandated to arrest individuals indicted for war crimes by the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia. NATO is actively examining how the peace implementation force can help the work of the tribunal, although its principal tasks will be monitoring the ceasefire and the separation forces.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning the rules of engagement for British troops participating in the Bosnian peace implementation force. [4350]

Mr. Soames: It is not our policy to comment in detail on rules of engagement. However, I can confirm that United Kingdom troops will operate under NATO rules of engagement which will be consistent with the requirement for self-defence and will ensure that they can carry out their mission effectively.

Defence Cost Study Reports

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the titles of each defence cost study report. [4357]

Mr. Soames: The information requested is contained in the Ministry of Defence memoranda "Front Line First" of 14 July 1994 and "Front Line First—A Year On" of 30 June 1995. Copies of both are available in the Library of the House.

Cannabis

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his Department's policy concerning the recruitment of personnel who have a criminal record for using cannabis; and if he will make a statement. [4353]

Mr. Soames: All applicants to the armed forces who have a conviction for the sale, possession or abuse of controlled drugs are deemed to be unsuitable for military service.

Experimentation with class B "soft" drugs, such as cannabis, is not a bar to entry to the armed forces in itself, but the attitude to drugs is of prime importance. A young person who has used cannabis on a one-off basis will not be automatically rejected.

Personnel Statistics

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many employees there are in (a) the armed forces, (b) Ministry of Defence civilian staff, (c) Ministry of Defence agencies and (d) Ministry of Defence contractorised agencies. [4355]

Mr. Soames: Regular service and civilian personnel strengths are given in table 2.1 of "UK Defence Statistics 1995", a copy of which is in the House of Commons Library. Personnel numbers in Defence agencies are given in table 2.20 of the same publication.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many ministerial visits have been undertaken by each Minister in his Department between 6 July and 1 December; and how many and what percentage of these have involved the Minister travelling abroad. [4241]

Mr. Soames: Ministers carry out many visits in the course of their official duties. During the period in question the numbers of official visits overseas by Defence Ministers were as follows:

Secretary of State: 7
Minister of State (Armed Forces): 4
Minister of State (Defence Procurement): 2
Under-Secretary of State: 1.

Some of these visits involved more than one country.

Army Recruitment

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what actions he has taken to improve his Department's recruitment for the British Army. [4354]

Mr. Soames: We are conducting a vigorous campaign to increase recruiting to the British Army and plan to spend an additional £5 million on recruit advertising in this financial year. We are also reviewing the planned number and location of Army careers offices to take account of the need for increased recruiting. These recruiting initiatives are matched by additional retention incentives to encourage soldiers to stay longer in the Army. We are also considering other ideas for recruitment to the armed forces.

Armed Service Pensions

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many people are currently in receipt of armed service pensions. [4356]

Mr. Soames: As at 31 October 1995, pensions were being paid to 319,251 people under the anned forces pension scheme.

Ministry Police

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to the annual report on the MoD police, for what reasons a shortfall of 195 posts in the Ministry of Defence police has occurred. [3335]

Mr. Arbuthnot: A manning deficit was maintained by the chief constable to reflect known base closures and anticipated manpower reductions resulting from base security reviews at the time the 1994–95 annual report was published.

Consultants

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those (a) consultants, (b) outside organisations and (c) individuals employed by his Department in each year since 1990, indicating the purposes of their employment and the total payments made to them. [3960]

Mr. Soames: Budget-holders throughout the Ministry of Defence have delegated authority to engage external advisors, on a paid consultancy basis or otherwise, to conduct independent reviews of aspects of the Department's work. Information on such studies is not collected centrally, and the details requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Information relating to individuals employed by the Department are contained in the civil service staff post summary tables, copies of which are available in the Library of the House. Individuals employed by the Department are engaged in assisting the Department to attain its aims and objectives as set out in the departmental report.

Territorial Army

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many members of the Territorial Army and Army Reserve are to be called out for service with NATO implementation force in former Yugoslavia. [4836]

Mr. Soames: Following further planning work, a requirement for about 460 TA and Army reservists has been identified in the UK's contribution to the NATO implementation force. In order to allow a margin for those who prove to be medially unfit or otherwise unsuitable for service, I have authorised the call-out of up to 550 members of the Territorial Army and Army Reserve. All are volunteers for the operation. They will report to the infantry training centre, Catterick for medical screening, and selection and acceptance into service. Those who deploy will undertake refresher training before joining their units.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police Station Detainees

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the levels of morbidity and mortality of detainees in police stations, for each of the last five years for which information is held. [4036]

Mr. Maclean: The available information held centrally relates to deaths of persons occurring within police stations. The information, which excludes the Metropolitan police district, is given in the table. Statistics for deaths occurring within the Metropolitan police district are produced by the force on a financial year basis and published in the annual reports of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, copies of which are available in the Library.

Number of deaths occurring within police stations England and Wales (excluding MPD)

Year	Number of deaths
1990	19
1991	21
1992	15
1993	15
1994	17

Mr. Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what clinical and therapeutic guidelines are in place for the care of detainees in police stations with opiate withdrawal; and if he will make a statement. [4035]

Mr. Maclean: The Department of Health has issued guidelines for the clinical management of substance misusers in police custody, which have been distributed to all police forces.

Mr. Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidelines are in place outlining standards of health care to which detainees in police stations are entitled; and if he will make a statement. [4034]

Mr. Maclean: The code of practice for the detention, treatment and questioning of persons by police officers—code C—issued under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 sets out, among other things. the arrangements for the medical care of detained persons in a police station. The British Medical Association in conjunction with the Association of Police Surgeons has produced guidance for police surgeons on the health care of police detainees.

Police Surgeons

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police surgeons were approved under section 12 of the Mental Health Act 1983, for each of the last ten years for which figures are available. [4037]

Mr. Maclean: Police surgeons are employed by individual police forces. No information is held centrally on the numbers approved under the Mental Health Act.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative (a) capital and (b) revenue costs to public funds (i) under the PFI and (ii) estimated to have been incurred had the scheme been funded wholly within the public sector. [3814]

Mr. Howard: Two projects have been contractually agreed under the private finance initiative.

The estimated costs to public funds are as follows:

£000

Schemes contractually agreed	(a) Capital	(b) Revenue (per annum)
(i) Under the PFI
Police National Network	[1]—	[2]not available
Gatwick Immigration Detention Centre	[1]—	[3]987
(ii) If the projects had been wholly public sector funded:
Police National Network	12,000	13,000
Gatwick Immigration Detention Centre	15,000	[3]0

[1] The initial capital cost to the contractor of the PNN is believed to be of the order of £10m (with an estimated full cost over 5 years of some £50 million), and of the Gatwick Centre £12m.

[2] Police forces purchase usage of the network from public funds, and the value will vary with demand.

[3] The current contract relates only to the provision of the Centre. A separate operating contract is to follow.

1. Under both scenarios, preparatory costs will/would have been incurred within my Department.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much capital expenditure is forecast to be included in the private finance initiative for the current financial year and the next five financial years. [3828]

Mr. Howard: Private sector capital expenditure in this financial year is expected to be £20 million. For future years. I refer the hon. Member to table 6.5 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report 1996–97" which was laid before the House on 28 November 1995.

Asylum Appeals

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been granted asylum on appeal in each of the last 20 years. [4038]

Mr. Kirkhope: Information for 1994 on the outcome of appeals of people who had been refused asylum—including those initially granted exceptional leave to remain—is given in table 8.3 of the Home Office Statistical Bulletin "Asylum Statistics United Kingdom 1994", issue 15/95. A copy of this publication is available in the Library.

Not all people whose appeals are allowed or referred back to the Secretary of State are granted asylum; some appeals allowed by adjudicators are reversed by the tribunal and others which were dismissed are subsequently granted asylum or exceptional leave to remain.

Approximately 100 people are estimated to have been granted asylum after appeal in 1994. Information prior to 1994 is not available.

Arrest Warrants

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many warrants of arrest for non-payment of compensation were issued in each police authority in the latest year for which latest information is available; if he will give the numbers of these warrants which were not executed; and how many were subsequently re-issued. [4282]

Mr. Maclean: The information requested is not held centrally.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Donohue: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many ministerial visits have been undertaken by each Minister in his Department between 6 July and 1 December; and how many and what percentage of these have involved the Minister travelling abroad. [4225]

Mr. Howard: The information requested is as follows:

	Total visits	Visits abroad	Percentage
Home Secretary	69	5	7.2
Baroness Blatch	17	0	0
Ann Widdecombe	25	3	12
Mr. David Maclean	26	0	0
Mr. Nicholas Baker (to 17 October)	5	1	20
Mr. Timothy Kirkhope (from 17 October)	4	0	0

My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville) joined the Department on 28 November 1995 but did not make any ministerial visits between then and 1 December 1995.

Correspondence

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston dated 29 August. [4529]

Mr. Howard: I wrote to the hon. Member about the case of Mr. Paul Malone today.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many more people aged 65 years or over would qualify for the mobility component of disability living allowance, at the higher and lower rate, respectively, if the age limit were removed; how many of them would be receiving attendance allowance or disability living allowance under the existing rules; how many people aged 65 years or over, by five year age groups, are now receiving the mobility component at the higher and lower rate respectively. [2739]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the tables.

Disability Living Allowance (DLA) recipients aged over 65 receiving the mobility component

Age	Higher rate	Lower rate
65–69	185,600	12,200
70–74	81,100	None
75–79	22,500	None
80+	2,700	None
All	291,900	12,200

Estimate extra number of people likely to qualify for the DLA mobility component if the upper age limit were removed

Higher rate	Lower rate
2,000,000	60,000

Notes:

1. Estimates are rounded to the nearest 10,000, they are speculative and subject to very substantial margins of error.

2. Insufficient information is held to estimate how many of these people would be receiving DLA or AA under existing rules.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative (a) capital and (b) revenue costs to public funds (i) under the PFI and (ii) estimated to have been incurred had the scheme been funded wholly within the public sector. [3810]

Mr. Burt: The first award of a PFI contract for the replacement of the national insurance recording system was made in April 1995. Costs from public funds will not arise until the system has been developed and successfully delivered to the Department. The total value of the project based on the public funded option is estimated at £150 million.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much capital expenditure is forecast to be included in the private finance initiative for the current financial year and the next five financial years. [3832]

Mr. Burt: I refer the hon. Member to table 6.5 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report 1996–97" which was laid before the House on 28 November 1995.

Information Helplines

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what have been (a) the costs of establishing, operating and publicising the information helplines established by his Department and (b) the number of calls made to each of these lines since their establishment. [4448]

Mr. Burt: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) on 3 April 1995, Official Report, column 960–61.

Such further information as is available is as follows

DSS HEADQUARTERS

Number of calls

January 1995–December 1995: 64,151

The telephone costs for the public enquiry office cannot be distinguished from overall telephone costs for the building from which they operate.

The annual staffing costs are £60,000.

Benefits Agency

Freeline (free phone)

Number of calls handled in the last 12 months up to 14 November 1995: 2.7 million

Annual cost of call charges: £1.1 million

Annual running costs (staff): £4.9 million

Benefit Enquiry Line (free phone)

Number of calls handled in the last 12 months up to 24 November 1995: 0.9 million

Annual cost of call charges: £0.75 million

Annual running costs (staff): £2.72 million

Family Credit Advice Line (full rate)

Number of calls handled in the last 12 months up to 24 November 1995: 2.2 million

Annual cost of call charges: nil

Annual running costs (staff): £1.6 million

Disability Living Allowance Line (subsidised)

Number of calls handled in the last 12 months up to 24 November 1995: 2 million

Annual cost of call charges: £0.072 million

Annual running costs (staff): £1.62 million

Note:

The Pension Advice line (now Pensions Direct) which had been included in the last answer is not considered as solely an information enquiry line. The line is a dedicated service offering a facility for customers to notify change of circumstances.

Contributions Agency

Breakdown of figures for the Social Security Advice Line (SSALE) which were not available in March are as follows:

Number of calls

April 1994 to March 1995: 225,124

April 1995 to November 1995: 216,391

The operating costs for 1994–95 were £240,558. During this financial year the accommodation occupied by SSALE in Glasgow underwent a major refurbishment including the installation of new telecommunications systems. The cost of this work amounted to £145,000.

War Pensions Agency

Number of calls

January 1995–December 1995: 452,780

Costs of establishing the technical system in 1992 were £114,941 and the annual maintenance cost is £9,700.

The Helpline number appears on all agency publicity including leaflets and posters. It is therefore difficult to quantify costs specific to Helpline.

Child Support Agency

Number of calls

1 June 1994–1 December 1995: 901,517

The individual cost of publicising the national enquiry line—NEL—is not available. Publicity information concerning NEL is contained within other CSA publicity material. The cost of operating NEL in 1994–95 was £1,123,895.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what were the results of the call back survey carried out by his Department into customer satisfaction with the operation of his Department's inquiry line; what action his Department took in response to the findings of this survey; what organisation carried out this survey; and how much was paid to that organisation. [4457]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: During the last 12 months no external call back surveys have been undertaken in respect of departmental helplines.

Internal surveys are commonplace and customer reaction is analysed and fed into the strategic planning process with a view to further enhancing customer service.

Frozen Benefits

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security which benefits that have never been uprated since their introduction were not uprated in his recent statement; and what are his reasons for freezing them. [4123]

Mr. Heald: The following benefits have not been uprated since they were introduced: widow's payment, Christmas bonus and age addition to retirement pension.

Widows payment is only one part of widow's benefit. Widow's pension and widowed mother's allowance have been uprated regularly. Although the Christmas bonus has not been uprated, it is now paid to a wider target group of around 13 million people. Similarly, to increase the retirement pension age addition would be a poor use of resources. Pensioners over 80 who receive an income-related benefit will gain from the increase in higher pensioner premium. From April 1996 the value of this premium will be £25.90 for a single person and £37.05 for a couple.

Uprating

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what factors underlie his policy in respect of uprating (a) lone parent premium, (b) one parent benefit, (c) earning limit for invalid care allowance and (d) social fund cold weather payment. [4124]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: This year's uprating statement combines further measures to control the growth of Social Security spending with action to strengthen work incentives.

The lone parent premium and one parent benefit will not be increased in April 1996. The aim over time is to bring the benefits which go to lone parent families more in line with those that go to couples with children. Lone parents will benefit from the increases that go to all families next year.

Invalid care allowance will be uprated along with other benefits next year. The earnings limit will be kept under review.

Social fund cold weather payments are intended to give extra help to particularly vulnerable people for higher heating costs as a result of a sustained period of very cold weather. Payments increased from £6 to £7 from 1 November 1994 to reflect the imposition of VAT on domestic fuel. The Chancellor announced on 8 December 1994 that they would increase again from £7 to £8.50 from 1 November 1995. This is a 40 per cent. increase since April 1994.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many ministerial visits have been undertaken by each Minister in his Department between 6 July and 1 December; and how many and what percentage of these have involved the Minister travelling abroad. [4220]

Mr. Lilley: The information is set out in the table:

Minister	UK visits	Foreign visits	Percentage that were foreign visits
Mr. Lilley	6	1	17
Lord Mackay of Ardbrecknish	7	–	–
Mr. Burt	21	1	5
Mr. Evans	10	–	–
Mr. Mitchell	8	–	–
Mr. Heald	10	1	10

Invalidity Benefit

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been the total cost of the invalidity benefit resulting from injuries caused in road traffic accidents in each of the last five years. [4345]

Mr. Burt: The information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

National Insurance Fund

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the effect on the national insurance fund, over the next five years if all those with an appropriate personal pension and an annual income of less than £10,000, were to opt back into SERPS. [4463]

Mr. Heald: The information is in the table.

Great Britain

Year	Savings to the national insurance fund (£ million)
1995–96	0
1996–97	400
1997–98	400
1998–99	350
1999–2000	350

Notes:

1. It has been assumed that the £10,000 is a fixed cash amount each year and earnings and prices assumptions are consistent with the recent 1995 Budget Statement.

2. Currently, the rebate paid to a personal pension account is based on class 1 reckonable earnings between the lower earnings limit and the upper earnings limit. The rate of rebate is 4.8 per cent. of these band earnings plus 1 per cent. of band earnings for those aged 30 and over.

3. From April 1997, the APP rebates will become age-related. Because the Secretary of State has not yet determined the level of these rebates, the amounts shown in the table have been calculated by using the rates in the Government Actuary's recent consultative note.

4. Because the rebate in respect of a year's earnings is not paid into the personal pension account until the following year, there is no effect on the first year of the above table.

5. The figures have been rounded to the nearest £50 million.

Employees (Sickness)

Mr. Elletson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many days off sick were taken by employees in the private sector in (a) 1990–91, (b) 1991–92, (c) 1992–93, (d) 1993–94 and (e) 1994–95 indicating (i) the total figures and (ii) the average for each employee. [3507]

Mrs. Angela Knight: I have been asked to reply.

The following information is available from the labour force survey for the number of days lost per week through sickness absence by employees in the private sector.

Great Britain (not seasonally adjusted)

Quarter	Days lost per week in quarter Total (millions of days)	Days lost per week in quarter Per employee (days)
Spring 1994	2.1	0.13
Spring 1995	2.2	0.14

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the organisations and governments consulted by Her Majesty's Government in compiling the British submission to the World court on the legality of nuclear weapons. [3988]

Mr. David Davis: I refer the hon. Member to the answers given by my right hon. and learned Friend the then Minister for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg), on 28 February 1994, column 547, and 14 June 1994, column 405.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many EU governments gave evidence to the World Court on the legality of nuclear weapons; how many asked the court to rule that they were legal; and how many asked the court to refuse to answer the question. [3989]

Mr. Davis: Eight EU Governments made written statements in relation to the requests for advisory opinions by the World Health Organisation and the UN General Assembly; four Governments also made oral statements. Six argued that the court should not answer the requests, five further arguing, on the substance, that the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons is not prohibited as such under international law. Copies of the written statements will be placed in the Library of the House. Transcripts of the oral statements can be obtained from the International Court of Justice.

Consultants

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those (a) consultants, (b) outside organisations and (c) individuals employed by his Department in each year since 1990, indicating the purposes of their employment and the total payments made to them. [3967]

Mr. Hanley: (a) In answering this question the Department has used the definition of consultancy as set out in the efficiency scrutiny on the Government's use of external consultants.

For the year 1994–95 the diplomatic wing spent £76,887 on management consultants. The ODA spent £847, 545 on consultants assisting on management issues.

More detailed information on individual contracts and the previous years could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

(b) The Department does not hold information on outside organisations in the form requested. Invoices from outside organisations are not broken down to distinguish between provision of services and goods. Therefore the information requested could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

(c) Information on individuals employed by the Department can be found in the civil service staff post summary tables. These can be found in the House Libraries. The purpose of their employment is to assist the Department to attain its aims and objectives as set out in the departmental report. The costs of employing individuals can be found in the departmental report.

European Commission (London Office)

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many staff are employed at the London office of the European Commission. [2989]

Mr. David Davis: This information is available from the European Commission office at:

No. 8 Storey's Gate

LONDON

SW1P 3AT

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs by what authority the London office of the European Commission produces and circulates pro-European Union information, with particular reference to circulation to schools; and if he will make a statement. [2990]

Mr. Davis: The Commission office in London produces and circulates information about the European Union on its own authority. Resources for Commission activities are agreed by the Council and European Parliament, acting as the budgetary authority.

Egypt (Islamic Terrorists)

Mr. Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received from the Government of Egypt concerning the activities of Islamic extremists based in London; and if he will make a statement. [3973]

Mr. Hanley: My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary discussed this with the Egyptian Government during his visit to Cairo on 10 to 11 November. We are concerned at the unwelcome presence of foreign extremists in the United Kingdom who abuse our traditional freedoms. We are in close contact with a number of foreign Governments who share our concern. Any evidence of violations of UK law will be passed to the police for action.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative (a) capital and (b) revenue costs to public funds (i) under PFI and (ii) estimated to have been incurred had the scheme been funded wholly within the public sector. [3821]

Mr. Hanley: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 7 November 1995, Official Report, column 694.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much capital expenditure is forecast to be included in the private finance initiative for the current financial year and the next five financial years. [3826]

Mr. Hanley: I refer the hon. Member to table 6.5 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report 1996–97, which was laid before the House on 28th November 1995.

Reflections Group

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects the text of the final revision of the report of the reflections group to be considered at the European Council in Madrid on 15 to 16 December to be (a) published and (b) widely available in the United Kingdom. [4469]

Mr. David Davis: The final report of the study group was finalised on 5 December. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House. The report has been deposited for parliamentary scrutiny. Copies of the report are available on request from the European Union Department (Internal) in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, and the report is available on the Internet from http://www.fco.gov.UK.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Parliamentary Papers

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick upon Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, if discussions have yet been concluded on a new long-term agreement with Her Majesty's Stationery Office for the printing and publication of House documents, as referred to in his written answer of 17 May 1995, Official Report, column 237; and what the consequences of that agreement will be for the sale prices of Hansard and other House papers. [4090]

Mr. Beith: The Commission has now approved the terms of a new supply and service agreement between the House and HMSO, which will take effect on 1 January 1996. As a result, the House will no longer purchase its documents from HMSO at the face price but instead will make block payments based on production costs. The level of these block payments will be re-negotiated annually, in accordance with principles set out in the agreement. In calendar year 1996 the block payments will total £11,969,000, which is broadly similar to the total sums paid to HMSO by the Vote Office and other House Departments in respect of the documents in question in each of the previous two years.

The financial settlement for 1996 also provides for the following reductions in the sale price of House documents:

Daily Hansard: £5 instead of £7.50

Select Committee Reports: 20 per cent. reduction on current price scales

Bills: 10 per cent. reduction on current price scales

Weekly Information Bulletin: £1.50 instead of £2.30

Standing Committee Hansards will in future be priced on a scale according to page content, with a maximum price of £5 compared with the current fixed price of £7.50.

The reduction in the price of the weekly Hansard from £22 to £12, which was announced in my answer of 17 May and came into effect on 6 June, will continue to apply.

Mr. Thompson: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick upon Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, what consideration the House of Commons Commission has given to the possible safeguards that might be required to protect the future provision of printing services to Parliament in the event of the privatisation of HMSO? [4091]

Mr. Beith: The Commission and the Finance and Services Committee have been giving the most active consideration to these matters and I hope to be able to give a more detailed reply to the hon. Member shortly.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how much capital expenditure is forecast to be included in the private finance initiative for the current financial year and the next five financial years. [3838]

Mr. Willetts: The Government's metropolitan telecommunications service is already largely provided by the private sector, which owns much of the infrastructure. The Office of Public Service hopes to involve private finance further in the provision of the software used by Government Departments. This could involve capital expenditure of some £1.5 million in 1996–97.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative (a) capital and (b) revenue costs to public funds (i) under the PFI and (ii) estimated to have been incurred had the scheme been funded wholly within the public sector. [3804]

Mr. Willetts: The Cabinet Office—including the Office of Public Service—HMSO and the Central Office of Information have not yet approved any schemes under the private finance initiative.

Photocopiers

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many new photocopiers his Department has (a) purchased and (b) leased since July 1995; and at what cost. [4291]

Mr. Willetts: Since 1 July 1995 the Cabinet Office and its agencies have purchased one additional photocopier at a cost of £895 and leased 18 photocopiers, 11 of which replaced existing machines, at a rental cost £50,799 per annum.

In the same period, HMSO and the Central Office of Information purchased four photocopiers, two of which replaced existing machines, at a cost of £17,817 and leased 14 to replace existing machines at a rental cost of £31,570 per annum.

Citizens Charter

Mr. Butler: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster which bodies are covered by the citizens charter. [4855]

Mr. Freeman: The citizens charter applies to all public sector bodies and privatised regulated utilities where there is an element of monopoly.

The Director General of Telecommunications is charged with a statutory duty to promote the interests of consumers. The Director General has advised me that a genuinely competitive market is developing for telecommunications. For these reasons, I no longer regard BT as falling within the scope of the charter programme.

TREASURY

Employment (East Midlands)

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the total number of (a) full-time and part-time jobs and (b) full-time and part-time temporary jobs in the east midlands region, together with a breakdown of occupations. [4071]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The latest available information is shown in the following table.

Employees in East Midlands region: spring 1995 (thousands)[1]

Occupation	Full-time All	Full-time Not permanent	Part-time All	Part-time Not permanent
Managers and administrators	221	[2]—	20	[2]—

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much capital expenditure is forecast to be included in the private finance initiative for the current financial year and the next five financial years. [3835]

Mr. Jack: I refer the hon. Member to table 6.5 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report 1996–97", and, which has been laid before Parliament on 28 November 1995.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative (a) capital and (b) revenue costs to public funds (i) under the PFI and (ii) estimated to have been incurred had the scheme been funded wholly within the public sector. [3807]

Mr. Jack: PFI payments are for service delivery, not capital procurement. They comprise a mixture of charges for capital and revenue. Value for money is ensured through the competitive process. It is not always commercially appropriate to disclose a public sector comparator, nor to place undue reliance on illustrative calculations. Guidance on public sector comparators is contained in the publication "Private Opportunity, Public Benefit", a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House.

Small and Medium Enterprises

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the guidance his Department issues to each Government department and agency regarding procurement from SMEs. [3928]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The following guidance has been issued:

> "Size may be relevant to the selection of tenderers, but only insofar as it is necessary to assess whether or not the job is within their capability. Once that assessment has been made, relative size is likely to be less significant than skills, efficiency, experience and reliability— characteristics relevant to value for money but just as likely to be found in small firms as in large and particularly relevant in the procurement of services."

The central unit on procurement has also issued a series of best practice guidance, much of which is relevant to procurement from SMEs. Copies of these guidances have been placed in the Library. In addition, CUP has written to all major Departments asking them to provide examples of their procurement literature on access for small firms to Government business. This is currently being reviewed. CUP will then circulate to Departments the best examples relevant to SME needs.

Fuel Duty

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Eltham, (Mr. Bottomley) of 28 November, Official Report, column 537, on fuels, if he will give the same figures updated to account for the Budget measures; and if he will list the figures for natural gas used as a road fuel, (a) before and (b) after the Budget. [4061]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The following updated figures are based on the pre-Budget average retail selling prices adjusted to reflect the actual duty changes announced in my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor's Budget statement:

Post Budget pricing policies may not mirror the duty changes precisely

	RSP p/litre	Total tax as percentage of RSP	Excise duty as percentage of RSP	VAT as percentage of RSP	Excise duty p/litre	VAT p/litre
Leaded	61.29	78.72	63.83	14.89	39.12	9.13
Super unleaded	62.02	70.20	55.30	14.89	34.30	9.24
Unleaded	55.06	77.19	62.30	14.89	34.30	8.20
Diesel	55.51	76.68	61.79	14.89	34.30	8.27
City diesel	54.9	77.37	62.48	14.89	34.30	8.18
LPG auto	39.1	50.93	36.04	14.89	14.09	5.82

The following figures for compressed natural gas are based on a maximum retail price as at 28 November 1995; I am advised that suppliers' post-Budget pricing policy has not yet been determined.

Compressed natural gas (CNG)	RSP p/kilo	Total tax as percentage of RSP	Excise duty as percentage of RSP	VAT as percentage of RSP	Excise duty p/kilo	VAT p/kilo
Pre-Budget	56.4	73.65	58.76	14.89	33.14	8.40
Post-Budget	56.4	64.84	49.95	14.89	28.17	8.40

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many ministerial visits have been undertaken by each Minister in his Department between 6 July and 1 December; and how many and what percentage of these have involved the Minister travelling abroad. [4221]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have made seven ministerial visits, all of which were abroad.

The Paymaster General has made four visits, of which two were abroad. The Financial Secretary has made four visits and the Economic Secretary has made three visits, none of which was abroad. The Chief Secretary has made no visits.

Share Ownership

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of the adult population owned one or more shares (a) in the latest year for which figures are available and (b) in each year since 1970. [4028]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 5 December 1995]: The information sought is not available for the years 1970–78 or 1980–86. Data for the remaining years are set out in the table:

Year	Percentage of adults owning shares
1979	7
1987	19
1988	20
1989	20
1990	24
1991	25
1992	22
1993	22

Landfill Tax

Mr. Stewart: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what analysis he has made of the effects of the proposed landfill tax on the house building industry in Scotland; and if he will make a statement; [3931]

(2) what analysis he has made of the effect of the proposed landfill tax on the construction industry; and if he will make a statement; [3930]

(3) what analysis he has made of the effect of the proposed landfill tax on the house building industry; and if he will make a statement. [3932]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: In developing proposals for a landfill tax, the Government have had regard to the effects of the tax upon all sectors of the economy. My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer indicated that the tax should not impose extra costs on business overall, and that the revenue raised will be used to make compensatory reductions in employers' national insurance contributions. The main rate of employer NICs will be reduced by 0.2 per cent. in 1997–98. Moreover, businesses that are successful in reducing the amount of waste sent for landfill disposal by making alternative waste management arrangements may reduce their overall costs of landfill.

Single-parent Families

Ms Harman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many children have been in single-parent families where the parent is unemployed in each of the last five years. [4109]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 5 December 1995]: The following information is available from the "Labour Force Survey".

Great Britain (not seasonally adjusted)

Quarter	Number of children aged 15 or under with single parent who is ILO unemployed
Winter 1993–94	246,000
Winter 1994–95	231,000

European Single Currency

Mr. Gill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the time needed to introduce a single currency after a decision has been made to introduce it. [2770]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The European Monetary Institute, in its report on the changeover to the single currency published on 14 November 1995, considered that a period of up to three years would be required to introduce single currency notes and coins after the start of the third stage of economic and monetary union. It considered that the period between the decision to move to a single currency and the start of the third stage would need to be about one year in length. The Government believe that these are probably reasonable estimates of the lengths of time required, bearing in mind the necessary legal and practical steps, although the actual times would depend on many factors.

Under protocol 11 annexed to the EC treaty, the United Kingdom shall not be obliged or committed to move to the third stage of Economic and monetary union without a separate decision to do so by the Government and Parliament. We will agree to take part in a single currency only if it is in our national interest to do so, given the circumstances at the time.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the cost to the United Kingdom of adopting the single currency. [2769]

Mrs. Knight: If the United Kingdom participates in the third stage of economic and monetary union, there will be transitional costs to business and public authorities, associated with the changeover to the single currency.

These potential costs would be one of the factors that would need to be taken into account, at the appropriate time, when the Government make their assessment of whether it is in the United Kingdom's interest to join a move to the third stage of economic and monetary union.

Under protocol 11 annexed to the EC treaty, the United Kingdom shall not be obliged or committed to move to the third stage of Economic and monetary union without a separate decision to do so by the Government and Parliament. We will agree to take part in a single currency only if it is in our national interest to do so, given the circumstances at the time.

City Diesel

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the short-term cost of reducing tax on city diesel by 2p a litre. [3730]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The estimates of the revenue effects of a 2p tax reduction for city diesel will be extremely sensitive to assumptions about current market shares, other low-sulphur products, and how quickly supplies of city diesel could respond to increased demand.

Ways and Means Advances

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the outstanding Ways and Means advances from the Bank of England to the Government at the end of each financial year since 1978. [4327]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The outstanding Ways and Means advances from the Bank of England to the Government at the end of each financial year since 1978 is shown in the table.

Outstanding ways and means advances from the Bank of England

Date	Balance outstanding (£000s)
31 March 1978	3,487,280
31 March 1979	5,435,540
31 March 1980	3,026,435
31 March 1981	3,450,705
31 March 1982	908,040
31 March 1983	1,983,009
31 March 1984	Nil
31 March 1985	Nil
31 March 1986	Nil
31 March 1987	2,707,405
31 March 1988	4,638,116
31 March 1989	6,255,987
30 March 1990	5,962,854
28 March 1991	6,918,245
31 March 1992	7,187,231
31 March 1993	3,062,154
31 March 1994	6,750,812
31 March 1995	15,904,279

The increase in 1995 follows a change in the funding rule in 1994 to include gilt sales to the banking sector, and a one-off corrective adjustment.

Monetary Aggregates

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the velocity of circulation and the increases or decreases in (a) M3, (b) M4, (c) M0 and (d) the rate of inflation for each year since 1975. [4331]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The velocity of circulation of the monetary aggregate is calculated as a ratio—GDP divided by the stock of the relevant monetary aggregate.

M3 is no longer compiled as a monetary aggregate. Stock and velocity of circulation figures for M0 and M4 are shown in table 6.2 of the CSO monthly publication Economic Trends. Data on the RPI and the underlying rate of inflation—RPI excluding mortgage interest payments—are shown on table 3.1 in Economic Trends. Economic Trends is available from the House of Commons Library.

National Grid

Mr. Burden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the amount of the expected rebate to domestic consumers arising from the sale of the national grid which will be accounted for by reduced VAT (a) per customer and (b) in total. [3389]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 4 December 1995]: Eligible customers will each receive a net rebate of £50.56 from the regional electricity companies and as a consequence the amount of VAT on their bills will be reduced by £4.04. For the comparatively small number of customers who use pre-payment meters or tokens a VAT-inclusive refund of £54.60 will be made. The total reduction in VAT revenue resulting from the rebates will be approximately £87 million.

Personal Tax Allowances

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will make it his policy to allow an additional personal tax allowance to a woman whose husband is permanently disabled and who has a dependent child; [3621]

(2) if he will make a statement on the additional personal tax allowance currently available to a man whose wife is disabled and who has a dependent child indicating the considerations underlying the reasons why the same facility is not allowed to a woman in the same circumstances. [3622]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 4 December 1995]: The additional personal allowance for husbands with totally incapacitated wives dates from a time when social security provision for the disabled was much less comprehensive than it is now. The Government believe that, in general, it is much better to help both men and women with disabled partners through the social security system than through tax reliefs, and a generous range of social security benefits are available today.

European Union Contributions

Mr. Gill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what sum of money has been allocated in the recent Budget as the United Kingdom's gross contribution to the EU. [4049]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 4 December 1995]: UK contributions to the EC are reflected in the public expenditure plans in net rather than gross form. The figures for net payments to European Community institutions for the financial years 1995–96 to 1998–99 are set out in table 6.6 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report" (House of Commons No. 30). The corresponding estimates of the UK's gross contribution after abatement, along with the figure for net payments, are as follows:

£ million

Year	UK gross contribution after abatement	Net payment to EC institutions
1995–96	7,668	2,894
1996–97	7,734	2,304
1997–98	7,858	2,496
1998–99	7,926	2,498

Further details will be published in my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer's next departmental report.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

New Year's Eve (Trafalgar Square)

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what plans she has to change the arrangements for boarding up the fountains in Trafalgar square for the new year's eve celebrations. [4915]

Mr. Sproat: Since 1983, when the decision was taken to board up the fountains in Trafalgar square on new year's eve on the ground of public safety, the policing of the event has altered significantly with a great emphasis on the use of police cordons. For the past two years the police have cordoned off the central area of Trafalgar square including the column and fountains. I have therefore decided—in consultation with the police—not to board up the fountains for this new year's eve celebrations.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many ministerial visits have been undertaken by each Minister in her Department between 6 July and 1 December; and how many and what percentage of these have involved the Minister travelling abroad. [4223]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I have undertaken 55 ministerial visits between 6 July and 1 December, none of which were overseas.

The Minister of State, has undertaken 17 ministerial visits in the same period, 5.8 per cent. of those were overseas.

Lord Inglewood has undertaken 71 ministerial visits, of which 19.7 per cent. were overseas.

TRANSPORT

Midland Main Line

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the data in respect of the punctuality of trains on the midland main line from January 1994 to date on a monthly basis. [3565]

Mr. Watts: The data requested is shown in the table:

Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution regarding increases in fuel duty; [4404]

(2) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on the duty on unleaded petrol; [4391]

(3) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution relating to the present net level of support for public transport; [4371]

(4) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution of a Government contribution towards the operating costs of companies carrying freight by water; [4395]

(5) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on the annual excise duty on cars; [4406]

(6) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on a cradle to grave for vehicle recycling; [4390]

(7) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on incentives to operators of heavy vehicles in urban areas to use natural gas powered vehicles; [4409]

(8) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution in respect of vehicle excise duty on heavy vehicles; [4366]

(9) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on grants for transferring freight from road to coastwise shipping; [4394]

(10) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on the EC directive on fuel prices; [4405]

(11) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on the introduction of a levy on fuel purchase by airlines; [4392]

(12) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on the criteria for the public contribution to railway costs; [4372]

(13) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on modifications to the tax rules relating to company cars; [4407]

(14) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on applications for grants in support of trans-European transport networks; [4398]

(15) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on European legislation on dimension for containers and bodies for use in intermodal transport; [4363]

(16) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution regarding EC legislation on the annual duty paid by operators of heavy goods vehicles; [4399]

(17) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on regional planning conference; [4419]

(18) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on thresholds for the major pollutants; [4427]

(19) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on the sale of unleaded super premium petrol; [4368]

(20) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution that the results of the monitoring of PPG 13's effectiveness be published and that any amendment required be made without delay; [4415]

(21) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution that the Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order be reviewed; [4423]

(22) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution that the programme of strengthening bridges to carry 40-tonne lorries should be scaled down; [4431]

(23) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on pay-at-the-pump schemes; [4408]

(24) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution relating to decisions to introduce road pricing schemes; [4393]

(25) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on advertising the environmental and safety effects of driving styles; [4367]

(26) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on cycling facilities; [4432]

(27) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on the rules of procedure governing inquiries into trunk road proposals and compulsory purchase orders; [4381]

(28) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on supplementing recent guidance on land use policies and the land use implications of transport policies; [4416]

(29) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on suitable sites for new wharves and rail depots; [4424]

(30) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on the permitted benzene content of petrol; [4369]

(31) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on safe cycle routes in urban areas; [4377]

(32) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of royal commission on environmental pollution on forms of collaboration similar to the London air quality network unit; [4428]

(33) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on the use of barriers to absorb and deflect sound; [4385]

(34) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on eligibility for insulation grants under the Land Compensation Act 1973; [4412]

(35) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution that regional planning conference and Government regional offices should jointly assess long-distance routes; [4420]

(67) what response he has made to the recommendation in the 18th report of the royal commission on environmental pollution on the transport implications of Government Departments' legal and policy responsibilities. [4396]

Mr. Norris: Decisions on the Government's response will be taken in the light of the national debate on transport policy.

Forth Bridge

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the Health and Safety Executive to produce its report into the structural condition of the Forth bridge. [4436]

Mr. Watts: I understand that HSE hopes to be able to publish its report early in the new year.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many ministerial visits have been undertaken by each Minister in his Department between 6 July and 1 December; and how many and what percentage of these have involved the Minister travelling abroad. [4219]

Sir George Young: The details of visits, excluding attendance at EC Transport Councils, are as follows:

	Total number of visits	Of which, number abroad
Secretary of State	15	—
Minister for Railways and Roads	17	3
Minister for Local Transport, Road Safety and Transport in London	15	2
Minister for Shipping and Aviation	11	1

Cones Hotline

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many calls have been made to the cones hotline in each calendar month since its establishment; how many calls have been under the remit of the cones hotline; how many calls have resulted in cones being removed from the public highway; how much it has cost his Department to operate the hotline; what changes he plans to make to its operation; what assessment he has made of it; and if he will make a statement. [4435]

Mr. Watts: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) on 6 November at column 759, which answers most of the points that he has raised. My Department does not have a record of the number of calls made to the cones hotline in each calendar month since its establishment in June 1992, but information from the Highways Agency on the number of calls made each month this year is as follows:

Date	Number
Cones hotline
January 1995	900
February 1995	750
March 1995	450
April 1995	1,100
May 1995	1,000
June 1995	1,050
July 1995	800
August 1995	300
Highways Agency information line
September 1995	800
October 1995	1,150
November 1995	1,250

Figures have been rounded to the nearest 50 calls.

Rail Accidents

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many accidents involving fatalities and serious injury to passengers there have been (a) on the railway network and (b) within the ScotRail network in each of the last five years. [4439]

Mr. Watts: The Health and Safety Executive's railway inspectorate maintains records of accidents. The tables show the information requested.

Oily Waste Discharges

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the ports in the United Kingdom that do not have oily waste discharge facilities available to vessels. [4200]

Mr. Norris [holding answer 5 December 1995]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Stoke on Trent, North (Ms Walley) on 14 June 1995 at column 532.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many aerial surveillance sorties were flown to check for oil spillages around the United Kingdom coast in (a) 1993, (b) 1994 and (c) in 1995 to date; [4199]

(2) if he will list those vessels that have since the publication of the Donaldson report been (a) identified discharging oily wastes illegally at sea and (b) prosecuted for those offences; and what fines have been imposed. [4197]

Mr. Norris [holding answer 5 December 1995]: I have asked the chief executive of the Coastguard Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from C. J. Harris to Mr. Nick Ainger, dated 6 December 1995:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent Questions about aerial surveillance to check for oil spillages and vessels which have been identified as discharging oily wastes illegally at sea.

The number of aerial surveillance flights to check for oil spillages around the United Kingdom coast were as follows:

Year	Ship patrol flights	Oil rig patrol flights	Operational flights	Total
1993	91	57	77	225
1994	98	57	54	209
1995[1]	120	53	65	238

[1] To 30 November.

Since May 1994 the Agency's Marine Pollution Control Unite (MPCU) has identified 47 vessels as possibly being responsible for illegal discharges. These were referred for Port State Control inspections and of the 47 identified cases, 27 are currently open, 19 have been closed, either because no offence was committed or because of lack of evidence, and one has been prosecuted.

The prosecution resulted in the master of the JENCLIPPER, being fined £4,000 in October 1995 for the illegal discharge of engine washings. In the absence of conclusive evidence the names of the other vessels cannot be released.

Prosecutions are also brought by other organisations including local authorities, port and harbour authorities and environmental bodies. Further information is contained in annual reports prepared by the Advisory Committee on Pollution of the Sea (ACOPS). Copies are available in the House of Commons' Library.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) when he plans to implement the Donaldson report recommendation that the cost of the use of oily waste reception facilities in ports should be included in harbour dues; [4201]

(2) if he will introduce a system of waste auditing in ports to improve the enforcement of discharge limits for oily wastes from shipping. [4198]

Mr. Norris [holding answer 5 December 1995]: I refer the hon. Member to the replies that I gave to the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) on 1 and 2 November at columns 309 and 466.

Peakes Parkway

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much has been lent to Humberside county council and its successor authorities for the construction of the Peakes parkway in all its stages and what is the (a) duration of the loan and (b) the annual interest charge in percentage and cost terms to date. [4332]

Mr. Norris: I have been asked to reply.

The total financial support that my Department has given to Humberside county council for Peakes parkway is £8.287 million—£2.869 million of transport supplementary grant and £5.418 million in the form of borrowing approvals. The amount to be allocated to the scheme in 1996–97 will be announced later this month as part of the local transport settlement.

The Government do not specify either the duration or interest rate of any loans that result from borrowing approvals issued to local authorities. These are matters for the local authorities concerned.

Road Fatalities (Children)

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will (a) compare and (b) make a statement on the changes by category of road death, of those killed under the age of 15 years between (a) 1983 and 1985 and (b) 1992 and 1994. [3786]

Mr. Norris: The information requested is shown in the table.

The total number of children killed fell in both periods, although at a slower rate between 1992 and 1994. Reduction in casualties for the most vulnerable categories, pedestrians and cyclists, continued in the second period but in-car casualties increased. I regard further improvements in child road safety as a high priority.

Railtrack

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what steps he is taking to ensure that Railtrack is expending fully the receipts from track access charges on the maintenance and renewal of rail infrastructure and buildings; [3470]

(2) what is the total sum collected in track access charges from each of the train operating companies by Railtrack; and what proportion of the track access charges so collected have been expended on the maintenance and renewal of rail infrastructure and buildings to date in each train operating company's area of operation; [3465]

(3) what steps he is taking to ensure that Railtrack is undertaking the work necessary to achieve prescribed standards of track and signal system maintenance, with special reference to the renewal of such infrastructure assets by modern equivalent forms. [3473]

Mr. Watts: Railtrack is not required to expend income from track access charges only on the maintenance and renewal of rail infrastructure and buildings. Railtrack does not publish income figures by train operators, as I explained in my answer to the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Dafis), Official Report, 28 November 1995, column 549.

Access charges for the period 1995–96 to 2000–01 have been approved by the regulator at a level which takes into account the extent of Railtrack's proposed renewal programme. The overall level of charges has been set with regard to Railtrack's total renewals expenditure, including major renewal projects, across the entire network. The nature and priority of projects is a matter for railtrack's commercial and operational judgment.

The Rail Regulator will satisfy himself that Railtrack does not increase its profits by reducing expenditure on the renewal of assets below the level needed to deliver its obligations to operators, or compromise the maintenance of safety standards.

Track access charges are not only used to cover the maintenance and renewal of rail infrastructure and buildings. Railtrack does not publish income figures by train operator, as I explained in my answer to the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North on 28 November.

Tree Surgery

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has had regarding delays in paying small business contractors for tree surgery and felling along trunk roads; if his Department has a time target for such payments; and if he will make a statement. [4012]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. David Nicholson, dated 6 December 1995:

As you know, the Minister for Railways and Roads, Mr. John Watts, has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking the Secretary of State for Transport, what representations he has had regarding delays in paying small business contractors for tree surgery and felling along England's trunk roads, if his Department has a time target for such payments, and if he will make a statement.

I am not aware of any representations regarding delays in paying small contractors for tree surgery and tree felling on trunk roads but if you have a particular case in mind, and can let me have details, I will investigate.

I am, however, very conscious that good cash flow is the life blood of many small businesses and that late payment is a common cause of concern in many industries. I am particularly aware of the problem of late payment of specialist engineering sub-contractors by main contractors and since 1992 we have included "prompt payment" provisions in our contracts in an effort to speed up the flow of payments. Unfortunately, these measures have had little beneficial effect and we are currently looking at other ways in which the problem might be tackled within our policy of having a single point of contractual responsibility whenever possible

As for direct payments to contractors, the Highways Agency and its predecessor organisations have earned a good reputation for timely payment within the periods provided for under the terms and conditions of our contracts—generally 30 days from receipt of demands for payment. That is a reputation which I am determined to preserve.

Chiswick Flyover

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has (a) to close and (b) restrict traffic over the Chiswick flyover in the medium term. [3851]

Mr. Norris: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Barry Sheerman, dated 6 December 1995:

As you know, the Minister for Local Transport and Road Safety and Transport in London, Mr Steven Norris, has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question, asking the Secretary of State for Transport, what plans he has (a) to close and (b) restrict traffic over the Chiswick flyover in the medium term.

My reply related to work to the M4 elevated section which extends from Junction 1 (east of Chiswick roundabout) to Boston Manor playing fields.

The M4 elevated section is closed in one direction on a six weekly cycle eight times a year to enable routine maintenance to be undertaken safely. We are taking advantage of these closures to replace leaking joints.

Essential work to replace bearings at the Boston Manor Viaduct is scheduled to commence in March 1996 and expected to last for 4/5 months. Much of this will be carried out without the need for closures. A limited number of full carriageway night time closures at weekends and partial night time carriageway closures from Monday to Thursday will be required.

Investigations to prepare a programme of repairs to the M4 elevated section are ongoing. It is expected that most, if not all of the ensuing works will be able to be completed without daytime closures of the M4 during the working week. However they will require night time closures of the motorway.

Details of works and their likely impact will be published well in advance to advise local residents and to allow road users to plan their journeys.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate the number of road fatalities associated with drink driving, identifying those who were drunk drivers or riders, for each of the last 16 years. [3788]

Mr. Norris: The information requested is shown in the table.

Estimate of deaths in drink related road accidents in Great Britain, 1979–94

Year	All deaths in drink-related road accidents	Of which drivers or riders over limit
1979	1,640	850
1980	1,450	780
1981	1,420	730
1982	1,550	840

1990	760	400
1991	660	360
1992	660	350
1994 (provisional)	510	320

A drink driver accident is defined as one where one or more of the drivers involved refused to give a specimen or failed either (i) a breath test by registering over 35 microgrammes of alcohol per 100 ml of breath, or (ii) a blood test by registering more than 80 milligrams of alcohol per 100 ml of blood. The above figures are adjusted to allow for the fact that not all drink-drive accidents are detected.

Mr. Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate the number of dead, drunk pedestrians in each of the last 16 years. [3787]

Mr. Norris: There is no legal definition of a drunk pedestrian. However, the table shows estimates of the numbers of pedestrians killed in road accidents who were over the legal limit for driving.

Estimated number of pedestrians over the legal drink-drive limit killed in road accidents: Great Britain: 1979–94

Year	Deaths

Coroners' data for 1994 are not yet available.

Transport Research Laboratory

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures will be taken by his Department to implement the recommendations contained in the second report of the Transport Select Committee for Session 1993–94, HC 173-I, on the privatisation and deregulation of the Department of Transport agency work, page 14, paragraph 46. [3922]

Mr. Norris: The Government have made clear the importance they attach to ensuring the continued independence of the Transport Research Laboratory. In assessing bids for the whole of TRL, full consideration will be given to the proposals of prospective purchasers for ensuring that the laboratory's independence is safeguarded in the private sector.

The Government intend to sell TRL only to reputable purchasers and will be seeking assurances from prospective purchasers about their ability to meet obligations to staff transferring to the new organisation.

North West Regional Railways Ltd.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the total value of the assets transferred to North West Regional Railways Ltd. [3949]

Mr. Watts: The total value of net assets transferred to North West Regional Railways Ltd. was £9,649,000.

Mr. Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the annual cost to North West Regional Railways Ltd. of leasing the railway stations at (a) Nelson and (b) Colne from Railtrack. [3950]

Mr. Watts: Individual station lease charges are commercially confidential between Railtrack and the station operator concerned.

Waste Pharmaceuticals

Sir Mark Lennox-Boyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will modify the Carriage of Dangerous Goods by Road and Rail (Classification, Packaging and Labelling) Regulations 1994 to allow the transport of waste pharmaceutical in containers of up to 60 litres in volume. [3547]

Mr. Norris: These regulations permit small receptacles of waste medicines to be exempted from certain transport provisions providing they are amalgamated in packagings of not more than 30kg in total. Any suggestion that such goods may be carried safely in larger receptacles should be made known to the Health and Safety Commission before 1 March 1996 in response to the current consultative document on the revision of the regulations.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how much capital expenditure is forecast to be included in the private finance initiative for the current financial year and the next five financial years; [3834]

(2) if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative (a) capital and (b) revenue costs to public funds (i) under the PFI and (ii) estimated to have been incurred had the scheme been funded wholly within the public sector. [3808]

Mr. Watts: The amounts and timing of capital expenditure on PFI projects are subject to competition. Our current estimate for 1995–96 is around £330 million; estimates for the next three years are given in the "Financial Statement and Budget Report" 1996–97; no estimate of such capital expenditure has been made beyond the survey years.

As to public sector contributions to PFI transport schemes, I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answers I gave to him on 28 June at column 262 and 7 November at column 265. Financial details of individual schemes, including the level of on-going revenue payments from the public sector to the private sector over the contract period, are commercially confidential. The Department applies a value-for-money test to all its procurement decisions, including procurement under the private finance initiative.

WALES

NHS Trusts

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all NHS trusts (a) as of 30 November and (b) with effect from 1 April 1996. [4068]

Mr. Richards: The information requested is as follows:

(a) NHS Trusts in Wales as at 30 November 1995:

Pembrokeshire NHS Trust
Glan Clwyd Hospital NHS Trust
Wrexham Maelor Hospital NHS Trust
Clwydian Community Care NHS Trust
Powys Health Care NHS Trust
Glan Hafren NHS Trust
Gwent Community Health NHS Trust
Llandough Hospital and Community NHS Trust
Bridgend and District NHS Trust
Swansea NHS Trust
Llanelli/Dinefwr NHS Trust
Carmarthen and District NHS Trust
Ceredigion and Mid Wales NHS Trust
South and East Wales Ambulance NHS Trust
North Wales Ambulance NHS Trust
Derwen NHS Trust
Nevill Hall and District NHS Trust
Gwynedd Hospitals NHS Trust
Gwynedd Community Health NHS Trust
Rhondda Health Care NHS Trust
Mid Glamorgan Ambulance NHS Trust
Velindre NHS Trust
East Glamorgan NHS Trust
Morriston Hospital NHS Trust
Cardiff Community Healthcare NHS Trust
University Hospital of Wales Healthcare NHS Trust
University Dental Hospital NHS Trust
West Wales Ambulance NHS Trust
Glan-y-Môr NHS Trust (Shadow running until 1 April 1996)

(b) Trusts from 1 April 1996

The three remaining directly managed units in Wales, the Merthyr/Cynon health unit, the Rhymney Valley health unit and the Hensol health unit have submitted applications to acquire Trust status from April 1996. Three months public consultation on the applications commenced 25 September 1995. If these applications are successful, the Rhymney Valley Health Unit will be absorbed into the existing Glan Hafren NHS Trust, the Hensol Health Unit will merge with the existing Bridgend and District NHS Trust and the Merthyr/Cynon Health Unit will become the new North Glamorgan NHS Trust.

Rail Privatisation

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the consequences of rail privatisation in respect of Wales, and if he will make a statement. [2921]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Privatisation is designed to improve the quality of infrastructure and rail services in Wales.

Cardiff Bay Barrage

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if the date of impoundment of the Cardiff bay barrage will be conditional upon the prior provision of adequate alternative bird reserves being completed and in place as covered in the letter of 2 November from the Welsh Office regional development division to Mr. D. Gould. [3724]

Mr. Hague: The date of impoundment of the waters of Cardiff bay is not conditional upon completion of bird reserve compensation measures. However, the intention is to complete the bird reserve before the start of impoundment.

GP Fundholding

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the latest number of general practitioner fundholders in each county in Wales; how many applications to set up schemes are outstanding; and if he will make a statement. [4009]

Mr. Richards: There are 146 GP fundholding practices in Wales:

Clwyd: 21
Dyfed: 21
Gwent: 21
Gwynedd: 11
Mid Glamorgan: 11
Powys: 12
South Glamorgan: 24
West Glamorgan: 25.

A further 66 practices are preparing to start fundholding from next April.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what were the total administrative costs of running general practitioner fundholding schemes in each year since the inception of the schemes. [4008]

Mr. Richards: Reimbursement to general practitioner fundholders in respect of expenses covered by management allowances since the inception of the scheme is as follows:

	£ million
1990–91	0.112
1991–92	0.518
1992–93	1.677
1993–94	3.055
1994–95	3.759

Smoking

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his policy concerning smoking in public buildings in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [3856]

Mr. Richards: In December 1991, the Government published a non-statutory code of practice on smoking in public places, aimed at everyone with responsibility for monitoring the indoor environment of buildings frequented by the public. It suggests how exposure of the public to environmental tobacco smoke can be minimised, and provides guidance on suitable smoking policies for public places.

The Government believe that the voluntary approach has a greater chance of success than legislation because no-smoking policies produced in response to public pressure are more likely to be accepted and observed.

School Funding

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will meet the head teachers of John Summers high school, Elfed high school, Connah's Quay high school, Castell Alun high school, St. David's high school, and Hawarden high school to discuss his allocation of moneys and other resources for the next financial year. [4020]

Mr. Richards: It is for individual local authorities to determine how the resources that are made available are allocated between services, including education, in the light of their statutory responsibilities and their perception of local needs and priorities. I suggest the schools pursue this matter with the relevant local authority.

Health Authorities

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all health authorities with effect from 1 April 1996. [4067]

Mr. Richards: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my right hon. Friend the Member for Conwy (Sir W. Roberts) on 2 November 1994 Official Report, columns 1139–40. by my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State for Wales.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative (a) capital and (b) revenue costs to public funds (i) under the PFI and (ii) estimated to have been incurred had the scheme been funded wholly within the public sector. [3806]

Mr. Hague: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 7 November 1995 at column 808.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much capital expenditure is forecast to be included in the private finance initiative for the current financial year and the next five financial years. [3836]

Mr. Hague: I refer the hon. Member to table 6.5 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report 1996–97" which was laid before the House on 28 November 1995.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many ministerial visits have been undertaken by each Minister in his Department between 6 July and 1 December; and how many and what percentage of these have involved the Minister travelling abroad. [4227]

Mr. Hague: I and my Ministers undertake regular ministerial visits. I have made 38 ministerial visits to Wales, including three trips abroad, in this period.

The Under-Secretary of State, my hon. friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones) has carried out 48 visits, including two abroad.

The Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, North-West (Mr. Richards) has carried out 48 visits, including one abroad.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Inward Investment

21. Mr. Bayley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what new initiatives his Department intends to take to encourage inward investment in towns and cities that are not assisted areas and do not benefit from EU objective 2 status. [2620]

Mr. Eggar: The Government continue to support inward investment through my Department's Invest in Britain Bureau, the national agencies and regional development organisations. In recent years the number of regional development organisations in England has increased from five to eight with only the south east and eastern regions not currently covered, though IBB generated enquiries are dealt with by the Government offices. The IBB and RDO's work closely with English Partnerships whose role includes the development of vacant or derelict land in towns and cities to bring them back into productive use.

Trade With India

22. Mr. Merchant: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on trade with India. [2621]

Mr. Nelson: Trade with India has increased by some 50 per cent. in both directions in the past three years. United Kingdom exports to India amounted to £1.5 billion in the 12 months to the end of September this year. UK imports from India in the same period amounted to £1.3 billion. The Indo-British Partnership—set up following the Prime Minister's visit to India in 1993—has contributed greatly to the strengthening of trade relations between the UK and India.

Manufacturing Output

23. Mr. Sutcliffe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what has been the change in manufacturing output in the past 12 months. [2622]

Mr. Page: Manufacturing output in the three months to September was 1.2 per cent. higher than a year earlier. Manufacturing output is forecast to grow by 2.5 per cent. next year.

Small Businesses

25. Mr. Touhig: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proportion of small businesses survive longer than three years. [2624]

Mr. Page: Official estimates of survival rates are available for businesses registering for VAT. These show that around 60 per cent. of businesses remain on the VAT register for at least three years.

29. Mr. Gapes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many small firms went out of business in the last quarter for which figures are available. [2628]

Mr. Page: There are no figures on the total numbers of small firms which go out of business each quarter. Figures are available on the number of firms which go out of businesses because of insolvency. In the third quarter of 1995 there were 3,919 company insolvencies and 6,736 individual insolvencies in England and Wales, on a seasonally adjusted basis.

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list those measures that his Department has taken to assist small businesses since 1979. [2617]

Mr. Page: A complete outline of the range of initiatives introduced is published in the annual report "Small Firms in Britain". Copies of the 1995 report are in the Library of the House.

Manweb

26. Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has had on behalf of consumers about the Scottish Power bid for Manweb from the North of Scotland Electricity Consumers Committee. [2625]

Mr. John M. Taylor: No such representations have been received on behalf of consumers.

Support for Businesses

27. Mr. Mark Robinson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what support his Department provides for businesses in the south-west. [2626]

Mr. Nelson: My Department provides a wide range of services for businesses in the south west, including Business Links, a competitive advisory board and two regional supply offices. In addition, £14.4 million of regional selective assistance has been offered to companies in the south-west generating over £104 million of investment and 3,000 jobs.

Export Competitiveness

28. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to improve the competitiveness of Britain's manufacturing exporters to world markets; and if he will make a statement. [2627]

Mr. Nelson: Through overseas trade services my Department offers exporters an enhanced package of support. The Government's commitment and proposals for improving the competitiveness of British industry are set out in the two White Papers on competitiveness, "Helping Business to Win" and "Forging Ahead" published in 1994 and 1995.

Balance of Payments

30. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the balance of payments position in the year ending October 1995 (a) with members of the European Union, (b) with non European Union countries and (c) in total in the United Kingdom's trade with the rest of the world. [2629]

Mr. Lang: Information on the balance of payments, in total, is published quarterly by the Central Statistical Office. First Release, CSO(95)207, gave information up to the second quarter of 1995. Geographic breakdowns of the balance of payments are available annually; the latest results were published by the Central Statistical Office in October 1995 issue of "Economic Trends". Both publications are available in the Library of the House.

Coal Industry

31. Mr. Skinner: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what recent meetings he has had with both sides of the mining industry to discuss output and conditions in British coal mines. [2630]

Mr. Page: My ministerial colleagues and I meet representatives of the coal mining industry as necessary.

Technology Foresight Programme

32. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the implementation of the technology foresight programme. [2631]

Mr. Ian Taylor: Action to take forward the technology foresight programme is proceeding on a broad front. The foresight panels are pursuing vigorous programmes of dissemination. The chief scientific adviser has reconstituted the steering group, making strategic appointments which reflect the group's new focus on dissemination and implementation. The DTI is promoting foresight through Government regional offices and industry divisions. Several other Government departments are taking forward relevant foresight priorities. Numerous trade associations and professional bodies are taking forward foresight with their members. The foresight challenge competition has attracted an impressive response from industry and academia. The Government will publish a progress report shortly.

Internet

34. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what arrangements are being made to link the Internet to schools and libraries; at what cost; and if he will make a statement. [2633]

Mr. Ian Taylor: It is estimated that close to 2,000 schools are already linked to the Internet. My Department has supported an industry-led scheme not only to link 60 schools in a pilot scheme, but to focus and channel the vast amount of material available on the worldwide web so that it can help teachers deliver the national curriculum. The total cost of the "Schools On Line" pilot, which runs through to easter 1996 is around £1 million, of which 50 per cent. comes from the companies and 50 per cent. from DTI. There are also projects involving the Internet in the superhighways for education initiative announced on 13 November.

The Director General of Telecommunications will be issuing a consultative paper in December on the future of the universal service obligation. One possibility is that the level of universal service for schools could be raised to cover a specified level of connection to the information superhighway, using a fund compatible with the operation of a competitive market.

As for public libraries, this is an issue for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage. I understand it is being considered as part of the wider public library review about which there will shortly be a statement.

Future Large Aircraft

35. Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement concerning his Department's commitment to the future large aircraft. [2634]

Mr. Eggar: The Government's position regarding the future large aircraft programmes remains as set out in the answer given by my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State for Defence on 16 December 1994, Official Report, column 823.

My Department is supporting the MoD's work to ensure the appropriate conditions are met to enable the United Kingdom to rejoin the programme. My Department is also seeking to help secure the best conditions for United Kingdom industry's participation through its own contacts with Governments and industry, at home and abroad.

Textile Industry

36. Ms Lynne: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what meetings he has recently held with representatives of the textile industry to discuss the future of the industry. [2635]

Mr. Eggar: In March this year I held just such a meeting with senior management representatives of a range of textile and clothing companies. We discussed competitiveness issues which influence the future prospects of these sectors and on which the Department is supporting the industries' own efforts to improve performance.

The President of the Board of Trade, other DTI Ministers and I have also since had various other contacts throughout the year with organisations and companies operating in the textiles and clothing sectors which have provided additional opportunities to discuss such issues.

Information, Broadcasting and Entertainment Technologies

37. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the changes required in the regulatory regime to take account of the convergence of the information, broadcasting and entertainment technologies. [2636]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The Government are committed to a policy of regulatory stability combined with sensible evolution. The Government are mindful that the growing convergence of telecommunications, broadcasting and information services might require a similar convergence in the regulatory structure. While, it would be premature at present to promote changes in regulatory structures, the Government continue to monitor developments closely, and to work with the multi-media industry advisory group and others in industry to agree the best way forward.

Electronics Industry Prices

38. Mr. Rendel: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to regulate prices in the electronics industry. [2637]

Mr. Ian Taylor: None.

Science and Technology Expenditure

39. Dr. Bray: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the planned percentage change in Government expenditure in real terms on science and technology in the science and engineering base, and, net of launch aid, in the rest of the Department of Trade and Industry between 1993–94 and 1997–98. [2638]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The percentage change in Government expenditure in real terms on science and technology in the science and engineering base through the science budget—that is excluding the contributions from the Education Departments, which are not yet known—between 1993–94 and 1997–98 is +1.3 per cent.

The equivalent figure for the rest of the Department of Trade and Industry, net of launch aid, is not yet available as relevant expenditure plans for forward years have not yet been determined. Full details of the breakdown will appear in the next "Forward Look" of Government-funded science, engineering and technology due to be published in May 1996.

Nanotechnology

Mr. Flynn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what new plans he has to apply research in nanotechnology to industrial uses. [2618]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The Government are committed to innovation and the application of research across the full range of technologies, including nanotechnology. It is for the research councils, universities, academics and industry to take forward specific projects where appropriate making use of one of the many Government schemes encouraging research collaboration.

South Western Electricity

Mr. Etherington: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has had from the National Consumer Council on behalf of consumers about the bid for South Western Electricity by Southern Company. [2623]

Mr. John M. Taylor: No such representations have been received on behalf of consumers.

Electricity Industry

Ms Eagle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the (a) disadvantages and (b) benefits of the restructuring of the electricity industry for the consumer. [2632]

Mr. Eggar: Electricity privatisation has provided the electricity companies with the right incentives to become vigorously competitive commercial enterprises, while independent regulation has brought an end to political meddling. The consumer is benefiting through: prices which—net of tax—are some 7 per cent. lower in real terms in both the domestic and industrial markets, with further reductions to come including a one-off rebate of £50 for domestic electricity customers of the regional electricity companies in England and Wales arising from the flotation of the national grid, and other reductions arising from tightened price controls and the forthcoming reduction in the fossil fuel levy; guaranteed standards of performance for tariff customers, with compensation if those standards are not met; new codes of practice on such matters as services for the elderly and disabled; and the opportunity to complain to an independent regulator—the Director General of Electricity Supply—and for those complaints to be investigated by the Office of Electricity Regulation. Many consumers have already been given the right to shop around for their electricity supplier, and in 1998 this right will be extended to all consumers including over 20 million in the domestic sector.

Private Office Staff

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 23 November, how many staff were employed in each Minister's private office; what were the salary costs of each office, in each year since 1979 at present prices; and if he will list the number of people employed, and their salary costs, in the press office in each year since 1979. [4060]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 5 December 1995]: Below are details of the number of staff employed in Minister's private offices—figures for the former Department of Energy are not available prior to 1 April 1985. Disaggregated salary costs are not available prior to 1994–95. The total salary costs in 1994–95 were £952,000.

[1] Disaggregated information is not available for the Department of Energy which merged with the Department of Trade and Industry in April 1992.

For information on the Department's press office I refer the hon. Member to a previous answer to the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) on 17 September 1993, Official Report, column 988. The total number of staff employed on 1 April 1995 was 30.

The estimated current annual salary cost of the press office is £777,000. Comparable figures for previous years could not be obtained without disproportionate cost.

Employee-owned Companies

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list all employee-owned companies. [4029]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 5 December 1995]: I understand that there is no information available which would enable me to do so.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his estimate of the percentage, and total turnover, of United Kingdom companies that are employee owned. [4030]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 5 December 1995]: I understand that there is no information available that would enable me to make such estimates.

Investment

Mr. Bennett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what change was recorded in total investment between the second quarter of 1995 and the third quarter of 1995. [2602]

Mr. Oppenheim: Whilst total investment fell by 2 per cent. over this period, it rose by 6.5 per cent. over the previous two years and by 31 per cent. since 1979.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative (a) capital and (b) revenue costs to public funds (i) under the PFI and (ii) estimated to have been incurred had the scheme been funded wholly within the public sector. [3809]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Although my Department has identified a number of proposals for the period 1996–97 to 1998–99, no scheme has yet been agreed.

Mr. Betts: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much capital expenditure is forecast to be included in the private finance initiative for the current financial year and the next five financial years. [3833]

Mr. John M. Taylor: I refer the hon. Member to table 6.5 of the "Financial Statement and the Budget Report 1996–97", which was laid before the House on 28 November 1995 and, for the current financial year, I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my predecessor on 7 November 1995, Official Report, column 705.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many ministerial visits have been undertaken by each Minister in his Department between 6 July and 1 December; and how many and what percentage of these have involved the Minister travelling abroad. [4230]

Mr. Lang: My duties and those of my Ministers involve a large number of visits in the United Kingdom. Ministers in my Department have made 37 trips overseas in the period 6 July to 1 December 1995.

Estimated Funding

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the estimated funding of the (a) National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux, (b) National Consumer Council, (c) Gas Consumer Council, (d) Post Office Users National Council, (e) POAC, (f) Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents, (g) DTI's consumer safety programme and (h) Central Rail Users Consultative Committee for each year from 1993–94 at 1995 prices, together with the percentage change (i) per annum and (ii) since 1993–94, including the 1996–97 figure following the November Budget statement. [4080]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Most of the information requested is as follows. Figures are shown for Citizens Advice Scotland as well as the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux. The 1996–97 allocations have not yet been determined. Since April 1994 the Central Rail Users Consultative Committee has been the responsibility of the Office of the Rail Regulator.

[1] The National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux received £336,000 in 1993–94, and £436,988 in 1994–95 in supplementary grant.

[2] Citizen Advice Scotland received £33,000 in 1993–94 and £79,736 in 1994–95 in supplementary grant.

[3] The National Consumer Council received £228,000 in 1993–94, and £291,879 in 1994–95 in supplementary grant

[4] The cost of the Gas Consumers' Council is almost entirely recovered from British Gas

[5] This covers expenditure by POUNC, POACs and the Post Office Users' Councils and Advisory Committees on Telecommunications for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland.

Carbon Monoxide Poisoning

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will publish the Consumer Safety unit's report on carbon monoxide accidental fatal and non-fatal poisonings from domestic appliances in the United Kingdom and EU. [4081]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The two reports on accidental fatal and non-fatal poisonings from carbon monoxide due to faulty domestic heating appliances within the UK and EU will be published on 8 December, and copies of the reports will be placed in the Library of the House. Copies are available on request from the Department's Consumer safety unit.

Manufacturing Employment

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade under which Labour Government since 1965 jobs in manufacturing fell at the rate of 700,000 a year, as indicated in his oral answer of 1 November to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-east (Mr. Purchase) Official Report column 297; and what information he has on the number of jobs in manufacturing in each year since 1965. [1617]

Mr. Oppenheim: Manufacturing employment under the last labour Government fell by 680,000. That is a rate of 136,000 a year.

Manufacturing output also declined by 0.5 per cent. a year for 1974 to 1979. Since 1979 it has increased by 0.7 per cent. a year.

EU Retex Grant

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what further assistance he proposes for textile areas to promote diversification. [2614]

Mr. Page: The Government have secured 32 mecu of European Retex grant for a programme for textile areas including, for the first time, parts of London and the Scottish Borders. The aim of the programme is to promote the economic diversification of these areas. I expect that the European Commission will adopt the GB Retex programme later this month.

Staff Training

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what research his Department has undertaken on the effects on the performance of businesses of financial management training for managers. [3929]

Mr. Page: My Department recognises the importance of training for all staff, not just managers and its potential effect on competitiveness. A research report published by the DTI and the CBI—"Competitiveness—How the best UK companies are Winning" showed that winning companies train and develop all staff at all levels. It also showed that improved company performance is dependent on a range of factors, it can rarely be attributable to improvements in one particular facet of management.

Business Links

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to establish a central management information service for the business links programme. [3935]

Mr. Page: The Department has a contractual requirement that business links must provide through the training and enterprise councils, quarterly management information on business links activities.

Business links partnerships are also required to establish as soon as reasonably practical, a database common to all the partners recording all business links related contacts with individual companies.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the core services of the business links network. [3938]

Mr. Page: A number of core services lie at the heart of business links. These include:

an enquiry and information service;

personal business advisers;

help for start ups and micro business;

diagnostic services;

Business links also provide direct access to 11 categories of specialist advice and support including: marketing, finance, exports, management, training, technology and design.

A copy of the "Business Links Service Guide" can be found in the Library of the House.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what common database software is used by business links. [3936]

Mr. Page: The Business Links IT strategy group defines the overall IT strategy for business links. As the business links are independent commercial companies it is the responsibility of the individual business link to specify what core software and systems they require to support their business. There is therefore no single common database software in use.

Individual business links partnerships are however required to establish a clear commitment to record in a common database all contact information made by any of the partners where that contact relates to business links activity. This will provide the partners with a complete picture when dealing with customers of the business links.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what specifications the IT unit has set out for business links systems. [3937]

Mr. Page: The business link IT strategy group—made up of the national partners, business links and DTI—determined the approach to be taken by business links in defining and developing their IT systems. They defined minimum mandatory standards in the areas of common core databases, client management systems core data, electronic mail, data protection and system security. These mandatory requirements and additional advisory material have been circulated to all business links partnerships as a series of documents known as OSSIT papers.

The DTI IT unit does not however provide detailed specifications for business links IT systems. It is the responsibility of individual business links partnerships to define the technical specification of the solutions to their particular business requirements.

Company Voluntary Arrangements

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many company voluntary arrangements there have been (a) in total and (b) for firms with fewer than 200 employees in each financial year since the Insolvency Act 1986. [3939]

Mr. Oppenheim: The total number of company voluntary arrangements in each financial year since the Insolvency Act 1986 is shown in the table. Information by size of business is not available.

Business Starts and Closures

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many (a) business start-ups there were and (b) small businesses closed in the last year for which figures are available in each parliamentary constituency. [3933]

Mr. Page: There are no available figures on the numbers of business starts and closures in each parliamentary constituency. Estimates of numbers of VAT registrations and deregistrations by local authority district are published annually. A copy of the most recent figures "VAT Registrations and Deregistrations, County and District Analysis 1992–1993" is in the Library of the House.

Business Link London

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects the London business links to begin. [3934]

Mr. Page: Business link London opened for commercial trialling in July 1995. It provides a common enquiry and information services across London. Businesses can contact business link London by telephoning its freephone number 0800 997998.

Plans for local access have been developed by eight local partnerships. Of these, six have been approved by my Department and their hub operations have opened for business. The remaining two are expected to follow early in 1996.

British Coal

Mr. Jack Thompson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the remaining senior executives of British Coal and the cost to public funds of their salaries. [4092]

Mr. Page: There are currently two full-time members of the British Coal Corporation, Mr Neil Clarke—Chairman and Mr Philip Hutchinson. Their salaries of £240,000 and £95,000 are paid by British Coal.

Mr. Thompson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) if he will list the current number of employees of British Coal; [4088]

(2) what is the cost to the Exchequer of maintaining the remaining workforce and accommodation still required by British Coal for the six months following the establishment of the Coal Authority. [4089]

Mr. Page: This is a matter for British Coal.

EU Telecommunications Council

Mr. Trend: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Telecommunications Council on 27 November. [4941]

Mr. Ian Taylor: I represented the United Kingdom at the Telecommunications Council held in Brussels on 27 November.

The Council reached political agreement on a decision on a series of guidelines for Trans-European telecommunications networks, and on a Decision for a 65 million ecu programme to stimulate development of the European multi-media content industry—INFO 2000 programme—though in both cases adoption of a common position awaits the European Parliament's opinion. The council also adopted a number of items without discussion, and details of these are listed in the Council press release which is deposited in the Library of the House. These included the final adoption of the resubmitted directive applying open network provision to voice telephony.

The presidency gave a progress report on discussion of a draft directive on interconnection in telecommunications. A policy debate followed on two draft Commission directives on mobile and personal communications, and full competition in telecommunications markets. The Council agreed unanimous conclusions calling on the Commission to take account of the positions expressed by the Council and member states before adopting the directives.

There was also a policy debate on a draft directive on the development of Community postal services, and on a draft Commission notice on the application of the treaty competition rules to the postal sector. The Council agreed unanimous conclusions on the draft Notice calling on the Commission to delay its publication until agreement had been reached on the directive, but to publish by the end of 1996.

The Commission made brief presentations on: two draft directives on licensing of telecommunications services, and to adapt the open network provision directives 90/387/EEC and 92/44/EEC to a competitive environment; two draft decisions on satellite personal communications, and on a programme for the promotion of multi-lingualism in the information society, and on a Communication on directories in a competitive environment. The Commission also reported on the progress of multilateral negotiations in the World Trade Organisation on basic telecommunications.

No votes were taken on the substantive items in the agenda of the Council.

Mr. Barnes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Telecoms Council, held on 27 November giving details of all votes and all decisions which were determined by unanimity or without dissension. [1971]

Mr. Ian Taylor [holding answer 4 December 1995]: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor and Maidenhead (Mr. Trend) on the outcome of the Telecommunications Council. Details of votes on all points are recorded in the Council press release referred to in my reply.

World Trade Estimate

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his estimate of Britain's share of (a) world trade in manufactured goods and (b) world trade in services for each year since 1975. [4402]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The information requested is provided in the table.

UK percentage share of world exports of manufactured goods and services

	Percentage value share of services[1]	Percentage value share of manufactures[2]	Percentage volume share of manufactures[2]
1975	9.9	7.1	8.3
1976	9.1	6.6	8.0
1977	8.8	6.9	8.0
1978	8.6	6.7	7.5
1979	9.0	6.7	6.9
1980	8.8	7.0	6.7
1981	8.2	6.2	6.1
1982	7.6	6.1	6.2
1983	7.4	5.6	5.9
1984	7.3	5.3	5.8
1985	7.7	5.5	5.9
1986	7.7	5.4	5.9
1987	7.7	5.6	6.0
1988	7.4	5.7	5.8
1989	6.8	5.6	5.8
1990	6.6	5.9	6.0
1991	6.0	5.8	5.8
1992	5.7	5.6	5.7
1993	5.4	5.3	5.5
1994	n/a	5.4	5.5

Note:

Over the time period 1975–94 volume shares will better reflect changes in composition and relative prices. But volume share of world trade in services is not readily available.

Regional Selective Assistance

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many informal approaches his Department has received from companies seeking payments under regional selective assistance in each financial year since 1979–80. [1717]

Mr. Kynoch [holding answer 23 November 1995]: Statistical records of informal approaches to the Department are not kept.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what tightening of the procedures in relation to the payment of regional selective assistance his Department made during the last 18 months; [1719]

(2) what section within his Department has responsibility for monitoring companies who have been awarded regional selective assistance; and what procedures are used by this section to monitor these projects. [1724]

Mr. Kynoch [holding answer 23 November 1995]: Responsibility for the monitoring of projects which have been awarded regional selective assistance lies with the investment assistance division of the Scottish Office Education and Industry Department. When a company is made an offer of RSA, it is issued with an offer letter which sets out the conditions against which RSA will, assuming the offer is accepted, be payable. Throughout the term of each offer of assistance, and prior to any payment of grant, company progress reports are obtained which have been certified by independent accountants. These allow the division to check that the conditions upon which payment of grant depends have been met. These progress reports are supplemented, as necessary, by the division's own monitoring visits and investigations. The Scottish Office Education and Industry Department, in conjunction with the Department of Trade and Industry and the Welsh Office, has within the last 18 months reviewed its monitoring procedures to ensure that straightforward cases are not handled with unnecessary complexity while higher risk cases are accorded appropriately full attention.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much money his Department offered to companies in regional selective assistance for each financial year since 1979–80; and what proportion of these amounts were fully paid by his Department. [1734]

Mr. Kynoch [holding answer 23 November 1995]: The information requested is set out in the table:

Year of acceptance	Value of offers accepted (£ million)	Of which total paid (£ million)	Proportion paid to date (percentage)
1979–80	32.2	27.1	84
1980–81	31.0	23.0	74
1981–82	29.9	22.5	75
1982–83	50.4	39.2	78
1983–84	38.3	34.1	89
1984–85	70.7	55.2	78
1985–86	58.6	44.6	76
1986–87	34.6	26.9	78
1987–88	56.2	37.6	67
1988–89	49.8	34.7	70
1989–90	76.3	50.2	66
1990–91	173.5	99.5	57
1991–92	52.3	36.2	69
1992–93	72.3	43.0	59
1993–94	126.8	51.6	41
1994–95	113.0	22.7	20

1. This table refers to the year an offer was accepted. Payments in respect of an offer will normally be spread over several years.

2. For the most recent years, some offers are still live and further payments may be made in respect of these.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make it his policy to disclose fully the amounts of money actually received by companies from his Department in regional selective assistance. [1720]

Mr. Kynoch [holding answer 23 November 1995]: The amount of an offer made to a company, where the offer is over £75,000, is published in "Labour Market Trends" following the first grant payment. It is not intended to depart from this practice.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will make it is policy to instruct his Department to make a new appraisal of the effectiveness of the regional selective assistance scheme; [1721]

(2) what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of awards made by his Department under the regional selective assistance scheme; [1722]

(3) what specific measures and sources of funding are available to his Department to support economic development in Scotland. [1723]

Mr. Kynoch [holding answer 23 November 1995]: The Government's chief role in supporting economic development is to promote a stable low-inflation economic environment. Within that context, the Scottish Office is responsible for a number of measures which support economic development. For example, it sponsors and funds Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise; it encourages inward investment and export promotion through its two joint bureaux with Scottish Enterprise, Locate in Scotland and Scottish Trade International; and it offers grant assistance to encourage industrial investment in the assisted areas.

Regional selective assistance is the principal such grant assistance scheme. The scheme operates throughout Great Britain, under the direction of the Department of Trade and Industry, the Scottish Office and the Welsh Office. Periodic evaluations are made by the independent consultants of the scheme's effectiveness throughout Great Britain. Because of the nature of the RSA scheme there is frequently a period of some three to five years between an application for grant being made and the assisted project being completed, therefore such evaluations have to be undertaken some years in arrears. The most recent evaluation was "Regional Selective Assistance 1985–1988: An Evaluation by PA Cambridge Economic Consultants" published by HMSO in July 1993. This evaluation concluded that RSA was an effective means of raising the level of employment in the assisted areas of Great Britain and that the scheme during the period 1985–88 had resulted in the creation of between 700,000 and 1 million additional job years at a net cost to the Exchequer of between £500 to £700 per job at 1990 prices. It also concluded that the operation of RSA during the period 1980–88 had reduced the assisted areas unemployment rate by about one percentage point compared with what would otherwise have been the case. A further evaluation will be carried out in due course.

Prison Population

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the present prison population in Scotland and in each of the past five years. [2539]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 27 November 1995]: The subject of this question relates to matters undertaken by the Scottish Prison Service. I have asked its chief executive, Mr. E.W. Frizzell, to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from E. W. Frizzell to Mr. Norman Hogg, dated 6 December 1995:

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton has asked me to reply to your Question relating to the present prison population in Scotland and in each of the past five years.

On Friday 17 November 1995 the prison population was 5,717.

The table below shows the average daily prison population for each of the past five years.

Average daily population for 1990–94

1990: 4,724

1991: 4,839

1992: 5,257

1993: 5,637

1994: 5,585.

Executive Agencies

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what record he keeps of the number and dates of meetings he has with the heads of agencies which report to him. [3084]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Internal records are maintained for all formal meetings between my right hon. Friend and the heads of his agencies.

Statutory Instruments

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many statutory instruments his Department sponsored in the last Session of Parliament; and how many of these (a) constituted a new rule or regulation, (b) were introduced to implement European Community directives and (c) amplify the minimum standards set out in an original European Community directive. [2462]

Mr. Kynoch [holding answer 28 November 1995]: In the last Session of Parliament the Scottish Office sponsored 193 statutory instruments; information on how many of these constituted a new rule or regulation could be obtained only at disproportionate cost; five of the 193 were introduced to implement European Directives; none of these amplifies the minimum standards set out in an original European directive.

Public Bodies

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list annual income from (a) fees, (b) charges and (c) fines; what was the total number of staff employed (i) part-time and (ii) full time; and what contribution his Department has made towards the annual running costs in each of the past three years in respect of (1) the river purification boards, (2) Her Majesty's industrial pollution inspectorate, (3) the Scottish Fisheries Protection Agency and (4) the Meat and Livestock Commission for Scotland. [2747]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information available to me is set out in the tables. The level of detail requested is, for some of the bodies, greater than that routinely held and could be provided only at a disproportionate cost.

The information given for the Meat and Livestock Commission relates to the Great Britain-wide non-departmental public body for which the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is the sponsor Department. There is no separate commission for Scotland.

1. Information from annual reports which are prepared on the basis of a calendar year.
2. MLC do not receive income from fees, charges or fines.

Playing Fields

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many playing fields are currently under threat of development; [3847]

(2) how many playing fields have been sold off since 1981; [3848]

(3) what estimate he has made of the value of playing fields that have been sold off since 1981; [3849]

(4) what estimates he has made of the area of playing fields that have been sold off since 1981; [3850]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: Information on the redevelopment or disposal of playing fields in Scotland is not held centrally. I have however asked the chairman of the Scottish Sports Council to write to the hon. Gentleman with any information held by the council on these matters. I have asked to see a copy of the letter.

Highland Council for Decentralisation

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what funds were given to the Highland Council for decentralisation; how these funds were bid for; if other new unitary councils were invited to bid for funds for decentralisation; and if he will make a statement. [3493]

Mr. Kynoch: The shadow Highland council has been given a capital allocation of £275,000 towards its accommodation needs arising from local government reorganisation. These resources are intended to enable the council to provide public access facilities in remote communities and will also assist the council to maximise the effective use of existing property.

All shadow unitary authorities were invited to submit bids in respect of their accommodation needs arising from reorganisation and capital allocations of around £9 million have now been given to 21 shadow authorities and the Strathclyde police board. No restrictions were placed on the scope of bids and decisions on allocations were taken on the basis of the relative needs of individual councils, within the limits of the available resources.

Water Charges

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what arrangements he is making for the collection of revenue for the water and sewerage authorities in Scotland; what payment is to be made to any councils involved in collection; who will be responsible for pursuing those in arrears with payment; and if he will make a statement. [3494]

Mr. Kynoch: The collection of non-domestic and metered charges is a matter for the new water and sewerage authorities. With regard to domestic unmeasured water and sewerage charges, my right hon. Friend will require the unitary councils to bill and collect these on behalf of the new water and sewerage authorities in 1996–97. An order will be made under section 79 of the Local Government etc. (Scotland) Act 1994 requiring this work to be done.

We are presently consulting local authorities, new water authorities and the Scottish Water and Sewerage Customers Council among others on the practical arrangements. These include proposals for calculating the amount the local authorities will be required to hand over to the new water and sewerage authorities and for payment to the local authorities for the work they will do. The consultation period expires on 31 December. I have arranged for copies of the consultation document to be placed in the Library of the House.

When local authorities are required to do this billing and collection work, the recovery of charges is a matter for them. Summary warrant powers will be available to them.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much capital expenditure is forecast to be included in the private finance initiative for the current financial year and the next five financial years. [3831]

Mr. Kynoch: I refer the hon. Member to table 6.5 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report 1996–97", which was laid before the House on 28 November 1995.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative (a) capital and (b) revenue costs to public funds (i) under the PFI and (ii) estimated to have been incurred had the scheme been funded wholly within the public sector. [3811]

Mr. Kynoch: The following table lists completed PFI projects and agreed projects within the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Scotland and their estimated capital value. The health sector projects are the responsibility of the relevant health boards and trusts and figures are not available centrally for estimated revenue costs or to allow a comparison between estimated PFI and public sector capital costs.

Scottish Office PFI projects completed or agreed (ie contracts let).

Project	Estimated capital value (£ million)
A—Completed
Lanarkshire Health Board: 60 elderly care beds	1.5
Lanarkshire Health Board (Bellshill): care beds	2.8
Dundee Teaching Hospitals Trust: SMAC analyser equipment	0.3
Grampian Health Board (Spynie Hospital, Elgin): 25 beds	1.1
Grampian Healthcare NHS Trust (Aberdeen City Hospital): 60 beds	n/a
Grampian Healthcare NHS Trust beds for mentally ill: 3–18 beds	n/a
Greater Glasgow Health Board (Darnley) 120 care beds	3.5
Greater Glasgow Health Board (Ruchill): 120 beds	3.8
Greater Glasgow Health Board (Rutherglen): 180 beds	5.0
Greater Glasgow Health Board (Shettleston): 120 beds	3.3
Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh NHS Trust: CT and MRI scanners	2.2
Skye Bridge crossing	23.6

Ayrshire and Arran Health Board: care beds	3.8
Lothian and Forth Valley Trusts: clinical waste disposal	5.0
Lothian HB: Western General Hospital Molecular Medicines Centre	5.3
Lothain Health Board: clinical genetic services	0.8
Northern Trusts: clinical waste disposal	5.0

NHS Trust Executives

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what travel allowances have been paid to senior executives of (a) each NHS trust in Scotland; and (b) each health board in Scotland; in the last four financial years. [4447]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what guidance his Department has issued to NHS trusts or health boards relating to the travel allowances which should be available to the senior executives of these bodies. [4446]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Travel allowance for senior executives of an NHS trust is a matter for the trust itself. For senior executives on national terms and conditions, travel allowance provisions of the "General Whitley Council Handbook" will apply.

Local Enterprise Companies

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) when Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise expect to introduce new disclosure arrangements for themselves and their subsidiary local enterprise companies relating to assistance offered to companies by the local enterprise companies; [4450]

(2) how much in total the directors of Scottish Enterprise, Highlands and Islands Enterprise and each local enterprise company have declared in beneficial interests for each financial year since their establishment; and what percentage this represented of the operational expenditure of each of the local enterprise company. [4449]

Mr. Kynoch: These are operational matters for Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise. I have asked the chairmen of both bodies to write to the hon. Member.

Water Authorities

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what guidance he has issued to the water authorities in Scotland on the subject of conflicts of interest between their business and personal interests and their membership of the water authorities. [4454]

Mr. Kynoch: The instrument of appointment signed by members required them to notify the Secretary of State of interests which might be prejudicial to their appointment. Members are also required by the provisions of schedule 7 to the Local Government etc. (Scotland) Act 1994 to disclose at a meeting of the water authority any interests which might prejudicially affect consideration of matters being dealt with by the authority to which they have been appointed.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what tendering procedure was used by his Department in awarding the contract for drafting the property transfer orders for the new water authorities in Scotland. [4453]

Mr. Kynoch: To assist outgoing councils and the Central Scotland Water Development Board in the drafting of the transfer schemes required under section 91 of the Local Government etc. (Scotland) Act 1994, the Scottish Office let two contracts: the first was to draw up a model transfer scheme and the second was to liaise with councils and the board on the preparation of schemes and to evaluate the content of submitted schemes.

Both contracts were let by competitive tender. For the first, six firms were invited to tender from which the Babtie Group was chosen. For the second contract expressions of interest, were sought by advertisement in the Official Journal of the European Communities. Thereafter, 13 firms were invited to tender and the contract was awarded to the Babtie Group.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what arrangements he is proposing in respect of payments of water rates by the new unitary councils to the new water authorities in Scotland; what procedures he will put in place to resolve disputes between the water authorities and the unitary councils over the levels of payments; and what plan he has to allow unitary councils to be billed by the water authorities in advance for water rates. [4443]

Mr. Kynoch: My right hon. Friend will require the unitary councils to bill and collect unmeasured domestic water and sewerage charges on behalf of the new water and sewerage authorities in 1996–97. A copy of the consultation paper setting out our proposals is available in the Library of the House. The consultation period ends on 31 December. The billing and collection of other water and sewerage charges is a matter for the new water and sewerage authorities.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what personal interests have been declared by members of the new water authorities; and what procedures there are for public scrutiny of these interests. [4455]

Mr. Kynoch: No member of a water authority has declared any interest within the terms of schedule 7 to the Local Government etc. (Scotland) Act 1994. Each of the new water authorities is presently considering the issue of public scrutiny of any declarations of interests. The West of Scotland Water Authority has agreed interim standing orders which provide for the public inspection for a register of members' interests.

Emergency Response Trains

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations his Department has made to Railtrack in respect of its recent decision on the deployment of emergency response trains on the rail network; and if his Department was consulted on this matter. [4441]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The deployment of emergency units is entirely a matter for Railtrack and there is no requirement to consult the Scottish Office.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Education Funding

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will give the amount in cash terms by which (a) the funding from her Department changed per pupil in Derbyshire between 1994–95 and 1995–96 and (b) the funding allocated by Derbyshire county council to each school changed, per pupil, over the same period. [2216]

Mr. Robin Squire: The standard spending assessment for Derbyshire increased by £11 or 0.6 per cent., per primary pupil and decreased by £101 or 4.2 per cent., per secondary pupil between 1994–95 and 1995–96. In percentage terms, this is broadly in line with national figures.

A table will be placed in the House of Commons Library showing the change over the same period in funding per pupil allocated by Derbyshire county council to each school maintained by the local education authority.

School Meals

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the average cost of school meals in each local education authority in England and Wales. [3707]

Mrs. Gillan: Information on the cost of school meals in schools in England has not been collected centrally since 1993.

The cost of school meals in Wales is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what the average cost of school meals in England has been for each year since 1978. [3706]

Mrs. Gillan: Information on local authorities' charging arrangements, which was collected centrally between January 1990 and 1993, is shown in the table:

School meals charging arrangements[1] in maintained schools in England 1990–1993

Position as at January each year

	Pence per day Primary		Pence per day secondary
Year	Fixed[2] charge	Authorised[3] spend	Fixed[2] charge	Authorised[3] spend
1990	62	63	65	74
1991	73	75	78	82
1992	83	88	89	94
1993	92	92	96	103

[1] 1993 data collected from maintained schools. Data for earlier years collected from local education authorities.

[2] The fixed charge is the charge for a standard meal in schools operating dining centres.

[3] The authorised spend is the amount allowed for each pupil receiving a free meal in schools operating a cash cafeteria service.

Information Technology

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many schools now have access to a qualified computer technician. [3846]

Mr. Robin Squire: Technical support is provided by a range of public and commercial contractors and is a matter for individual schools. Surveys recently carried out do not differentiate between general and computer technicians.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many teachers in United Kingdom schools have knowledge of, and the ability to use, computers. [3915]

Mr. Squire: The competencies set out in departmental circulars 9/92 and 14/93 require all newly qualified teachers to be able to make constructive use of information technology. The Teacher Training Agency is targeting the use of IT to improve pupils' achievements as a national priority area for the continuing professional development of teachers.

Details of staff trained in the use of information technology in schools in England are contained within the Department's statistical bulletin 3/95, reporting on a survey in March 1994. This indicates that seven in 10 staff in primary schools had undertaken one or more short in-service training courses in the use of IT. In secondary schools, 32 per cent. of teachers had received initial awareness training in the use of IT; 24 per cent. had attended one additional short in-service course; a further 27 per cent. of teachers had attended more than one additional short in-service course.

Information about schools in Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland are matters for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State concerned.

Unemployment Benefit

Ms Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what action the Government plan to take to remove obstacles to people who wish to study or train while remaining unemployed and claiming benefit. [4093]

Mr. Paice: The rules for unemployed people who wish to study or train while claiming benefits will be updated when Jobseeker's allowance is introduced on 7 October 1996.

Certain unemployed people, in particular those who have been unemployed for six months or more, will continue to be eligible to train full or part-time under training for work. Participants on TFW receive an allowance instead of benefit, and so are not subject to the benefit tests of availability or actively seeking employment.

As now, full-time students will not generally be able to claim JSA. People receiving JSA will be able to study part-time, as long as they meet the entitlement conditions, which include being available for and actively seeking employment. This carries existing arrangements. Courses funded by the Further Education Funding Council are not defined as full or part-time. For JSA purposes, therefore, courses funded in whole or in part by the FEFC will be considered to be part-time if they are of no more than 16 guided learning hours per week. There will be no change in higher education, where the distinction between full and part-time remains, or in other sectors.

Unemployed people claiming JSA will be able to undertake full-time, employment-related courses for up to two weeks a year with the prior agreement of the Employment Service. They will not have to be available for or actively seeking employment while on the course.

These new rules on part-time study will provide more clarity and are designed to allow the same number of people to study part-time while unemployed and receiving benefit as do so under the current rules.

Assisted Places

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to her answer of 21 November 1995, Official Report, column 101, if she will make a statement on the procedures in place to cross-check the income of parents seeking help under the assisted place scheme with other Government-held records. [4196]

Mrs. Gillan: Schools participating in the assisted places scheme administer means testing within the regulations and guidance provided by the Department. Parents are required to supply to the schools full corroborative documentary evidence of their income, for example, by means of a P60 or schedule D tax assessment. Schools are expected to satisfy themselves that it is complete and accurate, and may ask parents to obtain written confirmation from the Inland Revenue or other source where necessary. The Department conducts regular audit surveys of random samples of parental income assessments carried out by participating schools to check compliance with the regulations and guidance.

Training for Work

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the number of training for work programme participants in each month of 1995 (a) in total and (b) by standard region; and what was the number of training for work programme participants regarded as special needs trainees in the same periods and regions. [4317]

Mr. Paice: August 1995 is the latest month for which figures are available. It is only possible to estimate the percentage of starts by special needs trainees, not the actual numbers. The information available is given in tables 1 and 2:

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what surplus or loss each training and enterprise council made in 1994–95 on their turnover. [3702]

Mr. Paice: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) on 15 June 1995, Official Report, column 655. This shows the surpluses or losses for each of the training and enterprise councils in England. The information has been extracted from TECs' statutory accounts for 1993–94. Information for 1994–95 will be available at 31 January 1996 by which date all TECs are required to have lodged their accounts.

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the total amount available in 1995–96 to TECs by way of performance-related funding; and what was the performance-related funding target for small firm training loans to have been awarded in respect of each TEC. [3704]

Mr. Paice: The total amount of funding for the 1995–96 performance-related funding competition for TECs has yet to be determined, but is customarily 2 per cent. of eligible programme budgets for the following year. The 1994–95 competition resulted in awards totalling nearly £20 million. Targets for small firms training loans of some 1,300 were planned as a component of the 1995–96 competition, but following representation from the TEC national council that the targets were unrealistic I have agreed to withdraw this element of the competition, if all TECs in a region agree.

Skills League Table

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the United Kingdom's current position in the World Economic Forum's skills league table. [3703]

Mr. Forth: Out of the 48 countries covered in the World Economic Forum's "World Competitiveness Report, 1995", the UK was ranked 20th in respect of the availability of competent senior managers and skilled labour. However, the forum's findings are based on limited statistical evidence and put Japan well below the Philippines.

Investors in People

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many employers, and of what size, currently hold investor in people status; and what these constitute as a percentage of all employers of that size (a) nationally and (b) by region. [4237]

Mr. Paice: At 8 October 1995, 2,631 employers in the United Kingdom were recognised as investors in people. Of these, 743 were companies with over 200 employees; 1,888 with under 200 employees.

The percentage of organisations in England recognised as investors in people is:

(a) 8.5 per cent. of those with over 200 employees.

(b) 0.15 per cent. of those with under 200 employees.

Training and enterprise councils have counted the number of companies employing over 200 who are likely to be eligible for investors in people. Figures for companies employing under 200 are currently based on the latest published census of employment figures which counts numbers of workplaces.

The regional breakdown for England, as a percentage of those organisations in each region with over 200 employees and under 200 employees respectively, is as follows:

Percentage

	Over 200 employees	Under 200 employees
Eastern	7	.05
East Midlands	9	.15
London	3	.05

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative (a) capital and (b) revenue costs to public funds (i) under the PFI and (ii) estimated to have been incurred had the scheme been funded wholly within the public sector. [3819]

Mrs. Gillan: The Employment Service has procured a personnel system under the private finance initiative. There are no associated capital costs to public funds. The revenue cost to the Employment Service is £3.2 million over the seven-year life of the contract.

The Employment Service could not have obtained the expertise within the public sector so no estimate has been made.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much capital expenditure is forecast to be included in the private finance initiative for the current financial year and the next five financial years. [3824]

Mrs. Gillan: I refer the hon. member to table 6.5 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report 1996–97", which was laid before the House on 28 November 1995.

Youth Training

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment for the latest year available for (a) England, (b) Wales and (c) regionally of those young people who started youth training in (i) 1994 and (ii) 1995 what percentage completed the course (1) without gaining a qualification and (2) subsequently registered unemployed. [4292]

Mr. Paice: The available information is given in the table. The table covers those who completed their training in 1994, as many of those young people who started youth training in 1994 and 1995 have yet to complete their course.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many ministerial visits have been undertaken by each Minister in her Department between 6 July and 1 December; and how many and what percentage of these have involved the Minister travelling abroad. [4224]

Mr. Robin Squire: The information requested is in the table:

NORTHERN IRELAND

"Make It Back Home"

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the Make It Back Home project was launched by the Local Enterprise Development Unit; in what countries it was advertised; how many applications have been made to date from each such country; and how many persons have been assisted and at what total and average cost (a) to date and (b) to the end of the period in which grant assistance will be paid to those currently accepted under the scheme. [3456]

Mr. Ancram: LEDU launched its first "Make It Back Home" campaign in 1987 under the name "Success in the West" and advertising subsequently took place in the following countries:

United States of America

United Kingdom

Canada

Hong Kong

New Zealand

Australia.

Applications received so far are as follows:

Country	Number of applications received
United Kingdom	89
United States of America	17
Australia	2
Canada	6
Saudi Arabia	1
Republic of Ireland	3
Total	118

A total of 90 companies have been assisted to date with a total funding commitment of £938,544.

The total cost of assistance actually paid to date is £699,358 with an average cost per project of £7,770.

The average cost, once all moneys committed to these 90 companies have been paid will be £10,428 per project.

Job Creation

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the cost per job created in (a) manufacturing industry, (b) the service industry and (c) retailing in the last five years in Northern Ireland the current year to date; and what has been the cost to public funds in each category. [3458]

Mr. Ancram: Information on costs per job is not currently available in the form requested. The Industrial Development Board and the Local Enterprise Development Unit are currently each carrying out work to establish meaningful measurements in this difficult area.

The hon. Gentleman may, however, find useful the related information on employment and financial assistance contained in the latest IDB and LEDU annual reports, copies of which are available in the Library.

Mr. Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many jobs have been created by inward investment in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years and the current year to the latest available date in (a) manufacturing industry, (b) the service industry and (c) retailing in each council area in Northern Ireland. [3463]

Mr. Ancram: Information on job creation is not available in the form requested. The table gives details of all inward investment job promotions in each council area in Northern Ireland for the years 1990–91 to 1994–95 and for those agreed and announced in the current year up to 29 November.

University of Ulster Campus

Dr. Hendron: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what factors underlay the delay in the publication of the Planning, Industrial and Economic Development Advisers report into the proposed university of Ulster campus at Springvale; when it will be published; what was its cost; and what assessment he has made of the adequacy. [3182]

Mr. Moss: The factors associated with the delay in the publication of the PIEDA report include the complexity of the assignment and the need for extended consultation with Government officials and education interests. The final report is expected by the end of 1995 and a decision about publication will then be taken. The cost of the economic appraisal to date is £82,263. No assessment of the adequacy of the assignment can be made until the final report has been received and considered.

Dr. Hendron: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the (a) elected representatives and (b) community activists whom PIEDA consultants consulted in drawing up their report into the proposed university of Ulster campus. [3183]

Mr. Moss: PIEDA consulted with three elected representatives from Belfast city council. They did not though consult any community groups as part of their assignment.

Inward Investment

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the firms from outside Northern Ireland which have made investments in Northern Ireland in (a) manufacturing industry (b) service industry and (c) for other purposes indicating where each firm's operations are located in Northern Ireland, the total investment made in respect of each firm and the amount of grant given from public funds to each firm, the percentage of the total investment this represents or as much of such information as is readily available to him for each of the last two years and the current year to the latest available date. [3469]

Mr. Ancram: Information on investments is not available in the form requested. Details are available for externally-owned companies which have accepted offers of selective financial assistance from the Industrial Development Board for manufacturing and tradeable services projects. They are set out in the tables.

Students

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what factors led to the increase in students attending institutions of higher education in the Republic of Ireland who were awarded maintenance grant by boards in Northern Ireland cited in his answer of 3 November 1995, Official Report, column 500; what was the cost for the most recent year for which figures are available; and what is his estimate of the growth of these numbers in 1996. [3542]

Mr. Ancram: Students from Northern Ireland can choose to study in the Republic of Ireland or any other country of the European Community. The increase in the number of students attending in the Republic of Ireland reflects this freedom of choice.

In the 1994–95 academic year some £2.2 million was expended by the education and library boards on means-tested maintenance and some £3.1 million on tuition fees in respect of those students.

The current estimate of the number of higher education students from Northern Ireland attending institutions in the Republic of Ireland in the 1995–96 academic year whose tuition fees will be paid by education and library boards is 2,000.

Irish Language

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of the population of Northern Ireland his Department estimates (a) have knowledge of and (b) regularly use the Irish language. [3532]

Sir John Wheeler: The 1991 census of population contains the most recent information on knowledge of the language. This indicates that 9.5 per cent. of those aged three and over had some ability in Irish. The 1991–92 continuous household survey shows that, of those people sampled who had some knowledge of the language, 1 per cent. of those aged 16 to 69 and 3 per cent. of those aged 3 to 15 used it in the home on a daily basis.

Agricultural Income

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the gross income for each sector of Northern Ireland agriculture in cash and constant prices for each of the last 10 years. [3461]

Mr. Ancram: Aggregate income estimates for each sector of agriculture are not available. The table provides details of total income from farming in Northern Ireland as a whole for each year from 1985 to 1994, in current prices and in real terms in index number form.

Total income from farming in Northern Ireland, 19685–1994

	Current prices £ million	Real terms (Index 1990 = 100)[1]
1985	116.1	115.3
1986	90.4	86.7
1987	146.0	134.6
1988	169.4	14[illegible]9
1989	192.0	156.4
1990	134.3	100.0
1991	176.8	124.3
1992	212.5	144.1
1993	248.3	165.8
1994	303.3	197.6

Labour Statistics

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the number of (a) full-time and (b) part-time employees in Northern Ireland in (i) manufacturing industry, (ii) the service industry and (iii) retailing in each of the last five years; and what his projections are for the next two years. [3457]

Mr. Ancram: The information available is as follows:

	Manufacturing		Services		Retail distribution
	Full-time	Part-time	Full-time	Part-time	Full-time	Part-time
March 1995	96,990	5,940	271,090	144,410	30,730	29,610
September 1994	97,430	5,920	270,430	139,050	31,040	28,380
September 1993	95,780	6,060	267,740	132,510	30,060	26,560
September 1991	99,390	5,450	266,590	119,320	30,390	23,680

No official projections of employment are made. Figures for September 1995 are not yet available. No figures are available for 1990.

Notes:

1. Figures are rounded to the nearest 10.

2. The full-time/part-time breakdown of employees in employment is available for each of the last three years from the Quarterly Employment Survey and prior to this on a biennial basis from the Census of Employment.

Housing

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will amend the Northern Ireland Housing Executive's selection criteria in non-priority cases to enable people who have recently moved from other parts of the United Kingdom to be eligible for housing earlier than in accordance with present residence requirement. [3537]

Mr. Moss: In June 1995 a working group was established comprising representatives from the Northern Ireland Department of the Environment and the Northern Ireland Housing Executive to review the Housing Executive's housing selection scheme and to make recommendations. It is planned to issue the group's findings and any proposed changes, for consultation, by the summer of 1996. It would be inappropriate to make changes to the present criteria pending the outcome of that review.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Irleand what returns the Housing Executive has made to the Inland Revenue over the last three financial years; and if he will list payments of housing benefit made to private landlords indicating how many different landlords were involved and how much benefit in total was specified. [3541]

Mr. Moss: The Northern Ireland Housing Executive has annually provided the Inland Revenue with details of all landlords in receipt of direct payments of housing benefit.

The exact number of landlords to whom direct payments have been made is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The estimated number of landlords and the actual amount of benefit paid in each of the last three years is as follows:

Year	Estimated number of landlords	Total payments made to landlords
1992–93	5,000	29,086,050.88
1993–94	5,500	36,234,396.67
1994–95	6,000	43,783,407.12

Claimant Travel Regulations

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the rules and declarations applying to those on unemployment benefit and/or income support who wish to travel within Northern Ireland or visit (a) Great Britain, (b) the Republic of Ireland and (c) another EU country; what assessments he has made of (a) the degree of compliance with and (b) the adequacy of the rules; and what proposals he has to change them. [3539]

Mr. Moss: Unemployed people claiming unemployment benefit and/or income support and travelling within Northern Ireland and Great Britain must remain available for work with an employer and take reasonable steps each week to find such work.

Generally, unemployment benefit and income support are not payable outside the United Kingdom and this applies to people visiting the Republic of Ireland as for other European Union countries. The only exception for unemployment benefit is that, under European Community law, benefit can continue to be paid for up to three months to unemployed nationals of a member state going to another member state specifically to seek work.

Certain people on income support who are not in the employment field may go outside the United Kingdom and retain their entitlement for up to four weeks.

All claimants are required to declare any relevant change of circumstances, including absence from their usual address.

There is no indication that the current rules are not being complied with or are inadequate. The same rules apply throughout the United Kingdom and there are no plans at present to change them.

Punishment Beatings

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many punishment beatings have occurred (a) in total and (b) in each month since the twin ceasefires; and how many have been committed by each side. [3533]

Sir John Wheeler: The total number of so-called punishment beatings carried out in the 14 months since 1 September 1994 is 223. The Royal Ulster Constabulary has attributed these to Republican and Loyalist groups as follows:

Month	Loyalist	Republican	Total
September 1994	1	8	9
October 1994
1–13	1	2	3
14–31	3	3	6
November 1994	5	7	12
December 1994	6	6	12
January 1995	6	10	16
February 1995	8	11	19
March 1995	3	7	10
April 1995	2	4	6
May 1995	12	14	26
June 1995	4	13	17
July 1995	11	18	29
August 1995	5	12	17
September 1995	4	12	16
October 1995	4	21	25
Total	75	148	223

Drainage Culverting

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the last 10 drainage culverting operations of his Department, indicating the criteria used for choosing those particular sites, the cost per metre and the results of the value for money assessment that was made. [3540]

Mr. Ancram: The last 10 drainage culverting operations of the Department of Agriculture are listed, together with the reason for the works and cost per metre. Culverting works are only undertaken on watercourses which have been designated by the Drainage Council for Northern Ireland and if they are necessary (a) for flood alleviation purposes, (b) to provide drainage infrastructure for new development, or (c) there are structural defects or hydraulic inefficiencies in existing culverts.

All projects are subject to environmental impact assessment and economic appraisal and are only undertaken if the assessed benefits to society exceed the cost of the works.

Watercourse name	Reason for works	Cost per metre £
1. Killyliss Drain, Dungannon	Structural defect in culvert	110
2. Berry Stream, Kilkeel	Infrastructure for new development	430
3. Urney Road Extension, Strabane	Infrastructure for new development	160
4. Bell's Hill Drain, Castledawson	Infrastructure for new development	500
5. Skeoge, Londonderry, Phase III scheme	Structural defect in culvert and infrastructure for new development	2,700
6. Jubilee Terrace, Coleraine	Infrastructure for new development	280
7. Blaney Millrace, Enniskillen	Flood alleviation	220
8. Doogary Drain, Omagh	Infrastructure for industrial development	200
9. Park Road, Strabane	Infrastructure for new development	250
10. Strangford Road, Downpatrick	Infrastructure for new development	820

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative (a) capital and (b) revenue costs to public funds (i) under the PFI and (ii) estimated to have been incurred had the scheme been funded wholly within the public sector. [3812]

Sir John Wheeler: No schemes under the private finance initiative, announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in November 1992, have been approved in Northern Ireland to date.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much capital expenditure is forecast to be included in the private finance initiative for the current financial year and the next five financial years. [3830]

Sir John Wheeler: It is estimated that the following amounts, rounded to the nearest £10 million, will be levered in from the private sector:

	£ million
1995–96	60
1996–97	50
1997–98	80
1998–99	80
1999–00	n/a
2000–01	n/a

The information for 1996–97 onwards is also published in the Financial Statement and Budget Report 1996–97.

TRANSPORT

Lorries

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many 41-tonne lorries have been licensed since 1 April. [3369]

Mr. Norris: The information specifically requested is not available. The closest equivalent information is that a total of 241 lorries with maximum revenue weight over 40 tonnes but not over 44 tonnes have been newly registered with the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency, in the period from 1 April to 30 September 1995.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the effect of the use of 41-tonne lorries on road bridges; and how many bridges currently need to be strengthened. [3371]

Mr. Watts: No assessment has been made of the use of 41-tonne lorries.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative the revenue commitment entered into by the Government for each year until the commitment ceases. [3417]

Mr. Watts: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to him on 6 December, column 277.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the policy changes which will arise from the final agreement in respect of each scheme agreed under the private finance initiative. [3418]

Mr. Watts: None.

Track Access Grant

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list details of the outstanding track access grant applications before him and state in respect of each (a) the date received and (b) when he expects to give his decision. [4076]

Mr. Watts: There are eight track access grant applications currently under consideration. They were received between November 1994 and July 1995. The details are commercially confidential.

We are seeking further material information from the applicants.

Mobile Telephones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many times mobile telephones used by Ministers in his Department have been cloned during (a) the last six months, (b) the last 12 months and (c) the last 18 months; and which Ministers within his Department have had their mobile telephones cloned. [4246]

Mr. Norris: None.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, how many mobile telephones there are available in his Department for the use of Ministers. [4273]

Mr. Norris: Seven including the mobile telephones fitted in the four official cars used by Ministers.

North-West Regional Railways Ltd.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the stations leased by other operators from which North West Regional Railways Ltd. is to buy access, indicating the annual cost. [3951]

Mr. Watts: North West Regional Railways purchases access from other operators at the following stations:

Station	Operator

Charter of Court Users

Mr. Loyden: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many complaints he has received against judges (a) in total and (b) for not complying with the charter for court users in the last five years in (i) the north-west as a whole and (ii) in the Merseyside area; and if he will make a statement. [3975]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: This information is not available in the form requested. Records relating to complaints received centrally about the personal conduct of judges have been kept only since March 1992. Since that date, 62 such complaints regarding judges sitting on the northern circuit have been received. Information on complaints relating to judicial decisions is held by the Court Service, which has received centrally 297 such complaints since it was established on 1 April 1995. Information on complaints relating to judicial decisions broken down on a regional basis could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

The charter for court users, which came into effect on 1 September 1995, sets out the standards court users can expect from the administration of the Court Service. It does not therefore apply to the work of the judiciary.

Mr. Loyden: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what arrangements are made to ensure that judges comply with the charter for court users. [3976]

Mr. Evans: The question concerns a specific operational matter on which the chief executive of the Court Service is best placed to provide an answer and I have accordingly asked the chief executive to reply direct.

Letter from M. D. Huebner to Mr. Eddie Loyden, dated 7 December 1995:

The Parliamentary Secretary has asked me to reply to your Question about the judiciary and the Charter for Court Users.

The Charter for Court Users sets out the standards court users can expect from the administration of the Court Service. It does not therefore apply to the work of the judiciary.

Judiciary (Ethnic Origin)

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many members of the judiciary in England and Wales were from an ethnic minority in (a) 1989 and (b) 1995. [3652]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The ethnic origin of candidates for judicial appointment was not collected prior to autumn 1991, so the available information may not be complete. There are no readily available records for 1989. The earliest readily available and current figures for full-time and part-time judiciary are set out in the table.

Magistrates Courts

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what was the total staff establishment of magistrates courts in England and Wales by grade; and how many (a) in total and (b) in each grade were from an ethnic minority in (i) 1989 and (ii) 1995. [3614]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Returns from 104 of the 105 magistrates courts committees in England and Wales showed that in 1995 there was a total of 11,083 staff, of whom 436 declared they were from an ethnic minority. A breakdown by grade is in the table.

There are no figures available for 1989. There was no requirement to keep such figures at that time.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 7 December. [3228]

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 7 December. [3230]

The Prime Minister: This morning, I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Australian Aboriginal Artifacts

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Prime Minister what representations Her Majesty's Government have received since 1980 for assistance from the Government of Australia or the state government of Western Australia or any of their agencies, in respect of the alleged removal, contrary to Australian law, of aboriginal artifacts from or through the Broome area of Western Australia; what action was subsequently taken in response to each request; and if he will make a statement. [4180]

The Prime Minister: As far as I am aware, none. Further examination of the government archives could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Dr. Alfred Hartmann

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Prime Minister whether, on what occasion and for what purpose, he or his predecessor Baroness Thatcher has met Dr. Alfred Hartmann. [4528]

The Prime Minister: I do not recall having met Dr. Hartmann, nor am I aware of any meeting between my predecessor and Dr. Hartmann.

Ministers

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the number of Ministers by rank in each Department of State, excluding law officers; and if he will provide the corresponding figures for the outgoing Government in 1965. [4751]

The Prime Minister: This is a matter of public record.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister how many Ministers are in the Department of Trade and Industry now and how many were in the then Board of Trade in 1965; what are the numbers of officials in the Department by rank from assistant secretary upwards in 1979 and at the present time; and what plans he has for reducing the number of Ministers in the Department. [4752]

The Prime Minister: This is a matter of public record. I have no intention of reducing the number of Ministers in the Department of Trade and Industry.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list those occasions on which his predecessor notified the Crown between 1979 and 1990 of her intention to visit Switzerland. [4560]

The Prime Minister: In accordance with "Questions of Procedures for Ministers", it is normal practice for all Cabinet Ministers to notify the Crown of their intention to make an official foreign visit.

TREASURY

Taxation (Cigarettes)

Ms Harman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the tax revenues raised in each of the last five years from the illegal sale of cigarettes to children. [3776]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 4 December 1995]: Data on smoking prevalence among schoolchildren are available from surveys conducted by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys in four years since 1990. The sample size for each survey is very small, so estimates for individual years are considered unreliable. Combining the results of the four surveys gives a best estimate of the order of £100 million raised per year in excise duty and VAT from sales of cigarettes to children under 16 or smoked by such children but purchased legally by others.

Consultants

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list those (a) consultants, (b) outside organisations and (c) individuals employed by his Department in each year since 1990, indicating the purposes of their employment and the total payments made to them. [3954]

Mrs. Angela Knight: For (a) consultants and (b) outside organisations, those employed by the Department since 1992 with total contract value which are given in a table which I am placing in the Members' Library. To obtain information before 1992 on actual payments made and to give the purpose of employment in each case would entail disproportionate cost.

With regard to (c), the total number of staff employed in the Treasury and their cost can be found in the civil service staff in post summary tables which are also available in the Library. It would entail disproportionate cost to list the purposes of employment, but staff are employed to meet the aim and objectives of the Treasury. These are set out in the departmental report which is in the Library.

Tax Legislation (Revision)

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what consultation he plans in respect of his proposed revision of the wording of the technical tax law; and if this review will cover all existing tax laws. [3684]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 7 December 1995]: The proposal to rewrite existing tax legislation, which my right hon. and learned Friend announced in his Budget, would proceed on the basis of full consultation with the representative bodies and taxpayers generally. It would cover most of the primary legislation on Inland Revenue taxes.

Further details of this rewritten proposal will be given in the Inland Revenue's report under section 160 of the Finance Act 1995, which we hope to lay before Parliament on 12 December 1995, and in its background paper that will be published on the same day.

Earnings

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of workers on adult rates currently earn less than (a) £2.50, (b) £3, (c) £3.50, (d) £4, (e) £4.50 (f) £5, (g) £5.50 and (h) more than £6 per hour, including and excluding overtime in (i) the east midlands and (ii) the United Kingdom. [4072]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 6 December 1995]: Information available from the new earnings survey is provided in the table.

Hourly earnings, all employees on adult rates pay not affected by absence: April 1995

	Percentage earning
	East Midlands	Great Britain
Including overtime
<£2.50	1.5	1.6
<£3.00	3.6	3.3
<£3.50	10.2	8.7
<£4.00	19.0	15.8
<£4.50	27.5	23.1
<£5.00	35.0	30.4
<£5.50	43.2	37.7
<£6.00	49.1	55.4
Excluding overtime

<£3.00	3.8	3.4
<£3.50	10.7	9.1
<£4.00	19.9	16.5
<£4.50	29.0	24.2
<£5.00	36.4	31.4
<£5.50	44.6	38.8
<£6.00	47.7	54.3

Valuation Office (Stockport)

Ms Coffey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will provide information on who has been consulted about the proposed closure of the valuation office in Stockport; [4286]

(2) when he expects the consultation on the proposed closure of the valuation office in Stockport to be completed; [4284]

(3) if he will make available the responses to the consultation on the proposed closure of the valuation office in Stockport. [4285]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 6 December 1995]: Consultation has recently commenced with members of staff and their trades unions and will also be conducted with national representatives of the valuation profession and other bodies with an interest in the future of the Valuation Office review.

Consultation is expected to be completed by summer 1996 and the outcome announced in due course.

Mobile Telephones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many times mobile telephones used by Ministers in his Department have been cloned during (a) the last six months, (b) the last 12 months and (c) the last 18 months; and which Ministers within his Department have had their mobile telephones cloned. [4250]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 6 December 1995]: A total of four mobile telephones belonging to Treasury Ministers have been cloned during the past 12 months of which two were cloned within the last six months. No Treasury Ministers' mobile telephones were cloned beyond 12 months ago. The Chief Secretary has had his mobile telephones cloned three times and the Economic Secretary once.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many mobile telephones there are available in his Department for the use of Ministers. [4249]

Mrs. Knight: There are 12 mobile telephones available for use by Treasury Ministers and their private offices.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the policy changes which will arise from the final agreement in respect of each scheme agreed under the private finance initiative. [3422]

Mr. Jack: The agreement of schemes under the private finance initiative does not result in changes to the policy of the Government on the PFI. Agreed schemes do, however, represent the application of PFI policy and offer us the opportunity to refine further the process of implementation. The lessons so far are most recently set out in the publication "Private Opportunity, Public Benefit". This is published jointly by HM Treasury and the private finance panel, and a copy has been placed in the Members' Library.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative the revenue commitment entered into by the Government for each year until the commitment ceases. [3421]

Mr. Jack: Information on forward commitments, including those in respect of schemes under the private finance initiative, is held by Departments. Payments for service procurement through PFI schemes are taken into account as part of Departments' current costs in their overall spending plans; those for the next three years are published in the "Financial Statement and Budget Report, 1996–97", laid before Parliament on 28 November 1995.

Church Commissioners' Accounts

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the instructions which have been given to Binder Hamlyn on the nature and the manner of the audit it should carry out on the Church Commissioners' accounts. [4589]

Mr. Jack: The letter of engagement between Binder Hamlyn and the Church Commissioners has not yet been finalised, but I will write to the hon. Member once this has been done and the Treasury has approved the arrangements.

Public Sector Financial Balances

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the predicted and actual public sector financial deficit or surplus for each financial year since 1979. [4329]

Mr. Waldegrave: Forecasts of the public sector financial balances are published in the "Financial Statement and Budget Report". Outturns of the public sector financial balance are available from the Central Statistical Office databank, series AABE.

Finance Bill

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Finance Bill will be published; and if he will make available to hon. Members the customary notes on the Bill's clauses. [5078]

Mr. Jack: The Finance Bill will be published on Thursday 4 January 1996. The notes on the Bill's clauses will be placed in the Vote Office and the Libraries of the House that day. In addition, the Treasury will be making the notes available to the public.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Clock Tower

Sir Harold Walker: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee what estimate has been made of the angle at which the clock tower of the Palace of Westminster varies from the perpendicular; and what variation has occurred over the last 20 years. [3797]

Mr. Ray Powell: The Accommodation and Works Committee has a specialist adviser on geotechnical engineering whose brief includes advising the Committee on the adequacy of London Underground's arrangements to prevent damage to the Palace of Westminster and other parliamentary buildings during the construction of Westminster underground station and the Jubilee line extension. The Parliamentary Works Directorate also employs an independent firm of surveyors to monitor many movements of the Clock Tower.

The advice from both these sources is that London Underground Ltd., is taking appropriate and sufficient measures to control any damaging movements caused by excavation work for the Jubilee line extension project. The clock tower currently slopes from the vertical by approximately 1 in 4,000 and is affected by Thames tidal movement and changes in ambient temperature.

Video Conferencing

Mr. Flynn: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, representing the House of Commons Commission, what assessment has been made or is planned in respect of possible reduction of the costs of overseas visits by the Select Committees through the use of video conferenicng. [4179]

Mr. Beith: Select Committees have used video conferencing as a means of gathering evidence on two occasions on an experimental basis. The matter has already been reported on by the Procedure Committee and the arrangements for, and cost of, video conferencing as a means of taking evidence are currently under review by the Liaison Committee; other domestic Committees may wish to be consulted. It is therefore too early to judge what part video conferencing could play in evidence gathering by Select Committees or any effects which its adoption might have on expenditure on overseas visits.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Space Policy

Sir Michael Marshall: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what progress has been made with the proposal made at the United Kingdom space policy seminar at Surrey university in September for publication of a space policy document. [4802]

Mr. Ian Taylor: Yesterday I issued a discussion document on United Kingdom space policy and I am inviting comments.

The documents examines UK strengths and opportunities in space science, telecommunications, earth observation and launchers. It looks at projects in the European Space Agency and other international organisations. My aim is to bring together the results of this consultation exercise, with more detailed work being carried out at the British national space centre in discussion with industry and the academic world, in the form of a forward plan for UK involvement in space activities by next summer.

Copies of the discussion document are being placed in the Library of the House and I am sending a copy to each participant at the Surrey seminar.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative the revenue commitment entered into by the Government for each year until the commitment ceases. [3419]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Although my Department has a number of PFI projects under consideration, none has been finally agreed and no revenue commitments have been made.

Mr. Betts: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the policy changes which will arise from the final agreement in respect of each scheme agreed under the private finance initiative. [3420]

Mr. Taylor: The agreement of schemes under the private finance initiative within my Department will not result in changes to policy on the PFI, which have been set out by the Government. Those schemes that have been agreed, however, represent the application of PFI policy and the lessons learned are set out in the publication "Private Opportunity, Public Benefit". This is published jointly by HM Treasury and the private finance panel, and a copy is available in the Library of the House.

Anti-tank Mines

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what export control procedures apply to (i) the export of anti-tank mines without self-destruct mechanism or (ii) the export of remote delivery systems for anti-tank mines. [4324]

Mr. Oppenheim: The export of all anti-tank mines and related equipment and accessories is controlled under the Export of Goods (Control) Order. Such goods cannot be exported without a licence from the Department of Trade and Industry issued after consultation within Government. Any applications for an export licence for such equipment would be considered against strict established criteria on a case-by-case basis in line with our international commitments.

Libya (UN Sanctions)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the impact on British (a) trade and (b) industry of the United Nations sanctions against Libya; and if he will place in the Library the information passed by his Department relating to evasion of sanctions by Belgium, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, South Korea and Spain. [2890]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 6 December 1995]: The United Nations sanctions against Libya are selective. They prohibit in particular supply and export of arms, aviation supplies and certain oil industry equipment in which the United Kingdom is strongly competitive. It is not possible to say what is the precise effect of the sanctions on UK trade and industry, but one sign of the resilience of our trading position is that exports to Libya in 1995 will exceed £200 million.

My Department has passed no information to the UN sanctions committee, the body responsible for co-ordinating matters including evasion of sanctions.

Mobile Telephones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many mobile telephones there are available in his Department for the use of Ministers. [4267]

Mr. Lang: There are 14 mobile telephones available in the DTI for the use of Ministers and their private offices. In addition, each ministerial car is fitted with a cellular telephone.

Bankruptcy

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the policy of his Department in respect of making grants available to companies where directors have had previous bankruptcies. [2304]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 27 November 1995]: Where a director of a company applying for a grant from the Department is known to have previously been bankrupt but is now discharged or has been given permission by the bankruptcy court to be a director, this would not automatically rule out acceptance of the grant application but it is a factor that would be taken into account in considering the viability and probity of the applicant company. Where a director was found to be an undischarged bankrupt who was not entitled to be a director of a company, this would be grounds for considering prosecution of the director and would be likely to lead to rejection of the company's grant application.

Rom Data Corporation

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what was the purpose of the meeting between an official of his Department and Mr. Brad Shephard on 29 October 1993; and if he will make a statement about the outcome of this meeting; [2384]

(2) by which hon. Members, and on what dates, his Department was contacted about the Rom Data Corporation, Falmouth; [2299]

(3) if he will make a statement about the results of his inquiries into the background of the directors of the Rom Data Corporation, Falmouth, before he made a grant to them; and if those inquiries revealed evidence of former bankruptcies of any of the directors; [2301]

(4) what information about the financial history of Mr. John Dawson was revealed by his inquiries into the directors of the Rom Data Corporation; [2305]

(5) what action he has taken against the directors of the Rom Data Corporation, Falmouth; and if he will make a statement. [2300]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 27 November 1995]: As indicated in my reply of 7 November 1995, Official Report, column 711, the Department is currently conducting inquiries into the circumstances of the regional selective assistance given to the Rom Data Corporation. I will report when these are completed.

Business Start-ups

Mr. Macshane: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the number of new businesses started up by year and region since 1990. [4709]

Mr. Page: The best indicator of regional trends in business start-ups is given by figures on VAT registrations. Annual numbers of registrations for 1990 to 1994 are given in the table.

VAT registrations 1990–94

Following the threshold change in 1991, figures for 1992 to 1994 are not comparable with the figures for earlier years.

ISCT Ltd.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what inquiry his Department has initiated or plans concerning the activities of any directors of the Ferranti-ISC subsidiary ISCT Ltd.; and what action his Department has taken as a result. [5619]

Mr. Oppenheim: ISC Technologies Ltd. went into administrative receivership on 1 December 1993. Returns under the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986 were submitted by the administrative receivers on 25 May 1994.

No disqualification proceedings or other action has been taken or is proposed by the Department on present information.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he has taken to initiate disqualification proceedings against former directors of the Ferranti-ISC subsidiary ISCT Ltd. through which the fraud against that parent company was perpetrated; and if he will make a statement. [4358]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 6 December 1995]: ISC Technologies Ltd. went into administrative receivership on 1 December 1993. Returns under the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986 were submitted by the administrative receivers on 25 May 1994.

No disqualification proceedings have been taken or are proposed by the Department.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, what inquiries he has initiated regarding the position of beneficiaries of the pension fund of the former Ferranti-ISC fund; what action he has taken to protect the position of the beneficiaries; and if he will make a statement. [4359]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 6 December 1995]: The assets of the Ferranti-ISC group of companies are being dealt with by joint administrative receivers, without the involvement of the Department, who report that after payment in full of the preferential creditors and the banks' claims as first ranking secured creditors, a payment to the pension fund on account of its second ranking secured claim for £15 million may be possible. The major part of the pension fund is not affected by the receivership and is protected for its beneficiaries.

Newerthill

Mr. Meacher: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations or inquiries he has received from the Government of Australia or any of its agencies, or from any Australian state authority or agency about the activities of the United Kingdom registered company Newerthill or any of its subsidiaries; and if he will make a statement. [4245]

Mr. Nelson: There is no United Kingdom registered company with the name Newerthill. We have received no representation or inquiries about Newerthill or any other similarly named company to which the question might possibly relate.

Exports (Iraq)

Mr. Meacher: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, what inquiries he has caused to be made into whether the Export Credits Guarantee Department issued guarantees to financial institutions resident in the United Kingdom possibly involved in financial trade with Iraq contrary to the Government's guidelines; what were the results of such inquiries; and what subsequent action he has taken or proposes to take. [4244]

Mr. Nelson: I know of no such cases.

Trade Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade for what reasons he does not publish figures for United Kingdom share of main manufacturing countries exports in table D1 of the "Monthly Review of External Trade Statistic", and if he will (a) publish up to date figures in the Official Report and (b) include the figures in future editions of the MRETS.

Mr. John M Taylor: The series were temproarily discontinued when MRETS was suspended, following introduction of Intrastate, during 1993–94. With the rebasing of United Kingdom volume series using 1990 weights it is necessary to rebase the volume of manufactured exports for the main manufacturing countries as a whole. This work is continuing and the series will be reinstated as soon as possible.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his estimate of the share of the domestic market taken by (a) imported manufactured goods and (b) imported services for each year since 1975. [4401]

Mr. Nelson: Consistent information for each year since 1975 is not available. The following estimates are derived from input-output tables which were published every five years prior to 1989.

Imports as a percentage of home demand

Year	Manufacturing industry	Services
1974	23.7	7.2
1979	25.3	6.1
1984	31.7	6.2
1989	36.0	3.9
1990	36.4	3.7
1991	35.8	3.4
1992	37.6	3.3
1993	40.4	3.3

The 1992 standard industrial classification has changed the definition of manufacturing industry. The new definition includes the manufacture of coke ovens, mineral oil processing and nuclear fuel processing and excludes mining and quarrying of materials other than coal. The table takes account of these major changes but there may still be some definitional differences between 1992 and earlier figures.

The figures only include direct trade. Services provided locally as a result of overseas direct investment are not included in these figures.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what considerations led him to cease publication of figures for United Kingdom export unit values for manufactures which have been published in table 2.15 of "Economic Trends" after the third quarter of 1994. [4557]

Mr. Oppenheim: The publication of UK export unit values of manufactures has not been discontinued. Table 2.15 of the November "Economic Trends" contains figures up to the first quarter of 1995, the latest quarter for which unit value indices based on $US denominated exports are available from the International Monetary Fund.

Redundancies

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has for redundancies in his Department. [3708]

Mr. Lang: The outcome of the public expenditure survey for the running costs of my Department means that to help to achieve the required rundown in staff numbers a voluntary early retirement-severance scheme is being launched immediately.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish the (a) written and (b) oral evidence given by Her Majesty's Government to the International Court of Justice in respect of the legality of nuclear weapons. [3986]

Mr. David Davis: The International Court of Justice decided on 30 October that submissions in respect of the nuclear weapons advisory opinions should be open to the public. Accordingly, copies of our written and oral statements have been placed in the Library of the House.

Foreign Affairs Council

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Foreign Affairs Council on 4 and 5 December. [5284]

Mr. David Davis: The A points listed in document 12202/95—which will be deposited in the Libraries of the House as soon as it is available—were adopted except for item 24 which was withdrawn by presidency.

The Council took note of the European Parliament resolutions in document 11507/95 PE-RE-79. A copy of this document will be deposited in the Libraries of the House as soon as it is available.

The Council agreed that the presidency should write to the Prime Minister of Estonia confirming receipt of that country's application for membership of the European Union.

The Council discussed preparations for the European Council at Madrid.

The Council agreed that the conference on economic assistance to the Palestinians should be postponed to 9 January.

The Council discussed the draft MEDA regulation, covering aid to countries in the Mediterranean region.

The Commission presented a recommendation for a Council decision on renewal of the San Jose dialogue between the EU and central America. This was remitted to the Committee of Permanent Representatives for further discussion.

The Council confirmed that the Commission should continue to negotiate a new agreement with Switzerland on the basis of its existing mandate.

The Council adopted conclusions on former Yugoslavia and agreed on the appointment of a deputy to Mr. Bildt in Sarajevo. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary and the Foreign Ministers of France and of Germany briefed the Council on the forthcoming London, Paris and Bonn conferences.

The Council adopted a further common position on Nigeria, covering measures additional to those in the common position of 20 November. The new common position provides for further visa restrictions, the expulsion of military personnel in Nigerian diplomatic missions in the EU and interruption of sporting contacts. The Council undertook to consider further measures in the absence of progress in Nigeria.

The Council discussed a draft mandate for a trade and co-operation agreement with South Africa.

The Council discussed the draft new technical assistance to the Commmonwealth of Independent States—TACIS—regulation but agreed to defer further consideration until the Italian presidency.

The Council agreed a position paper on the March 1996 Asia/Europe meeting to be used as a basis for EU discussion with the Asian side in the run-up to the meeting.

The Council approved conclusions endorsing the broad lines of the Commission's communication on long-term relations between the EU and China.

The Council gave its political approval, by qualified majority, to a deal negotiated with the US, Canada and Australia on compensation—as required by article XXIV.6—of the general agreement on tariffs and trade for tariff increases resulting from EU enlargement.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative the revenue commitment entered into by the Government for each year until the commitment ceases. [3395]

Mr. Hanley: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 7 November 1995, Official Report, column 694.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the policy changes which will arise from the final agreement in respect of each scheme agreed under the private finance initiative. [3396]

Mr. Hanley: The agreement of schemes under the private finance initiative does not result in changes to the policy of the Government on the PFI. Agreed schemes do, however, represent the application of PFI policy and offer us the opportunity further to refine the process of implementation. The lessons learned are set out in the publication "Private Opportunity, Public Benefit". This is published jointly by HM Treasury and the private finance panel, and a copy is available in the Members' Library.

Mobile Telephones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many mobile telephones there are available in his Department for the use of Ministers. [4265]

Mr. Hanley: The Department has four mobile telephones and four car telephones exclusively for the use of Ministers.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many times mobile telephones used by Ministers in his Department have been cloned during (a) the last six months, (b) the last 12 months and (c) the last 18 months; and which Ministers within his Department have had their mobile telephones cloned. [4266]

Mr. Hanley: The then Minister of State, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Grantham, (Mr. Hogg), has his car telephone cloned twice: in October 1994 and June 1995. New numbers were allocated on both occasions.

A programme is under way to replace Ministers' analogue telephones with digital units which will reduce the risk of cloning.

BBC World Service

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the change in real terms since 1994–95 to his Office's funding to the BBC World Service. [4739]

Mr. Hanley: Foreign and Commonwealth Office funding to the BBC World Service through grant in aid decreased in real terms by 0.67 per cent. between 1994–95 and 1995–96.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what restrictions apply to the award of sponsorship rights to potential participants in any use of the private finance initiative of the BBC World Service; [4756]

(2) what plans he has to allow the BBC World Service to take (a) advertising or (b) finance from overseas Governments or agencies. [4757]

Mr. Hanley: Under the terms of its current licence and agreement, the BBC is prohibited from broadcasting sponsored programmes. It would also need to seek agreement to accept advertising from any source or take finance from overseas Governments or agencies. Subject to the overriding requirements of safeguarding its impartiality, we would look at any proposals the World Service might make constructively, bearing in mind the increasing use of local rebroadcasting partnerships to reach audiences more effectively.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of the BBC World Service's capital budget the reduction in funding announced on 28 November represents. [4755]

Mr. Hanley: The reduction in funding for 1996–97 amounts to 19.3 per cent. of the World Service's capital budget, but this takes no account of the opportunities presented by the private finance initiative.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what discussions he has had with the BBC World Service as to which transmitters will be affected by the reduction in the funding of the BBC World Service; and to what extent; [4763]

(2) to what extent the private finance initiative can be applied to overseas projects of the BBC World Service; [4759]

(3) what consultations he has had about the consequences of the reduction in the BBC World Service's budget; [4754]

(4) what monitoring he has carried out as to the effect on programme services of the reduction in funding to the BBC World Service; with what result; and if he will make a statement; [4762]

(5) if the private finance initiative will be applied to improvements in existing projects of the BBC World Service; [4758]

(6) what recommendations he has made to the BBC World Service as to the areas of transmission in which economies should be made. [4760]

Mr. Hanley: We hold regular discussions with the BBC World Service, about its plans and priorities. I shall be meeting the managing director of the World Service shortly. Detailed talks on funding for the next three-year period will start in the New Year.

It is for the World Service to judge the best deployment of transmitters. Audibility has been vastly improved as a result of a £166 million investment programme. A further new relay station is being built in Thailand at a cost of £29 million.

The private finance initiative offers the World Service opportunity to involve private sector finance and expertise and may, in principle, be applied to projects overseas as well as in the United Kingdom. Projects which are already contractually committed are not affected.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what propoition of the BBC World Service budget for transmitters and satellite distribution is already contractually committed. [4761]

Mr. Hanley: Over 70 per cent. of the BBC World Service's capital budget for 1995–96, and all of the operating budget line, for transmitter and satellite distribution is already contractually committed.

Guatemala

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy that no training will be offered by the United Kingdom to Guatemalan police officers until the peace process has been fully implemented in Guatemala. [4520]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: No. Our limited assistance to the Guatemalan police is designed to encourage high standards, including proper respect for human rights.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Guatemalan Government about the human rights situation in Guatemala with particular reference to the latest report of the United Nations human rights verification mission, MINUGUA. [4521]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: As I informed the House on 19 October, Official Report, columns 305–306, the British ambassador in Guatemala takes every appropriate opportunity to express to the authorities our concerns about human rights abuses, including problems identified in MINUGUA's third report to the UN Secretary-General.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Guatemalan Government to ensure that the trial of the Guatemalan soldiers accused of the massacre of former refugees in Xaman on 5 October is carried out in a fair and proper judicial manner. [4522]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: In its statement on 12 October the European Union called for the punishment of those guilty of the massacre and expressed support for the measures announced by President de Leon Carpio to deal with the incident. The Guatemalan authorities are well aware of the need for a proper trial of those accused.

European Monetary Union

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current status of the economy of each member state of the EC in relation to each of the convergence criteria for European monetary union in the Maastricht treaty. [160]

Mrs. Angela Knight: I have been asked to reply.

The question of which countries fulfil the necessary conditions for adoption of the single currency will be decided by the Council, meeting in the form of Heads of State or of Government. The latest Commission forecasts, released on 22 November 1995, provide information on the current status of each member state. The forecasts are available in the House of Commons Library.

DEFENCE

Anti-tank Mines

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of anti-tank mines (a) possessed by or (b) in the process of being procured by the United Kingdom armed forces have self-destruct mechanisms. [4315]

Mr. Arbuthnot: All anti-tank mines in service with the multiple launch rocket system phase II and JP233 will self-destruct after a pre-set time, once deployed. No other in-service anti-tank mines have self-destruct mechanisms. It is our established policy, for security reasons, not to reveal information relating to stock levels of munitions held.

I recently announced on 29 November 1995, Official Report, column 768, our intention to purchase a vehicle-launched scatterable mine system. All the mines to be procured for VLSMS will have a self-destruct mechanism. We are currently procuring any other anti-tank mines.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the UK possess the means remotely to deliver anti-tank mines; and if the MLRS system is equipped remotely to deliver anti-tank mines. [4325]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Yes. Both the multiple launch rocket system phase II and JP233 are capable of delivering anti-tank mines remotely. I recently announced on 29 November 1995, Official Report, column 768, our intention to purchase a vehicle-launched scatterable mine system, which will also be capable of delivering anti-tank mines remotely. All these systems utilise mines which self-destruct after a short laid life.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative (a) capital and (b) revenue costs to public funds (i) under the PFI and (ii) estimated to have been incurred had the scheme been funded wholly within the public sector. [3818]

Mr. Arbuthnot [holding answer 6 December 1995]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to him on 7 November 1995, Official Report, column 666.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the policy changes which will arise from the final agreement in respect of each scheme agreed under the private finance initiative. [3414]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The Government's defence policy is as stated in the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1995", Cm 2800.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative the revenue commitment entered into by the Government for each year until the commitment ceases. [3413]

Mr. Arbuthnot: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to him on 7 November, Official Report, column 666.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much capital expenditure is forecast to be included in the private finance initiative for the current financial year and the next five financial years. [3823]

Mr. Arbuthnot [holding answer 6 December 1995]: Capital expenditure on the PFI commitments in 1995–96 is forecast to be nil. Figures for later years are published in table 6.5 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report 1996–97". Projections are not currently available for years beyond 1998–89.

Merchant Vessels

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the name of every merchant vessel and its country of registration chartered by his Department for (a) exercises and (b) military support and re-supply operations since the beginning of 1995. [4579]

Mr. Soames: The information requested is as follows:

Territorial Army

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has made of the number of members of the Territorial Army who will be called up to serve (a) as part of the implementation force in Bosnia and (b) elsewhere in the next months. [4569]

Mr. Soames: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 6 December 1995, Official Report, column 244.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what tasks are to be assigned to members of the Territorial Army as part of the implementation force in Bosnia. [4570]

Mr. Soames: Most members of the Territorial Army and Army reserve who are being called out to serve with the implementation force will fill war establishment posts in regular army units, primarily headquarters and signal units, military police companies and logistics units

Fire Training Establishments

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list all his Department's fire training establishments in the United Kingdom; how many (a) military and (b) civilian personnel are currently (i) employed and (ii) being trained at these establishments giving the duration of the training; and what have been (1) the average running costs and (2) the annual maintenance costs of each establishment in each of the last five years. [4170]

Mr. Soames: The Department's only single role fire training establishment is the MOD fire service central training establishment at RAF Manston, where there are 27 civilian and 23 military established posts. The number of personnel being trained depends on which courses are being run; this year's figures show that there have been 834 civilian and 326 military students, and since the CTE was reorganised in 1991, 3,728 civilians and 1,230 military personnel have attended courses there. The duration will depend on the course, of which there are some 20, covering every aspect of fire training. The MOD FSCTE is a lodger unit at RAF Manston, thus disaggregating the running and maintenance costs for the centre from the overall station costs can be done only at disproportionate cost.

The Department also has other training establishments where fire training can be part of the course structure. These are the school of flight deck operations at the royal naval air station Culdrose; the nuclear biological and chemical defence school at HMS Excellent; the Plymouth command NBCD school at HMS Raleigh; and the school of logistics, royal logistics training group at Deepcut. Additionally, some MOD personnel attend specialist fire safety courses at such training centres as the Home Office school at Moreton-in-Marsh.

Where active fire cover is provided at MOD establishments, facilities for continuation training are provided. Moreover, the MOD has task training integrated across the board. All military and civilian personnel are given the appropriate fire fighting training as part of the Department's duty of care.

Theft

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the cost to his Department of theft by (a) military personnel and (b) civilian personnel in each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement. [4564]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The figures are as follows:

Year	Theft by service personnel £000s	Theft by civilians £000s
1985–86	125.2	49.0
1986–87	0.0	0.0
1987–88	24.1	222.1
1988–89	0.0	150.0
1989–90	0.0	19.7
1990–91	2.0	581.8
1991–92	4.3	0.0
1992–93	1.4	39.0
1993–94	183.8	126.7
1994–95	35.5	272.7

These figures are expressed in gross terms and they make no allowance for subsequent recoveries.

There are wide fluctuations from year to year and no obvious trend, but we are far from complacent and have taken a range of preventive measures.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) military personnel and (b) civilian personnel have been (i) charged and (ii) found guilty of theft in his Department in each of the last five years. [4566]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The information is in the table.

	Service		Civilian
Year	Charged	Guilty	Charged	Guilty
1990–91	10	10	10	10
1991–92	3	3	0	0
1992–93	1	1	9	3
1993–94	11	5	18	11
1994–95	9	7	28	19

Court Martial System

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are his proposals for the reform of the court martial system. [5077]

Mr. Soames: We have undertaken a review of the court martial system as part of our preparations for the Armed Forces Bill which was introduced recently.

As a result, we are including in the Bill proposals to reform aspects of the court martial system, while enabling it to continue to meet the armed forces' requirement to administer discipline firmly but fairly. I am today putting a note setting out the detail of these proposals in the Library, and copies will be available in the Vote Office. The main features of the changes are as follows: there will be changes in the formal part played in court martial proceedings by the military chain of command. Its functions, such as settling charges, responsibility for the prosecution and appointing court martial members, will remain in the services but generally be independent of the chain of command; there will be an enhancement of the part played at court martial by the judge advocate, who is similar in many ways to a judge in a civilian court; the right for defendants to choose to have their cases tried by court martial, rather than dealt with summarily by the commanding officer, will be extended; access to the courts martial appeal court, which is composed of senior civilian judges, will be extended, to enable it to hear appeals against sentence as well as against conviction.

This last proposal is already included in the Armed Forces Bill. Amendments to the Bill to address the other proposals which require legislation will be tabled shortly.

The court martial system has served the services very well over the years. We believe that the proposals represent a major improvement to the present system and will enable it to continue to fulfil its purpose for a long time to come.

Defence Contracts

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the contracts that his Department has with (a) Junghans, (b) Borletti and (c) Raufoss over the last five years; and if these companies are permitted to bid for current procurement contracts. [3865]

Mr. Arbuthnot [holding answer 5 December 1995]: As my predecessor stated on 23 November 1993, Official Report, column 309, and as has been confirmed on several occasions since, my Department will not be placing any new contracts with the firms concerned until all the facts relating to the Foxley case have been fully investigated. Details of contracts placed with Raufoss and Junghans in the last five years are given below. All these contracts have been completed. No contracts have been placed with Borletti in the last five years, but one contract has been placed with the division of Fiat which acquired Borletti's interests. This contract is due to complete in 1996.

Company	Store	Date	Value (£000s)
Raufoss	27mm Ammo	7 January 1991	233

Junghans	Fuze L127A3	2 October 1992	589
Fiat (Borletti Division)	Fuze L85A2	20 March 1991	2,088

Defence Medical Services

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place in the Library copies of all the submissions received from the Department of Health, NHS executive, health authorities and NHS trusts in response to the "Front Line First" proposed changes to defence medical services. [4462]

Mr. Soames: Three formal submissions were received from the NHS in response to the defence costs study 15 consultative document. Copies of these submissions will be placed in the Library of the House.

Rosyth Naval Base

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on negotiations on the sale of Rosyth naval base to Rosyth 2000; and if he will ensure that commercial operations will be in place from 1 January 1996. [3647]

Mr. Arbuthnot [holding answer 6 December 1995]: Negotiations with the preferred bidder, Rosyth 2000 Ltd., a consortium of leading Scottish businesses, are under way. Commercial operations on a small scale are likely to be developed from 1 January 1996, with an anticipated date of transfer from military to civilian use on 31 March 1996.

Mr. Fouad Uzzourni

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what occasions since 1980 Ministers or officials of his Department have met Mr. Fouad Uzzourni since 1980; and what was the purpose of the meetings. [4191]

Mr. Arbuthnot: I am not aware of Ministers or officials in my Department having met a Mr. Fouad Uzzourni.

Mobile Telephones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many mobile telephones there are available in his Department for the use of Ministers. [4274]

Mr. Soames: There are nine digital global systems for mobile communications mobile telephones in the Ministry of Defence which may be used by Ministers.

Army (Establishment)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many members of (a) the Gurkhas and (b) the Royal Irish Regiment are included in the figure given for the strength of the Army on paragraph 507 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1995". [4574]

Mr. Soames: The figure included some 4,000 Gurkhas and 850 general service personnel of the Royal Irish Regiment. It excluded full and part-time soldiers of the Royal Irish Regiment (Home Service).

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the planned establishment in April 1996 of (a) the Gurkhas and (b) the Royal Irish Regiment. [4575]

Mr. Soames: The planned establishment for the Gurkhas at April 1996 is around 4,000; for the Royal Irish Regiment (General Service) 850, and for the Royal Irish Regiment (Home Service) 3,300 full-time soldiers and 2,400 part-time soldiers.

Implementation Force (Bosnia)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what inoculations against chemical and biological weapons British troops being deployed as part of the implementation force have received; [4578]

(2) what assessment has been made of the implications for the implementation force of the potential use of chemical and biological weapons in Bosnia; [4576]

(3) what instructions have been issued to the implementation force regarding the potential use of chemical and biological weapons in Bosnia. [4577]

Mr. Soames: My Department has examined all aspects of the potential threat to the implementation force from chemical and biological weapons. All necessary measures are being taken, though it would not be appropriate to go into detail.

Ambulance

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the outcome of the replacement order for his Department's ambulances. [4568]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The assessment of the competition to purchase ambulances for the Army is not yet complete. It would, therefore, be inappropriate to make a statement at this stage.

Starstreak Missile

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the development of the Starstreak missile for the attack helicopter. [4572]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The United Kingdom is currently participating in the first phase of a United States programme to examine the feasibility of using a variant of the Starstreak high velocity missile, which recently entered service with the British Army in the ground-to-air role as an air-to-air missile fro Apache. This phase will culminate in the middle of next year in trials in the US to demonstrate safe release of Starstreak from a US Army AH-64A aircraft. Subject to the satisfactory outcome of these trials, further phases on a co-operative basis are planned.

Mortar Shells

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the companies supplying his Department with 81mm illuminating mortar shells. [4573]

Mr. Arbuthnot: There is no current contract for 81mm illuminating mortar rounds. The most recent contract, for which deliveries ended in December 1993, was with the Italian company, Simmel Difesa.

Attack Helicopter

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the decision to place the contract for the helmet and associated avionics for the Army attack helicopter out to tender was taken; what companies are bidding for this contract; what is the total value of this contract; and what plans his Department had made for the manufacture of the helmet prior to that decision. [4580]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The possibility of an improved helmet and sighting system to replace the current, first generation US Army integrated helmet and display sighting system was identified by Westland Helicopters in its attack helicopter bid. As part of the selection process, it was decided to proceed with this option. As prime contractor, Westland has been tasked to hold a sub-contract competition for this equipment and will issue an invitation to tender early in the new year. The value of the contract will be dependent on the chosen system.

Army Technical Support Agency

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to announce his Department's decision on the collocation of the Army Technical Support Agency on to one main site; when he originally anticipated making this announcement; and what factors underlay the delay. [4563]

Mr. Soames: I intend to announce our proposals shortly. This will be followed by a period of consultation.

We originally intended to announce our proposals earlier this year but had to examine in detail more potential sites than had first been anticipated.

Military Communications Satellites

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has for further orders for military communications satellites. [5076]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Subject to the successful completion of contractual negotiations, we intend to place an order worth more than £100 million Matra Marconi Space UK Ltd., for a third Skynet 4 stage 2 communications satellite. The stage 2 satellites will start coming into service from 1998. The Skynet 4 stage 2 programme will enable us to maintain dedicated satellite communications into the next century for British forces deployed throughout the world, in theatres as diverse as Bosnia, the middle east and the Falkland Islands. Such a capability is of great importance to mobile operations, including those of the joint rapid deployment force, where military units may be in range of reliable terrestrial communications. The planned order will also provide substantial further work for the British space industry.

Departmental Vacant Dwellings

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many dwellings owned by his Ministry are (a) currently unoccupied and (b) have been unoccupied for six months or more in each parliamentary constituency in Cambridgeshire. [4764]

Mr. Soames: My Department owns the following vacant dwellings in these parliamentary constituencies in Cambridgeshire:

	Number
Huntingdon	552
South-east Cambridgeshire	8
South-west Cambridgeshire	54

A total of 478 properties in Huntingdon have recently been handed back by the United States Air Force. Of these, 193 are surplus to requirements and will be sold while the remainder will be retained to house a squadron returning from overseas. In south-west Cambridgeshire, 42 of the vacant properties are awaiting sale. Information on the number of properties vacant for six months or more is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how any dwellings owned by his Department are (a) currently unoccupied and (b) have been unoccupied for six months or more in each parliamentary constituency in Devon and Cornwall. [4554]

Mr. Soames: My Department owns the following vacant dwellings in these parliamentary constituencies in Devon and Cornwall.

	Number
North Devon	120
Exeter	8
Plymouth Devonport	340
Plymouth Drake	4
Plymouth Sutton	65
Torridge and West Devon	8
North Cornwall	65
St. Ives	98
South East Cornwall	13

A total of 152 vacant quarters in Plymouth, Devonport, and 91 vacant quarters in St. Ives are in the process of being sold. A further 52 vacant quarters in Plymouth, Devonport have been identified for leasing to Plymouth city council. One hundred and twenty vacant quarters in north Devon and 50 in north Cornwall are being held for unit deployments. Information on the number of properties vacant for six months or more is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Consultancies

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consultancies his Department has placed in each of the last three years; and if he will make a statement. [4571]

Mr. Arbuthnot: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of the letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Departmental Properties

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many of his Ministry's properties there are on (a) the Dale Road estate, Haverfordwest an (b) the Trafalgar Road estate, Haverfordwest; [4736]

(2) what are his plans for the disposal of his Ministry's housing at the Trafalgar Road estate, Haverfordwest and the Dale Road estate, Haverfordwest; [4738]

(3) if he will list those parts of his Ministry's housing at (a) Dale Road estate and (b) Trafalgar Road estate, Haverfordwest, which the private sector has expressed an interest in buying; [4737]

(4) how many of his Ministry's properties at (a) the Dale Road estate, Haverfordwest, and (b) Trafalgar Road estate, Haverfordwest, are currently vacant. [4735]

Mr. Soames: My Department owns the following properties on the estate mentioned at Haverfordwest:

	Stock	Vacant
Dale Road estate	188	85
Trafalgar Road estate	253	93

The properties on the Trafalgar Road estate are surplus to our long-term requirements and we are currently negotiating to sell 216 of them to a housing association. The remaining 37 will probably be offered for sale to service personnel through the services' discount scheme. The vacant properties on the Dale Road estate are being held for a unit returning from Germany. In common with other parts of the married quarters estate in England and Wales, these married quarters may be transferred to the private sector as part of the proposal announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on 30 November 1995, Official Report, columns 810-11.

ENVIRONMENT

Smoke Detectors

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment for what reasons the Smoke Detectors Act 1991 has not fully been brought into force; and when he intends to fully bring it into force. [197]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Section 1(2) of the Smoke Detectors Act 1991 requires all new dwellings to be fitted with one or more smoke detectors in such a manner as to make adequate provision for the early detection of the outbreak of fire in the dwelling. I do not intend to bring the Act into force because its provisions would simply duplicate measures introduced under the Building Regulations 1991 for smoke alarms to be fitted in new dwellings.

Council Tax

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the average council tax bill in each English standard planning region in the latest year for which figures are available. [4296]

Sir Paul Beresford: The average headline council taxes —band C, two adults— for the area in each English standard planning region in 1995–96 are as follows:

Region	£
Northern	602
North West	628
Yorkshire and Humberside	561
East Midlands	562
West Midlands	545
East Anglia	498
South East	505
London	512
South West	530
England	541

Amounts shown are headline taxes, before transitional relief and council tax benefit/rebates after capping.

Ealing Council

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what reserves are currently held by Ealing council; what were the equivalent figures for (a) 1 April 1994 and (b) 1 April 1990; and if he will make a statement. [4169]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Department has recently conducted a survey of the general fund revenue reserves held by local authorities during 1994–95. The results show that the London borough of Ealing held about £36.9 million in revenue reserves at 1 April 1994, of which about £11.8 million were unallocated, the remainder being earmarked for specific purposes or held on behalf of schools under local management of schools schemes.

At the time of the survey, Ealing expected its revenue reserves on 1 April 1995 to be £36.4 million, of which £3.9 million would be unallocated, £2.5 million held on behalf of schools, and £30 million held in other earmarked reserves.

Figures for 1 April 1990 are not available on a comparable basis.

Public Local Inquiries

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out the time scale for inquiries under the Town and Country Planning Act recommended in the inquiries procedure rules; and if he will make a statement on the Planning Inspectorate's ability to meet this time scale. [4205]

Sir Paul Beresford [holding answer 5 December 1995]: The provision of information on public local inquiries is the responsibility of the Planning Inspectorate. I have asked the inspectorate's chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from James Greenfield to Mr. John Austin-Walker, dated 5 December 1995:

The Secretary of State asked the Chief Planning Inspector to reply to your question about the timescale for inquiries under the Town and Country Planning Act recommended in the Inquiries Procedure Rules, and the Planning Inspectorate's ability to meet this timescale. Mr. Shepley is away from the office at this time, and I am writing on his behalf.

In the case of planning appeals and planning applications called-in for the Secretary of State's decision, the Inquiries Procedure Rules state that the inquiry shall be not later than 20 weeks or 22 weeks respectively after the relevant start date for the case, unless such a date is impracticable. Generally, the earliest possible date for an inquiry to be arranged is about 14 weeks after the relevant date (16 weeks or more for called-in applications), allowing the parties adequate time to submit and exchange statements and prepare proofs of evidence within the recommended timescales.

There is a general delay in arranging dates for these inquiries caused by the need to provide Inspectors for development plan inquiries. The Planning and Compensation Act 1991 required mandatory district wide plans to be published by local authorities, so that future development control decisions were made in accordance with the plans, unless material considerations indicated otherwise. Ministers expectations were that all plans would be in place, by the end of 1996. Extra Inspectors have been recruited, but are undergoing an extensive training programme before they become fully effective.

Within the Inspectorate's published Business Plan there are a number of performance targets, many of which are measured against the time taken to complete 80% of our caseloads. The latest statistics show that during September, 80% of the dates for inquiries proposed by the Inspectorate to the parties were made within 40 weeks of the relevant dates. The earliest date proposed was made in week 18, and the latest date in week 51. The average waiting time for an inquiry date was 35 weeks.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative the revenue commitment entered into by the Government for each year until the commitment ceases. [3399]

Sir Paul Beresford: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 6 December 1995, Official Report, column 239.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the policy changes which will arise from the final agreement in respect of each scheme agreed under the private finance initiative. [3400]

Sir Paul Beresford: The policy aim of the PFI is to improve the quality and quantity of capital projects within whatever level of public funding is available at a given time. The agreement of specific schemes under the private finance initiative will not result in changes in the policy.

Mobile Telephones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many times mobile telephones used by Ministers in his Departments have been cloned during (a) the last six months, (b) the last 12 months and (c) the last 18 months; and which Ministers within his Department have had their mobile telephones cloned. [4260]

Sir Paul Beresford: The information we have received from service providers suggests that in the last 18 months one of the mobile/car telephones allocated for the use of Ministers and their private offices has been cloned. The phone was one allocated for use by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many mobile telephones there are available in his Department for the use of Ministers. [4259]

Sir Paul Beresford: Thirteen car/mobile telephones are allocated for the use of Ministers and their private offices.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list the total external support available to Buckinghamshire county council from business rates and revenue support grant for each financial year since 1990–91 to 1996–97; and if he will make a statement; [4695]

(2) if he will list the total external support available to (a) Aylesbury Vale district council, (b) Wycombe district council and (c) Chiltern district for each financial year since 1990–91; and if he will make a statement. [4696]

Sir Paul Beresford: Between 1990–91 and 1992–93 redistributed non-domestic rates and revenue support grant were paid only into the collection funds operated by billing authorities. These payments supported expenditure incurred by both the billing authority and also by any precepting authorities. There is therefore no data for those years in respect of Buckinghamshire CC, and the figures for the district councils are not comparable with those for later years. The figures from 1993–94 onwards are given.

Non-domestic rates are redistributed to each authority on a per head basis. RSG is calculated as the difference between its standard spending assessment and the sum of the income from its council tax—assuming that its tax was set at the council tax for standard spending for that type of authority—and its share of the distributable amount non-domestic rates. At national level, the change in the amount of RSG reflects change in each of these elements. The differential increases in RSG between authorities will reflect changes in assessed need, function—in particular the changed arrangements for police funding in 1995–96—and in the size of their own tax base.

[1] Including funding for Buckinghamshire's share of Thames Valley Police.

[2] Excluding funding for police.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what impact the reduction in the amount of the area costs adjustment has had on the levels of standard spending assessment and total external support for 1996–97 for (a) Buckinghamshire county council, (b) Aylesbury Vales district council, (c) Chiltern district council, and (d) Wycombe district council; and if he will make a statement. [4694]

Sir Paul Beresford: The changes proposed to the area cost adjustment factors for 1996–97 reflect information from the 1994 new earnings survey showing a narrowing of the cost differentials between authorities in London and the south-east and authorities elsewhere.

We estimate that had we used the factors which were used in the 1995–96 settlement, proposed SSAs for the authorities would have been higher by approximately the following amounts.

	£ million
Buckinghamshire County Council	2.23
Aylesbury Vale District Council	0.07
Chiltern District Council	0.06
Wycombe District Council	0.07

The authorities' total external support would also have been higher by approximately the same amounts.

Warwickshire Funding

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total funding made available to Warwickshire in 1995–96; and what it was in each of the three previous years. [4837]

Sir Paul Beresford: In 1992–93 redistributed non domestic and revenue support grant were paid only in the collection funds operated by billing authorities. These payments supported expenditure incurred by both the billing authorities and also by any precepting authorities. Data concerning total funding in 1992–93 are therefore not comparable with those for later years. The figures from 1993–94 to 1995–96 are given.

Non-domestic rates are redistributed to each authority on a per head basis. Revenue support grant is calculated as the difference between its standard spending assessment and the sum of the income from its council tax—assuming that its tax was set at the council tax for standard spending for that type of authority—and its share of the distributable amount of non-domestic rates. Revenue support grant and specific grants declined in 1995–96 because of the establishment of the new Warwickshire police authority.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative the revenue commitment entered into by the Government for each year until the commitment ceases. [3409]

Mr. Howard: The Home Office has entered into two contractual agreements under the private finance initiative.

The estimated revenue commitment per year for the police national network service is not available. Individual police forces' purchase usage of the network from public funds, but the value during the lifetime of the scheme will depend on demand. The contract is for five years.

The lease for the Gatwick airport immigration detention facility is for 25 years. Rental is £987,000 per annum fixed for the next five years. After this period the rental will be re-negotiated. There will also be a separately negotiated management contract.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the policy changes which will arise from the final agreement in respect of each scheme agreed under the private finance initiative. [3410]

Mr. Howard: The agreement of schemes under the private finance initiative does not result in changes to the policy of the Government on the PFI. Agreed schemes do, however, represent the application of the PFI policy and offer us the opportunity further to refine the process of implementation. The lessons learned are set out in the publication "Private Opportunity, Public Benefit". This is published jointly by HM Treasury and the private finance panel, and a copy is available in the Library.

Fine Enforcement

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the outcome of his discussions with the Lord Chancellor about the impact of the scheduled transfer of responsibility for the system of fine enforcement. [3974]

Mr. Maclean: The Lord Chancellor and my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it is important to remove from the police the administrative work relating to enforcement of warrants which divert them from more essential police work. There has been an exchange of correspondence about the timing of the proposed transfer of responsibility for the enforcement of certain categories of warrants from the police to the magistrates courts. The matter is now the subject of judicial review.

Mobile Telephones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many mobile telephones there are available in his Department for the use of Ministers. [4257]

Mr. Howard: Six.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many times mobile telephones used by Ministers in his Department have been cloned during (a) the last six months, (b) the last 12 months and (c) the last 18 months; and which Ministers within his Department have had their mobile telephones cloned. [4258]

Mr. Howard: The number of detected instances of cloning of Ministers' official mobile telephones in my Department during (a) the last six months; (b) the previous six months; and (c) the six months before that were zero, two and zero respectively.

The mobile telephones issued to the Minister of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean), and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, when he was serving as Minister of State in my Department, were cloned.

Executive Agencies

Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if answers to questions tabled by hon. Members which fall within the responsibilities of executive agencies of his Office are submitted to Ministers for approval before publication in the Official Report. [4740]

Mr. Howard: It is the normal practice for Ministers to see the proposed replies to questions tabled by hon. Members which fall within the responsibility of chief executives of Home Office executive agencies before they appear in the Official Report.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set out for each of the last 10 years for which information is available (a) according to country of origin the number of applications for asylum from those seeking to enter the United Kingdom from abroad together with the number accepted and (b) the number of applications for asylum from those already in the United Kingdom together with the number accepted. [4516]

Mr. Kirkhope: Information on the number of asylum applications made and decisions taken, by location of application, for the years 1992 to 1994, is given in tables 4.1 to 4.3 of Home Office statistical bulletin "Asylum Statistics United Kingdom 1994" issue 15/95. Similar information on asylum applications for the years 1998 to 1991 is given in table 2.2 of issues 13/93 and 12/92 of the same publication. Copies of all issues of this bulletin are available in the Library. An equivalent breakdown of decisions prior to 1992 is not available.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many asylum seekers appealed against the initial decision on their claims in 1994; and what percentage of the total of those whose claims were initially rejected this represented. [4236]

Mr. Kirkhope: In 1994, there were 16,500 initial decisions to refuse asylum. During the same year, 10,580 appeals against the refusal of asylum were lodged with the Home Office. However, some of these appeals will have been made against decisions which were taken at the end of 1993 and some of those applications who were refused may have exercised more than one right of appeal. For these reasons, an accurate appeal rate cannot be calculated.

Terrorism (Exclusion Orders)

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he has taken to establish a wholly independent authority to consider exclusion orders under prevention of terrorism legislation; and if the persons so appointed will be subject to official secrets legislation in respect of the information provided to them. [4523]

Mr. Howard: Independent persons have been appointed to consider exclusion orders since the prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1974 was introduced. The European Court of Justice has ruled that the method of appointing the independent advisers is satisfactory. They are subject to the provisions of the Official Secrets Act 1989.

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government in cases where recommendations to exclude persons under the prevention of terrorism legislation are not approved by the wholly independent persons appointed to consider such cases. [4524]

Mr. Howard: The Secretary of State is not bound by legislation to accept the advisers' recommendations. Responsibility for national security results rests ultimately with the Secretary of State. However, in recent years, advisers' recommendations have generally been accepted. These recommendations have by no means always supported exclusion orders, which have sometimes been revoked accordingly.

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the procedures to be followed by the wholly independent persons appointed to consider recommendations for exclusion under prevention of terrorism legislation with particular reference to the rights of persons being excluded learning of the nature of the evidence offered against them. [4525]

Mr. Howard: The adviser will offer the individual concerned an interview, either in Northern Ireland or in the British embassy in Dublin. Legal representation is permitted. The adviser will have access to the documentation on the basis of which a recommendation for exclusion has been made. The adviser will submit a report to the Secretary of State who then makes a final decision.

Exclusion orders under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1974 relate to the commission, preparation or instigation of acts of terrorism, or travel for those purposes; details are highly sensitive and could not be divulged without prejudicing the fight against terrorism. That is why any individual may make representations to an independent adviser, and all cases are subject to further oversight as part of the annual review of the operation of the prevention of terrorism Act.

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons have been excluded from the mainland of the United Kingdom under prevention of terrorism legislation; and on what basis he has concluded that none of them will be entitled to compensation. [4526]

Mr. Howard: Four hundred and forty-one people have been excluded from Great Britain or the United Kingdom since the introduction of this legislation in 1974. Differentiation between those excluded from Great Britain and those excluded from the United Kingdom since 1974 could be achieved only at disproportionate cost.

To claim compensation, an individual would have to show that he had suffered loss as a direct result of the failure to follow procedures deemed necessary by the European Court of Justice. There is no evidence to support this in any of these cases, since the Court has called into question the process, rather than the fact, of exclusion. In many instances, the decision to exclude was subsequently backed up by an independent adviser who had had a chance to interview the individual.

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he had made of the cost of providing a wholly independent review of persons considered for exclusion under protection of terrorism legislation. [4527]

Mr. Howard: An independent review process already exists. Each individual who is excluded is offered the opportunity to make representations to an independent adviser. The European Court of Justice judgment in Gallagher concerned the point at which the reference should be made to an adviser. We are currently considering its implications.

Church Commissioners

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretay of State for the Home Department what discussions he has held with (a) the Church Commissioners and (b) the General Synod on the desirability of the commissioners ceasing to be covered by exempted status in respect of their supervision by the Charity Commissioners. [4591]

Mr. Sackville: None.

Racism and Xenophobia

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are his reasons for objecting to the proposed EEC draft joint action concerning action to combat racism and xenophobia. [4562]

Mr. Kirkhope: As currently drafted, the joint action would require us to change our law so as to criminalise certain forms of behaviour which are not currently offences in the United Kingdom or to derogate from the principle of dual criminality as regards judicial co-operation in respect of those forms of behaviour. United Kingdom civil and criminal law responds in a balanced way to the real mischiefs of which there is currently evidence in this country. The Government are committed to protecting people from threats, abuse and insults based on their race; and we are working towards a solution which will allow all 15 member states to agree a European Union instrument on this subject.

Illegal Immigrants

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what number of illegal immigrants have been granted bail in each of the last 36 months; and what requirement they must meet in order to receive social security payments. [4593]

Mr. Kirkhope: Statistics are not available on immigration offenders granted bail. The other information requested is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people (a) entered the country illegally and (b) were apprehended entering the United Kingdom illegally by (i) lorry, (ii) small boat and (iii) light aircraft, in each of the last 36 months. [4592]

Mr. Kirkhope: There are no official estimates of the number of people who have entered the United Kingdom illegally. The number of illegal entrants detected in each of the last three years for which statistics have been published are:

1992: 5,658

1994: 7,389 (provisional).

Information about the means by which these people entered, claimed to have entered or attempted to enter illegally is not maintained centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Asylum and Immigration Bill

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what considerations underlay his decision not to issue a White Paper before publishing the Asylum and Immigration Bill. [4561]

Mr. Kirkhope: My right hon. and learned Friend made a full statement on 20 November, Official Report, columns 335–38, in which he explained the need for this proposed legislation.

Police (Costs)

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how he proposes to implement and monitor the recruitment of 5,000 additional police officers; [4031]

(2) what steps he intends to take to ensure that chief constables do not use their share of the cash for recruiting additional police officers for normal recruiting to replace wastage, or for other purposes. [4026]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 5 December 1995]: The Government are providing sufficient funding to allow an additional 5,000 police officers to be recruited over the next three financial years. The additional funding is to be allocated separately to police forces. Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary will introduce a mechanism to monitor the use by forces of the extra funding.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his latest estimate of the average total annual cost of employing (a) a police officer for a year and (b) an additional police constable and what is the average cost of employing a new recruit to the police service including the cost of training and other costs during the first full year of employment. [4027]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 5 December 1995]: The most recent estimate of the average total annual cost of employing a police officer is £42,000. The figure was calculated on the basis of total expenditure and total police strength of provincial forces in England and Wales.

Data on the average annual cost of employing a police constable are not collected centrally.

The estimated average costs of employing an additional probationer constable in 1996–97 are shown in the table:

Cost of a probationer constable	Outside London £	London £
Estimated salary	16,117	16,117
London Weighting	—	1,398
London Allowance	—	1,011
Earning Related National Insurance Contributions	1,251	—
Earning Related National Insurance Contributions	—	1,424
Estimated training expenses	2,000	2,000
Estimated cost of uniform	370	370
Total	19,738	22,320

Human Genetics Report

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he intends to take in response to data protection issues raised in the third report of the Science and Technology Select Committee, of Session 1994–95, on "human genetics: the Science and its Consequences", HC 41. [3918]

Mr. Sackville: The Government will be responding to the Select Committee in due course.

Police (Speaking Engagements)

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what (a) guidance and (b) instructions are issued to serving police officers of superintendent rank and above, concerning invitations to speak at meetings where (i) the invitation is by virtue of being a serving police officer and (ii) the meeting is arranged by a political organisation. [4005]

Mr. Maclean: Regulation 9 and schedule 2 of the Police Regulations 1995 prohibit a police officer from taking an active part in politics. This provision does not necessarily preclude an officer from accepting an invitation to speak at a political or other gathering.

Data Protection

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to make a statement on the review of the Data Protection Act 1984. [3920]

Mr. Sackville: I expect to announce the outcome of the "prior options" study of the office of the Data Protection Registrar shortly. Work on the implications of the European Union data protection directive is in progress. I expect to publish a consultation paper in due course.

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Social Security on the extension of data protection legislation. [3919]

Mr. Sackville: I have had no such discussions with my right hon. Friend.

Police (Sandown Racecourse)

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the daily or hourly rate charged for and paid to police officers at the Sandown racecourse exhibition. [3785]

Mr. Maclean: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the decision to deploy police at this event was an operational one and as such no charges will be made to the organisers of the exhibition. The rates of pay for the individual officers involved are not readily available. I regret that the estimated additional total police cost for this operation given in my reply to a question from the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) on 27 November, Official Report, 467, was miscalculated. I understand that the correct total figure if £2,100.

Police (Brightlingsea)

Sir Alan Haselhurst: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on complaints about the policing of demonstrations against animal exports at Brightlingsea. [3789]

Mr. Maclean: The investigation of individual complaints against police officers is a matter for the chief constable and the Police Complaints Authority. I understand that 112 complaints have been received, and that none of the 68 so far dealt with has been substantiated. The report of the inquiry supervised by the Police Complaints Authority noted that on the whole officers had shown considerable constraint. I commend the chief constable of Essex police on a very successful operation in extremely difficult policing circumstances.

Regional Crime Squads

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library copies of HM inspectors' reports on the inspections carried out of the South and West Wales, the South West and North West and the South East regional crime squads during 1994–95. [3992]

Mr. Maclean: Copies of these reports are already in the Library.

SCOTLAND

Health Boards

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the names of the general managers, chairs and board members and their correspondence addresses for each of the health boards in Scotland. [1187]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 28 November 1995]: As the information requested is lengthy, I have arranged for copies of the lists to be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions his Department had with the officials of Greater Glasgow and Borders health boards relating to their under-drawing of their budgets for 1994–95; and what representations their boards have made in relation to these surpluses being carried forward into the current financial year. [4470]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Officials in my Department have had frequent discussions with officials of Greater Glasgow and Borders health boards relating to under-drawing of budget for 1994–95 and these discussions are continuing. The final amounts to be carried forward into the current financial year have not yet been agreed but the boards have made representations seeking to maximise the carry-forward amounts within the normal operating rules. The final figures will be determined soon.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the budgets for 1995–96 for each of Scotland's health boards; and if he will indicate for each board the percentage charge on the budgets for 1994–95. [4471]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information is set out in the table.

Health board	£ thousand		Percentage
	1994–95	1995–96	Increase
Argyll and Clyde	210,398	217,764	3.50
Ayrshire and Arran	171,635	179,208	4.41
Borders	53,658	56,502	5.30
Dumfries and Galloway	75,331	80,587	6.98
Fife	157,148	164,276	4.54
Forth Valley	124,511	128,711	3.37
Grampian	225,961	233,520	3.35
Greater Glasgow	484,605	495,402	2.23
Highland	99,118	103,318	4.24
Lanarkshire	241,124	254,676	5.62
Lothian	343,583	356,919	3.88
Orkney	10,377	10,924	5.27
Shetland	11,196	11,571	3.35
Tayside	198,080	203,865	2.92
Western Isles	18,150	18,838	3.79
Total	2,424,873	2,516,081	3.76

Note:

The figures report basic revenue allocations which are based on weighted capitation requirements with adjustment for moves to funding parity. Additionally Boards receive allocations for capital charges and to meet a range of service specific costs. These include, for example, the costs of nurse education and training, the additional costs associated with the teaching of doctors and such allocations reflect actual costs and will vary from Board to Board.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 23 November, Official Report, column 318, how much of the surpluses in the budgets for 1994–95 of Borders health board and Greater Glasgow health board were not transferred to the current financial year's budget for these boards. [4473]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The provisional figures provided in the previous answer of 23 November have still to be finalised and therefore no transfer of funding to the health boards has yet taken place. It is anticipated, however, that all of Borders health board's surplus will be transferred but that £1.837 million of Greater Glasgow health board's surplus will not be transferred as this element relates to a ring-fenced capital allocation underspend which is not available for carry-forward purposes.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the names of the chief executives, chairs and executive and non-executive directors and the trust correspondence addresses for each of the NHS trusts currently in operation in Scotland. [1188]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 28 November 1995]: As the information requested is lengthy, I have arranged for copies of the lists to be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the budget for each of Scotland's NHS trusts for the 1994–95 financial year indicating the surplus or deficit declared by each NHS trust; and if he will list the budget for each NHS trust for 1995–96 indicating the percentage change against the previous financial year. [4472]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information is set out in the tables. The surplus-deficit and total income figures for each trust in 1994–95 have been taken from the 1994–95 NHS trust annual accounts. The 1995–96 total income figures have been taken from the latest financial monitoring returns provided by each trust.

1. Figures for Central Scotland Healthcare NHS Trust include those for Royal Scottish Nation Hospital NHS Trust which dissolved on formation of the new Trust on 1 October 1995.
2. The deficit recorded by Victoria Infirmary NHS Trust was due to revaluation of the Royal Samartian Hospital prior to its disposal.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all NHS trusts (a) as of 30 November 1995 and (b) with effect from 1 April 1996. [4052]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I would refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Donohoe) on 19 July 1995 at column 1534. The fourth wave of NHS trust hospitals in Scotland became effective on 1 April 1995. There are no plans to establish any further NHS trusts in Scotland.

Greater Glasgow Health Board

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each of the last 10 years the amount lost to Greater Glasgow health board due to progress towards Scottish health authorities "Priorities for the Eighties" parity. [3914]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Greater Glasgow health board has been, and still is, overfunded against its weighted capitation target. The table below details the board's moves to parity and the amount by which they remained over-funded against their weighted capitation target for the past 10 years.

Police (Speaking Engagements)

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what (a) guidance and (b) instructions are issued to serving police officers of superintendent rank and above, concerning invitations to speak at meetings where (i) the invitation is by virtue of being a serving police officer and (ii) the meeting is arranged by a political organisation. [4006]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Regulation 4 and regulation 1 of the Police (Scotland) Regulations 1976 prohibit a police officer from taking an active part in politics but do not preclude an officer from accepting an invitation to speak at meetings arranged by political organisations.

Sterilisations

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) men and (b) women in Scotland are sterilised annually, by standard census age group. [4103]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The number of sterilisations performed annually from 1990–1994 on Scottish NHS in-patients and day cases is given in the table.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative the revenue commitment entered into by the Government for each year until the commitment ceases. [3403]

Mr. Kynoch: The Skye bridge involves no revenue commitment on the part of the Government. Figures for the revenue costs of the schemes completed or agreed so far in the health sector are not available centrally.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the policy changes which will arise from the final agreement in respect of each scheme agreed under the private finance initiative. [3404]

Mr. Kynoch: The agreement of schemes under the private finance initiative does not result in changes to the policy of the Government on the PFI. Agreed schemes do, however, represent the application of PFI policy and offer the opportunity to further refine the process of implementation. The lessons learned are set out in the publication "Private Opportunity, Public Benefit". This is published jointly by HM Treasury and the private finance panel, and a copy is available in the Library.

Mobile Telephones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many times mobile telephones used by Ministers in his Department have been cloned during (a) the last six months, (b) the last 12 months and (c) the last 18 months; and which Ministers within his Department have had their mobile telephones cloned. [4271]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: There have been no instances of the cloning of hand portables but official vehicles used by Scottish Office Ministers when in London were cloned in December 1994, May 1995, twice, and in June 1995.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many mobile telephones there are available in his Department for the use of Ministers. [4272]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No Minister has a mobile telephone for his exclusive use but Ministers' private offices have a total of six. In addition, official vehicles used by Ministers are fitted with car phones.

Scottish Valuation Advisory Council

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how he will obtain advice pertaining to rating valuation after the demise of the Scottish Valuation Advisory Council next year. [5285]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I wish to continue to receive objective advice concerning rating valuation in a manner appropriate to today's needs and circumstances. I am therefore establishing, with effect from 1 April 1996, a non-statutory advisory body, the Scottish Valuation and Rating Council, which will be smaller than the former advisory council but composed of members representing a similar breadth of interests and experience.

The council's remit will be to advise the Secretary of State for Scotland on any matter pertaining to valuation and rating, including evaluation of representations and recommendations made to him, the identification of issues requiring consideration, and advice in the preparation of legislation.

I am happy to announce that the hon. Lord Clyde has agreed to accept appointment as the first chairman of this council. The appointment of other members will be announced at a later date.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Legislative Repeals

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what legislation from his Department passed in the last five years contains provision for statutory repeal or review. [2029]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 27 November 1995]: There were no such provisions in recent legislation. However, major reviews have been carried out on MAFF legislation relating to areas such as milk marketing, agricultural tenancies and food law. These have resulted in the abolition of the milk marketing scheme and the introduction of the Agricultural Tenancies Act 1995, under which landlords and tenants entering new tenancies will be able to agree terms which reflect their own particular needs. By 1 January 1996, we expect to repeal or simplify a series of national measures relating to food composition and food additives.

Overgrazing

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many (a) sheep and (b) breeding ewes have been removed in each less-favoured area to meet requirements to prevent overgrazing. [3224]

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 30 November 1995]: The overgrazing provisions of the livestock premium schemes do not force farmers to remove animals from the less-favoured areas of the UK. They restrict the subsidy payments to farmers who continue to graze animals in excess of notified numbers on overgrazed land.

In England, notifications have been issued to 33 farmers, and over 8,500 sheep and about 400 breeding cows will have to be removed from overgrazed land if the graziers' livestock subsidies are to be unaffected by overgrazing penalties. Responsibility for the implementation of overgrazing provisions of the livestock subsidy schemes in other parts of the United Kingdom falls to the Secretaries of State for Scotland, for Wales and for Northern Ireland.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative the revenue commitment entered into by the Government for each year until the commitment ceases. [3415]

Mr. Boswell: While several projects are currently being assessed for their potential, no schemes have so far been agreed under the private finance initiative.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the policy changes which will arise from the final agreement in respect of each scheme agreed under the private finance initiative. [3416]

Mr. Boswell: The agreement of schemes under the private finance initiative does not result in changes to the policy of the Government on the PFI. Agreed schemes do, however, represent the application of the PFI policy and offer us the opportunity to further refine the process of implementation. The lessons learned are set out in the publication "Private Opportunity, Public Benefit". This is published jointly by HM Treasury and the private finance initiative panel, and a copy is available in the Members' Library.

Fish Discards

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimates he has of the weight and value of fish accidentally caught by United Kingdom-based fishing vessels which under current quota arrangements have to be thrown back; and what proposals he has in respect of this matter. [4010]

Mr. Baldry: Rates of discarding vary greatly between the various sections of the UK fleet due to the fact that the number of small fish entering the fisheries each year is itself highly variable. Discard rates in the haddock and whiting fisheries can be in the region of 50 per cent. by weight of the catch if there are large numbers of small fish present. Discard rates in the larger species fisheries such as cod are very substantially less than this. The impression gained of discard practices by scientific observers is that relatively low volumes of fish are discarded for quota reasons.

The problem is a Community-wide one and needs to be addressed on a Community level. I am determined to have a thorough reappraisal of discarding and technical conservation measures and I shall be pressing in the Fisheries Council for a concerted effort on this in 1996.

Tuna

Mr. Morely: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, (1) if he has received a copy of the interim report of the observer programme, conducted on the United Kingdom drift net fishery for albacore tuna in the summer of 1995, under contract to his Ministry; if he will make a statement on the results; if he will place a copy of the report in the Library; [4040]

(2) if he will make the results of the observer programme of the United Kingdom tuna drift net fishery available to the European Commission, and to the members of the Council of Fisheries Ministers, prior to their next meeting on 21 December; [4041]

(3) if he will make a statement on results of the observer programme of the United Kingdom tuna drift net fishery in respect of (a) the by-catch of dolphins and other species and (b) the adequacy of current EU regulations, limiting drift nets to 2.5 km in length, to protect non-target species. [4045]

Mr. Baldry: We have just received and are studying an interim report by the sea mammals research unit of the Natural Environment Research Council on the UK's 1995 tuna drift net fishery. I will place a copy in the Library of the House together with the Ministry's analysis of it. The report will also be made available to the Council of Ministers and the European Commission.

Drift Net Fishing

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to ban high seas drift nets in EU waters and by EU vessels at the next Council of Fisheries Ministers meeting. [4042]

Mr. Baldry: The European Commission's Scientific, Technical and Economic Committee for Fisheries has twice examined the science relating to drift net fishing by EU vessels and concluded that there is no justification for a ban. My policy will continue to be based on the science, including an interim report just received from the sea mammals research unit.

School Milk Scheme

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment his Department has made of the effect on the consumption of milk in (a) secondary schools and (b) primary schools, of EU subsidies on milk in secondary schools and on milk in school catering. [3381]

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 30 November 1995]: We do not keep detailed figures on the consumption of subsidised milk in different categories of school. We estimate, however, that of the total expenditure under the EC school milk scheme in the United Kingdom, direct consumption in secondary schools accounts for about 15 per cent. and use as an ingredient in meals in both primary and secondary schools accounts for about 17 per cent.

Alport Dale

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 28 November, Official Report, column 533 (1) on what date English Nature lodged its formal objection to Forest Enterprise's proposals for Alport dale; and on what date his Department was informed of the formal objection; [4276]

(2) on what dates the two letters objecting to the proposals by Forest Enterprise, for Alport dale were received by the Forestry Authority; and on what dates his Department was informed of the letters. [4278]

Mr. Boswell: The two letters objecting to the proposals by the Forest Enterprise for Alport dale were received by the Forestry Authority on 7 June and 15 August, and English Nature's formal objection was received on 17 August. The Forestry Commission reports directly to my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on forestry matters in England.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Royal Fine Art Commission

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when she will place in the Library the report of Sir Geoffrey Chipperfield into the Royal Fine Art Commission, together with his conclusions. [3666]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 4 December 1995]: Sir Geoffrey's report will be placed in the Library when we have completed the necessary consultations with other interested Departments and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has come to conclusions on the recommendations. I hope this will be early in the new year.

Mobile Telephones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many mobile telephones there are available in her Department for the use of Ministers. [4253]

Mr. Sproat: The Department of National Heritage has three mobile phones and two car phones available for the use of Ministers.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many times mobile telephones used by Ministers in her Department have been cloned during (a) the last six months, (b) the last 12 months and (c) the last 18 months; and which Ministers within her Department have had their mobile telephones cloned. [4254]

Mr. Sproat: None of the mobile phones used by Ministers or officials in my Department has been cloned.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will list the policy changes which will arise from the final agreement in respect of each scheme agreed under the private finance initiative. [3408]

Mr. Sproat: The agreement of schemes under the private finance initiative does not result in changes to the policy of the Government on the PFI. Agreed schemes do, however, represent the application of the PFI policy and offer the opportunity to refine further the process of implementation. The lessons learnt are set out in the publication "Private Opportunity, Public Benefit". This is published jointly by the Treasury and the private finance panel, and a copy is available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how much capital expenditure is forecast to be included in the private finance initiative for the current financial year and the next five financial years. [3829]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 6 December 1995]: I refer the hon. Member to table 6.5 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report, 1996–97", which was laid before the House on 28 November 1995.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative (a) capital and (b) revenue costs to public funds (i) under the PFI and (ii) estimated to have been incurred had the scheme been funded wholly within the public sector. [3813]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 6 December 1995]: The central Government contributions to the capital costs of projects so far agreed under the private finance initiative are as follows:

	£ million
Royal Armouries, Leeds	[1]20.0
Hampton Court catering	0.3
Dell Restaurant, Regents Park	0.14
Lido, Hyde Park	0.3
Car Parking, Regents Park and Hyde Park	None
British Library IT equipment	None

[1] Over financial years 1992–93 to 1997–98.

There are no continuing revenue costs. Indeed projects (2) to (5) above have generated, and will continue to generate, a positive annual return.

All the projects were appraised in the normal way against other options, including wholly public funded alternatives, and represented best value for money.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative the revenue commitment entered into by the Government for each year until the commitment ceases. [3407]

Mr. Sproat: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 7 November 1995 at column 717 for the value of the initial and continuing public sector contributions to, and returns from, projects so far approved under the private finance initiative. The annual profile of these contributions and returns is as follows:

£ million

	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95	1995–96	1996–97	1997–98
Royal Armouries, Leeds	1.5	2.0	3.0	6.0	6.0	1.5
Hampton Court catering	—	—	0.3	[1]+0.17	Positive annual return expected
Dell Restaurant, Regents Park	—	—	—	0.14	Positive annual return expected

Car Parking, Regents Park and Hyde Park	—	—	—	+0.275	Positive annual return expected
British Library IT equipment	—	—	–	—	—	—

[1] Positive figures indicate that projects generate income rather than requiring continuing revenue support.

Today

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage on what date her Department first learned about the possible closure of Today newspaper; and what communications her Department had about this matter with News International. [4556]

Mr. Sproat: My Department first learned about the possible closure of Today on Thursday, 16 November. My Department has not discussed any issues raised by the closure with News International.

Sports Sponsorship

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what was the amount spent by tobacco companies on sport in each year since 1992 under the terms of the voluntary agreement. [3965]

Mr. Sproat: The latest figures available for the amount spent by tobacco companies on sports sponsorship are: £10,403,000 in 1992–93, and £7,576,000 in 1993–94.

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what was the total amount spent on sports sponsorship from all sources for each year since 1992. [3977]

Mr. Sproat: According to published reports, the total amount spent on sports sponsorship in the United Kingdom is estimated to have been £239 million in 1992, £250 million in 1993, and £265 million in 1994.

Partnership Funding

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what plans she has to allow the Sports Council to fund up to 100 per cent. of the capital project costs in the most economically deprived areas. [3784]

Mr. Sproat: The Sports Council can already make more substantial grant offers to schemes which are unable to raise the indicative 35 per cent. partnership funding. However, demonstrating the financial commitment of other parties to a project is a powerful expression of support for the scheme. Partnership funding means that more assistance can be offered to a larger number of applicants.

Library Provision (Somerset)

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what was the outcome of her Department's investigation of Somerset county council's library provision; what representations her Department has had on this subject since last January 1995; and if she will make a statement. [4015]

Mr. Sproat: Discussions between my officials and those of Somerset county councils continue, and I hope that it will be possible to resolve outstanding issues. I have received a small number of letters, principally from Somerset library users, about the situation.

Consultants

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage, if she will list those (a) consultants, (b) outside organisations and (c) individuals employed by her Department in each year since 1990, indicating the purposes of their employment and the total payments made to them. [3969]

Mr. Sproat: My Department was established in April 1992 and took on responsibility for funding its own consultancies in August 1992.

To list those consultants employed by my Department and its agencies and indicate their individual purposes would incur disproportionate costs. I am able to provide details of the total annual expenditure on outside consultancies incurred by my Department and its agencies during the last three financial years.

1992–93: £4,239,207

1994–95: £2,746,028.

To list all those outside organisations employed by my Department and its agencies with an indication of their individual purpose would require a large exercise, incurring disproportionate costs.

For individuals employed by my Department, I refer the hon. Member to the copies of the civil service staff post summary tables, copies of which can be found in the House Libraries. These individuals are employed to assist the Department and its agencies to achieve their aims and objectives as set out in the annual departmental report.

Red Hot Television

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what factors have led to the delay in concluding the case before the European Court of Justice between Her Majesty's Government and the broadcaster, Red Hot Television; and when she expects the case to be concluded. [3987]

Mr. Sproat: The case has been unable to proceed because the first and second applicants do not have solicitors on the record and the third applicant cannot be traced. The papers are at present before a judge of the Queen's Bench divisional court in London with a view to concluding the matter.

SOCIAL SECURITY

War Widows' Pensions

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the implementation of the provisions of the Pensions Act 1995 that affect war widows' pensions. [3191]

Mr. Heald: These are matters for John Sheppard, the acting chief executive of the War Pensions Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Sheppard to Mr. Alfred Morris, dated 5 December 1995:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about the implementation of the provisions of the Pensions Act 1995, that affect War Widows Pensions.

It was estimated that there would be in the order of 16500 awards of War Widows Pension under these provisions. As at 1 December, 11152 claims have been received. Decisions have been made in 6834 cases, of which 2229 have been notified and 1487 pensions paid. It is expected that the exercise will be completed by March.

I hope you find my reply helpful.

Invalidity Benefit

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been the total amount of money in each of the last five years claimed back by the Benefits Agency from insurance companies in relation to invalidity benefit paid as a result of injuries caused by road traffic accidents. [4346]

Mr. Burt: This is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Ms Harriet Harman, dated 6 december 1995:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking for the total amount of money in each of the last five years claimed back by the Benefits Agency from insurance companies in relation to invalidity benefit paid as a result of injuries caused by road traffic accidents.

The information requested is as follows:

Financial year	Amount (£ million)
1990–91	0.44
1991–92	3.16
1992–93	6.86
1993–94	12.49
1994–95	18.99

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Social Fund

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many applicants to the social fund have been turned down on the grounds of ability to pay by year and by region since the fund's inception; and what percentage of the total applying this figure represented in each case. [2083]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The figures requested are set out in the tables.

Year	Total number of applications	Numbers refused on the grounds of inability to repay	Numbers refused as a percentage of applications
Great Britain
1988–89	1,749,000	15,020	0.85

1994–95	1,197,571	5,207	20.43

Information by region prior to the creation of the Benefits Agency in April 1991 can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Executive Agencies (Overseas Travel)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list for each of his executive agencies for the last financial year in respect of overseas travel by staff of the agency (a) the cost, (b) the countries visited and (c) the posts held by the staff involved. [2357]

Mr. Burt: The information is not available in the form requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Cost of overseas travel—April 1994 to March 1995

Benefits Agency	871,753
Child Support Agency	432,941
Resettlement Agency	10,980
Contributions Agency	36,618
War Pensions Agency	13,224
Information Technology Services Agency	240,563

The principal countries visited, in order of the greatest number of journeys undertaken, were:

Luxembourg
Republic of Ireland
Belgium
France
The Netherlands
Switzerland
Australia
United States of America
Germany.

Fine Defaulters

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security on how many occasions a deduction in income support was applied for in cases of those defendants who were gaoled for fine default in 1994. [3441]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The information requested is not available.

Housing Benefit

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many housing benefits were claimed in Bournemouth in 1989–90 and 1994–95. [3442]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The information is set out in the table.

Average number of housing benefit recipients in the Bournemouth local authority area during 1989–90 and 1994–95

Year	Number of recipients
1989–90	11,900
1994–95	15,500

Source:

Housing Benefit Management Information System quarterly caseload counts.

Notes:

1. Figures refer to the number of benefit units which may be a single person or a couple.
2. The figure for 1989–90 excludes those recipients of rate rebate only.
3. Figures are an average of the four quarterly caseload counts taken in May, August, November and February of the above financial years.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative the revenue commitment entered into by the Government for each year until the commitment ceases. [3401]

Mr. Burt: The Department has agreed one project to date under the private finance initiative, to develop a new national insurance recording system. Revenue costs for each year of the agreed contract have not yet been finalised and are commercially confidential.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the policy changes which will arise from the final agreement in respect of each scheme agreed under the private finance initiative. [3402]

Mr. Burt: The agreement of schemes under the private finance initiative has not resulted in changes to policy. Agreed schemes represent the application of the PFI policy and offer the opportunity to further refine the processes involved. The lessons learned are set out in the publication "Private Opportunity, Public Benefit". This is published jointly by HM Treasury and the private finance panel, a copy of which is in the Library.

Benefit Rates

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what changes (a) have been made and (b) are planned in the amount paid in (i) the £75 limit on additional funeral expenses connected with a person's religion, (ii) the £2,500 exempt payments limit in the compensation recovery scheme and (iii) the £3,000 vaccine damage payment. [4125]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: No changes have been made to the £75 limit on additional funeral expenses arising from a requirement of the religious faith of the deceased, and none are planned.

Since the introduction of the compensation recovery scheme in 1990, no changes have been made to the small payments limit of £2,500.

A consultation document was published in October to assess the implications of possible changes to the compensation recovery scheme as proposed by the Social Security Select Committee. One issue discussed in this document is the future of the small payments limit. The Government are now considering the responses to the consultation exercise, and will announce their decision in due course.

The vaccine damage payments scheme began on 22 March 1979 when the payment was set at £10,000. The payment has subsequently been increased twice: to £20,000 on claims made on or after 16 August 1985 and to £30,000 on claims made on or after 15 April 1991. Whilst the value of the payment is reviewed periodically, there are no plans to change it at this time.

Mobile Telephones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many times mobile telephones used by Ministers in his Department have been cloned during (a) the last six months, (b) the last 12 months and (c) the last 18 months; and which Ministers within his Department have had their mobile telephones cloned. [4247]

Mr. Burt: I am the only DSS Minister who has had his mobile telephone cloned in the last 18 months.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many mobile telephones there are available in his Department for the use of Ministers. [4248]

Mr. Burt: The Department of Social Security has six Ministers, each of whom has a mobile telephone. Additionally, four ministerial cars have telephones.

Jobseeker's Allowance

Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what was the total amount paid by his Department to consultants in connection with the introduction of the jobseeker's allowance; [4585]

(2) which firms of consultants were employed by his Department in connection with the introduction of the jobseeker's allowance. [4584]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The Department of Social Security has paid £2,224,000 through the Benefits Agency to consultants in connection with the introduction of jobseeker's allowance. The company used was Andersen Consulting.

Disability Working Allowance

Mr. Elletson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what recent change there has been in take-up of disability allowance. [5235]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: In the 12 months to October 1995, the disability working allowance case load increased by 56 per cent. to 6,895.

The number of new and repeat claims for October 1995 was 2,245. This compares with 1,471 for October 1994.

HEALTH

Abortions

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many abortions were performed in 1994 on women (a) resident in each health region and (b) in each district health authority without overnight stay; and how many of these operations involved NHS hospitals, NHS agency arrangements and other purchasers. [4105]

Mr. Horam: The information requested for 1994 will be placed in the Library. For reason of confidentiality, statistics for district health authorities are presented by DHA of woman's usual residence, not by DHA of termination.

Mrs. Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the estimated cost per NHS abortion without overnight stay, involving (a) NHS hospitals and (b) NHS agency arrangements. [4107]

Mr. Horam: The estimated average cost of a surgical abortion without overnight stay in a national health service hospital is £175, at 1993–94 figures. No information is available centrally about the cost of abortions performed in the private sector under NHS agency arrangements.

Hip Replacements

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average cost to the NHS of a hip replacement. [2683]

Mr. Horam: The cost of individual procedures is not available centrally.

Tobacco

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has (a) evaluated and (b) commissioned into the amount of tar, nicotine and carbon monoxide in tobacco products other than manufactured cigarettes; if he will list the available data; and if he will make a statement. [3979]

Mr. Horam: On behalf of the Department of Health, the Laboratory of the Government Chemist has carried out research on the tar, nicotine and carbon monoxide content of hand-rolling tobaccos. A report on this work is in the course of preparation and will be submitted for publication in an appropriate scientific journal.

NHS Land

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the NHS trusts and health authorities that have sold or leased land in 1995–96, indicating the amount of money received in each case, the purchaser and the total amount of money received in England from the sale and leasing of NHS land. [4083]

Mr. Horam: Information about total land sales in-year is not available centrally from national health service trusts. The information requested would be available only from the published accounts of each trust and health authority following their end of year. The name of the purchaser, and the amount of each sale and rental information is not available centrally.

Influenza

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what contingency plans his Department has considered for dealing with a flu epidemic; and to what conclusion they have come. [4182]

Mr. Horam: Heavy demand on the national health service, whether from natural causes or man-made, is always a possibility and the NHS is required to have contingency plans in place to deal with such incidents and to exercise plans regularly. The weekly rate of influenza infection is monitored by the Royal College of General Practitioners clinical research unit and, if needed, an alert can be issued to public health doctors via the Epinet system.

The Department of Health regularly takes steps to protect those most at risk from influenza by the provision of advice about who is most at risk from serious complications arising from the disease and who should therefore receive influenza vaccine. This year doctors were reminded during the summer of the need to plan their influenza vaccination campaign, which was launched in October.

The Department has also produced a leaflet called "What should I do about flu?" which provides information on how to cope with the disease. Copies were sent to all GPs and made available through Post Offices and copies are available in the Library. We have also produced a video advert about the leaflet, which was shown in post offices.

Hospital Discharges

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 27 November, Official Report, column 522, on hospital discharges if he will provide comparable figures for (a) 1990–91, (b) 1991–92 and (c) 1992–93. [4287]

Mr. Bowis: The information requested is shown in the table.

Destination of discharge of patients treated by consultants in geriatric medicine in NHS hospitals in England

Percentage

	1990–91	1991–92	1992–93
Usual residence	68.79	67.60	68.78
Deaths	19.35	17.69	17.52
NHS hospital outside district—general ward/younger physically disabled	1.36	4.90	5.20
Non-NHS institution	4.29	4.66	4.57
Local authority residential home	1.85	1.68	1.59
Temporary residence e.g. hotels, residential educational institutions	1.73	1.56	1.43
NHS hospital outside district—mentally ill/handicapped ward	0.06	0.26	0.30
NHS nursing home	0.00	0.05	0.22
Not known	2.47	1.42	0.25
Special hospital	0.09	0.15	0.12

Figures do not total 100 due to rounding.

Mental Illness

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many beds were available for the treatment of all forms of acute mental illness but excluding beds involving learning disabilities, in each year since 1988–89; what was the number of finished consultant episodes in acute mental illnesses for the same years; and how many patients with acute mental illness were treated in those years. [4314]

Mr. Bowis: The number of beds available for the treatment of acute mental illness in each year since 1988–89 is shown in the table.

Average daily number of available beds for acute mental illness for all ages

England

Year	Number
1988–89	22,505
1989–90	22,754
1990–91	22,427
1991–92	22,159
1992–93	21,652
1993–94	21,447
1994–95	22,101

Notes:

1. Information held centrally on the number of National Health Service mental illness beds does not include the classification "acute". It does, however, differentiate between "long-stay" and "short-stay". "Acute mental illness" has therefore been interpreted as "short-stay" mental illness.

2. Date is collected by broad ward classification rather than by clinical specialty and returns are made on a financial year, ie April to March, basis.

Department of Health KH03 returns.

The number of finished consultant episodes in mental illness in each year since 1988–89 is shown in the table.

Finished consultant episodes for mental illness—ordinary admissions and day cases combined:

England

Year	Number (thousands)
1988–89	216.3
1989–90	215.9
1990–91	219.9
1991–92	221.3
1992–93	234.1
1993–94	237.3
1994–95	239.0

Notes:

1. Information held centrally on finished consultant episodes does not include the classification "acute mental illness". It does, however, include the classification "mental illness".

2. The definition of a "consultant episode" is the period that a patient spends under the continuous care of a specific consultant in a specific health care provider (which may be in more than one hospital within that health care provider). A hospital provider spell can comprise one or more consultant episodes. For example, a patient may be admitted under the care of a general physician and then be transferred to the care of a surgeon. This would count as two consultant episodes within a single hospital provider spell.

Information of the number of patients is not available centrally.

Nursing Homes

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 27 November, Official Report, column 521, on nursing homes, what information his Department maintains on trust-run registered nursing homes. [4288]

Mr. Bowis: None.

Sterilisation

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) men and (b) women in England are sterilised annually, by standard census age group. [4104]

Mr. Horam: The information available in respect to national health service hospital admissions is shown in the table.

Estimated number of ordinary and day case admissions, principal operation—male and female sterlisation—in NHS hospitals in England—1993–94

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative the revenue commitment entered into by the Government for each year until the commitment ceases. [3393]

Mr. Horam: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I him on 6 December, column 224.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the policy changes which will arise from the final agreement in respect of each scheme agreed under the private finance initiative. [3394]

Mr. Horam: This Government's policy is that high-quality health care should be available to those who need it on the basis of their clinical need without regard to their ability to pay. The private finance initiative in the national health service is concerned with the provision of modern and efficient facilities for the delivery of NHS health care. There have been no policy changes arising from the agreement of PFI schemes.

Mobile Telephones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many times mobile telephones used by Ministers in his Department have been cloned during (a) the last six months, (b) the last 12 months and (c) the last 18 months; and which Ministers within his Department have had their mobile telephones cloned. [4269]

Mr. Horam: During the past 12 months, there have been two instances of cloned telephone numbers affecting the mobile telephone of the then Under-Secretary of State for Health. The Department is not liable for any payment of charges arising from cloned telephone numbers.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many mobile telephones there are available in his Department for the use of Ministers. [4270]

Mr. Horam: There are 25 mobile telephones available to departmental private office for the use of Ministers and staff including four telephones fitted in ministerial cars.

Buckinghamshire County Council (Resources)

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the special transitional grant and the social services standard spending assessment available to Buckinghamshire county council in each financial year from 1993–94 to 1996–97; and if he will make a statement. [4697]

Mr. Bowis: The information is shown in the table. Total resources available to Buckinghamshire county council for personal social services next year will be 35 per cent. higher in real terms than in 1993–94.

Resources for personal social services Buckinghamshire county council

£ million

	Standard spending assessment	Special transitional grant for community care
1993–94	45.920	4.268
1994–95	55.524	7.177
1995–96	62.001	6.515
1996–97	68.723	4.179

Figures for 1996–97 are provisional, issued for consultation.

Population Statistics

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the non-white proportion of (a) the electorate of London, (b) the population of London as a whole and (c) the population of London under the age of 16 years. [4595]

Mr. Horam: The electorial register does not give an indication of the ethnic group of electors, but information on people of voting age is shown in the table, together with the other information requested.

Age group within Greater London private household population	Estimated percentage of people in ethnic groups other than White during period June 1994 to May 1995
Aged 18 or over	19.2
Age under 16	33.8
All ages	22.5

NORTHERN IRELAND

Arms Decommissioning

11. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the number and type of illegally held firearms and ordnance and the percentage which would have to be decommissioned in order for all-party talks to commence. [3041]

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The security forces maintain information on illegal weapons holdings and supplies, but it would not be appropriate to make this public. There must be a credible and verifiable start to the process of decommissioning, sufficient to create the necessary circumstances of confidence for all-party round table talks to commence.

16. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which groups in Northern Ireland have expressed their support for the decommissioning of arms as a precondition for the commencement of all-party talks on the political future of Northern Ireland. [3047]

Mr. Ancram: The position of the individual groups on the decommissioning issue is a matter for them.

The Government's position is that we cannot see a way in which to secure the necessary confidence to bring all parties to the negotiating table without a start being made to the decommissioning of illegal arms.

19. Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made on achieving the decommissioning of arms; and if he will make a statement. [3051]

21. Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made towards the establishment of a disarmament commission to deal with the disposal of illegal weapons in Northern Ireland. [3053]

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what quantity of arms has to date been decommissioned by Republican terrorist organisations in Northern Ireland. [3036]

Sir John Wheeler: There have been no illegally held arms or equipment decommissioned to date. However, as the House will be aware, the British and Irish Governments announced on 28 November that they have agreed to establish an international body to provide an independent assessment of the decommissioning issue. That body has now been established and has been asked to report to the two Governments by mid-January 1996.

Peace Process

12. Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on co-operation with the Irish Government to promote peace in Northern Ireland. [3042]

17. Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress is being made on the Government's twin-track approach to the Northern Ireland peace. [3049]

20. Mr. Barnes: To the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the latest position concerning the peace process; and if he will make a statement. [3052]

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I refer the hon. Members to the reply I gave earlier to the hon. Members for Wigan (Mr. Stott), for Bolsver (Mr. Skinner), for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) and for Neath (Mr. Hain).

15. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what recent discussions he has had about furthering the peace process; and if he will make a statement. [3046]

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I have had numerous recent discussions about furthering the peace process with the Tanaiste, and with the leaders of the Northern Ireland political parties. Final negotiations between my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and the Taoiseach led to agreement and publication on 28 November of the two Governments' proposals for a twin-track process.

18. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects all-party talks to commence on the future constitution of Northern Ireland. [3050]

Sir Patrick Mayhew: As stated in the joint communique issued by the Prime Minister and the Taoiseach on 28 November 1995, which announced the "twin track" process, our firm aim is to launch all-party negotiations by the end of February 1996. We believe that, with co-operation from all the relevant parties in both tracks, this should prove achievable.

West Link Junctions

13. Mr. A. Cecil Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the timetable for construction of flyovers at west link junctions. [3043]

Mr. Moss: Schemes to provide flyovers at the Grosvenor road and Broadway junctions are included in the Department's six to 15 year major road works programme. However, the possibility of carrying out such schemes under the private finance initiative is currently being explored and this may lead to their earlier implementation.

Army Strength

14. Mr. Austin Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Defence about future Army strength in Northern Ireland. [3044]

Sir Patrick Mayhew: Army force levels in support of the RUC are an operational matter for the Chief Constable and the General Officer Commanding. I discuss such matters with the Secretary of State for Defence as appropriate and in the light of advice from the chief Constable and the GOC.

Extradition (Fraud)

22. Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the average time taken to obtain the extradition from the United States of America to Northern Ireland of a person suspected of having committed fraud after directions to prosecute have been issued in the United Kingdom. [3054]

Sir Patrick Mayhew: There are no records of any such extraditions having been sought.

Statutory Instruments

23. Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many statutory instruments have been passed through Parliament as a result of European Community directives in the past year. [3055]

Sir John Wheeler: My right hon. and learned Friend has not directly sponsored any statutory instruments through Parliament as a result of European Community directives in the past year.

Inward Investment

24. Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the most recent figures in respect of the level of inward investment into Northern Ireland. [3056]

Mr. Ancram: So far this year, the industrial Development Board for Northern Ireland has announced 11 inward investment projects which offer the prospect of 3,655 new jobs.

EU Funds

25. Mr. Molyneaux: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the standards of financial accountability in regard to funds allocated to Northern Ireland through the European Union. [3057]

Sir John Wheeler: All structural expenditure which is borne on the votes of Northern Ireland Departments is subject to the normal requirements of government accounting and to audit by the Northern Ireland Audit Office and by the European Court of Auditors. I am satisfied that the standard of financial accountability in regard to EU funds is satisfactory and we will continue to operate procedures which seek to safeguard the taxpayers' interest.

Social Housing

26. Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the provision of social housing in Northern Ireland for the current year. [3058]

Mr. Moss: The numbers of new public and voluntary sector dwellings which were completed in Northern Ireland from 1 April 1995 to 31 October 1995 were as follows:

	Number
Northern Ireland housing executive (Public Sector)	809
Registered housing associations (Voluntary Sector)	680
Total	1,489

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative the revenue commitment entered into by the Government for each year until the commitment ceases. [3405]

Sir John Wheeler: No scheme under the private finance initiative, announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in November 1992, have been approved in Northern Ireland to date.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the policy changes which will arise from the final agreement in respect of each scheme agreed under the private finance initiative. [3406]

Sir John Wheeler: No schemes under the private finance initiative, announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in November 1992, have been approved in Northern Ireland to date. A range of projects across all Northern Ireland Departments and the Northern Ireland Office are under consideration. It is too early, however, to identify any policy changes which might arise from projects agreed under the initiative.

Trust Ports

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress he has made with the privatisation of trust ports. [3048]

Mr. Moss: The Ports (Northern Ireland) Order came into effect on 2 January 1995. This measure enables the Northern Ireland trust ports to bring forward privatisation schemes. It also provides reserve powers for the Department to initiate the privatisation of a port with a turnover in excess of £5 million, but these powers are not exercisable until two years after the order came into effect.

Police (Community Involvement)

Mrs. Jane Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what changes he is planning to enhance community identification with policing in Northern Ireland. [3033]

Sir John Wheeler: We will publish shortly proposals for legislative reforms, to increase the ability of the community, through the Police Authority for Northern Ireland to shape the future direction of policing. The RUC, the Police Authority and the Government are also undertaking a fundamental review of policing needs, services and organisation, with community identification at its core.

Access Rights (Grandmothers)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will study the issue of grandmothers' rights of access, in the light of Northern Ireland Office decisions on custody in relation to the case of Mrs. Vint, and Mr. Vint of Longridge in the Linlithgow constituency. [3045]

Mr. Moss: Decisions on the custody of children and access by relatives are solely a matter for the courts. It would not, therefore, be appropriate for me to comment on this particular case.

WALES

Compulsory Competitive Tendering

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what savings have been delivered by compulsory competitive tendering. [2655]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: This information is not held centrally. However, researchers at the university of Birmingham investigated the financial impact of compulsory competitive tendering in the first three years—1989 to 1992—of competition under the Local Government Act 1988. They identified overall savings of 7 per cent. for local authorities in England and Wales across the service areas defined by the legislation, with variations by service area.

Forestry Commission

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many hectares of Forestry Commission woodland in Wales have been sold since October 1991; and, of these, how many hectares (a) remain open to the public and (b) have been closed to the public since October 1991. [3722]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The Forestry Commission has sold 5,400 hectares of forest land in Wales since October 1991. The commission does not maintain records of public access to woodlands which it has sold.

School Buildings

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the amount of cash needed to eliminate disrepair in local education authority schools in each of the local education authorities of Wales; and if he will make a statement. [4021]

Mr. Richards: My right hon. Friend and I have made no such estimate. Local education authorities are responsible for the repair and maintenance of their school buildings.

Attendance Allowances

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the percentage change in attendance allowances between 1994–95 and 1995–96 for each local authority in Wales; and for each local authority, which political party is in control. [3795]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The Welsh Office does not collect or hold information in respect of attendance allowances set by local authorities. With regard to the political control on each existing county and district council, I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to the hon. Member for Dover on 16 February. For the 22 unitary authorities elected on 4 May 1995, the latest information held by the Welsh Office is set out in the following table:

Local authority	Political control
Aberconwy and Colwyn County Borough	No overall control
Anglesey County	Independent
Blaenau Gwent County Borough	Labour
Bridgend County Borough	Labour
Caernarfonshire and Merionethshire County	Plaid Cymru

The Vale of Glamorgan County Borough	Labour
Wrexham County Borough	Labour

Hansard Volumn 254 Columns 761 and 762.

Consultants

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, if he will list those (a) consultants, (b) outside organisations and (c) individuals employed by his Department in each year since 1990, indicating the purposes of their employment and the total payments made to them. [3955]

Mr. Hague: Details of management and other consultants since 1990–91 have been placed in the Library of the House. Information on other outside organisations is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Details of the number of staff employed in the Welsh Office, staff costs and the Department's aims and objectives are given in the Welsh Office departmental report for 1995 (Cm 2815).

Work (Young People)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, what new measures he will adopt to get 18 to 24-year-old people into work; and if he will make a statement. [3857]

Mr. Richards: Young people up to the age of 25 can benefit from youth training, youth credits, modern apprenticeships and accelerated apprenticeships. They can also receive support under training for work and a range of other measures available through the Employment Service. The Department will continue to work with training and enterprise councils to meet the needs of these young people.

Roads

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will meet (a) Buckley town council, (b) Alyn and Deeside council and (c) the senior councillors and officials of the shadow county authority of Flintshire to discuss his policies concerning road building in Wales. [4018]

Mr. Hague: I have no plans to do so. Policies for road building are set out in the transport chapter of the Welsh Office's departmental report (Cm 2815) published on 9 March 1995. I will announce roads and transport expenditure plans for 1996–97 shortly.

Housing Developments

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, if he will meet residents of Liverpool road, Buckley, Clwyd, to discuss his planning policies as they affect applications to build new housing estates where there is only one access road; and if he will make a statement. [4022]

Mr. Hague: No. The determination of applications for planning permission is in the first place the responsibility of the local planning authority concerned. The local planning authority will need to have regard to, among other things, the series of planning policy guidance—PPG—notes, including PPG13, "Highways Considerations in Development Control", which incorporates guidance on access.

Long-term Unemployed

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what new measures he plans to adopt to get the long-term unemployed into work. [3860]

Mr. Richards: The training and enterprise councils in Wales and the Employment Service continue to provide a range of measures to help the long-term unemployed back into work. These include training for work and services such as client advice, job club, work trials and the job interview guarantee scheme offered by the Employment Service. In addition, North West Wales and Gwent training and enterprise councils, in partnership with the Employment Service, are piloting the sole traders employment initiative which helps sole traders to take on their first employee from among the long-term unemployed.

Assisted Areas

Mr. Donald Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consideration is being given to a change in the development area status of Swansea. [3798]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given on 21 November 1995 by my hon. Friend, the Minister of State for Trade and Industry, Official Report, column 77.

Population Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many 18 to 24-year-old people there are in each of the constituencies in Wales. [3858]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The latest available information for each parliamentary constituency is from the 1991 census of population, and is given in the following table:

Residents aged 18 to 24

	Number
Aberavon	5,983
Alyn and Deeside	8,346

Gross Domestic Product

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are the most recent figures for (a) gross domestic product per capita and (b) the average wage in (i) Wales and (ii) each standard English planning regions. [4295]

Mr. Hague: The most recent figures for gross domestic product per capita in Wales and the English regions are for 1993. They are published in table 1, page 26 of the December 1994 edition of "Economic Trends". Figures for average earnings in Wales and the English regions are available for April 1995 and are published in table X5.3, part A, "New Earnings Survey 1995". Copies of these publications are in the Library of the House.

Employment of Children

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the organisations and individuals he has consulted on the consultation document "Employment of Children". [4534]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The consultation paper, "Employment of Children" was sent on 30 October to the 24 organisation in Wales listed as follows:

Assembly of Welsh Counties
British Medical Association, Wales
Children in Wales
Church in Wales, Board of Social Responsibility
Clybiau Plant Cymru
Confederation of British Industry, Wales
Council of Welsh Districts
CYTUN (Churches Together in Wales), Commissions on Wales and the World)
Education Welfare Officers (all Wales group)
Equal Opportunities Commission, Wales
Farmers Union of Wales
Health Promotion, Wales
Health Visitors Association, Wales region
Merched y Wawr
National Association of Social Workers in Education, Wales
National Federation of Women's Institutes, Wales
National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, Wales
Royal College of General Practitioners, Wales
Royal College of Nursing, Welsh Board
Sports Council for Wales
Wales Council for Voluntary Action
Wales Trades Union Congress
Wales Youth Agency
Welsh Consumer Council.

Road Bridges

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the effect of the use of 41-tonne lorries on road bridges; and how many currently need to be strengthened. [3370]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Of the 1,345 bridges on the trunk road network in Wales, 585 have been identified as requiring assessment, 424 have been assessed and 149 of these have been identified as requiring strengthening. The remaining 161 will be assessed, and all necessary strengthening programmed before 1 January 1999. Local authorities are responsible for bridges on non-trunk roads.

House Condition Survey

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received in favour of a full house condition survey; if he will make it his policy to arrange for a new survey to be carried out without imposing administrative expenses on local councils; and if he will make a statement. [3392]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I have received representations from the Council of Welsh Districts and a number of local authorities about a further Welsh house condition survey. My right hon. Friend and I are currently considering the position.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will list for each scheme so far agreed under the private finance initiative the revenue commitment entered into by the Government for each year until the commitment ceases; [3411]

(2) if he will list the policy changes which will arise from the final agreement in respect of each scheme agreed under the private finance initiative. [3412]

Mr. Hague: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 7 November 1995, Official Report, column 808.

Mobile Phones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, how many mobile telephones there are available in his Department for the use of Ministers. [4261]

Mr. Hague: Three mobile phones are directly allocated to Welsh Office Ministers. They also have access to car phones in five official vehicles.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many times mobile telephones used by Ministers in his Department had been cloned during (a) the last six months, (b) the last 12 months and (c) the last 18 months; and which Ministers in his Department have had their mobile telephones cloned. [4262]

Mr. Hague: (a) once, 28 September, (b) once further, 26 March 1995, and (c) nil; the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones).

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Ashford Project

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, representing the Church Commissioners, if he will list the terms of reference agreed with the Church Commissioners for the review the Audit Committee is undertaking on Church Commission Projects Ltd. (Ashford great park). [4590]

Mr. Alison: The terms of reference for the review set by the Audit Committee are:

1. To review the origins of the Ashford project.
2. To examine the information made available to the Commissioners (including by whom and when) on the basis of which a decision to go ahead with the project was taken.
3. To consider the extent to which the outturn of the project to date has differed from the original projections (and why).
4. To report on the details of the amount so far spent on the project, to whom monies were paid and whether there is any scope for recovery of abortive expenditure.
5. To report on the results of the investigation including reference to any other relevant matters which may become apparent as part of the review.

Closed Investment Fund

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, representing the Church Commissioners, what factors underlie the Church Commissioners' operation of a closed fund. [4588]

Mr. Alison: The Church Commissioners have two principal tasks in the operation of their closed investment fund: first to optimise returns over the long term from their investments within appropriate risk management controls; secondly, to set a level of distribution in support of the Church's ministry which is sustainable.
